

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B

1,014,448

GENERAL LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE Hagerman Collection

OF BOOKS RELATING TO HISTORY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

BOUGHT WITH MONEY PLACED BY JAMES J. HAGERMAN OF CLASS OF '61

IN THE HANDS OF Professor Charles Kendall Adams

IN THE YEAR
1883.

307

421

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

42° & 43° VICTORIÆ, 1879.

VOL. CCXLVII.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE SEVENTEENTH DAY OF JUNE 1879,

TO

THE NINTH DAY OF JULY 1879.

Fifth Volume of the Session.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,

AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,"

22, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]

1879.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CCXLVII.

THIRD SERIES.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 17.

Page

Racecourses (Metropolis) Bill (No. 45)—

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read .. 2
 After short debate, House in Committee accordingly.
 Bill reported, without Amendment, and to be read 3^a on Friday next.

Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Bill (No. 83)—

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read .. 13
 After short debate, House in Committee accordingly.
 An Amendment made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

Omnibus Regulation Bill (No. 41)—

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee (on re-commitment), read .. 19
 House in Committee accordingly:—Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^a on Friday next; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 117.)

CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—PUNISHMENT OF PRIESTS—Observations, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, The Marquess of Salisbury .. 19

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 17.

QUESTIONS.

NEWCASTLE—THE WEAVERS TOWER—Question, Mr. Percy Wyndham; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson .. 23
 PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1875—COUNTY OF DONEGAL—Questions, The Marquess of Hamilton, Mr. Sullivan, Mr. Parnell; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther .. 24
 SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—FLOGGING—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. Callan; Answers, Colonel Stanley .. 25

VOL. CCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.] [b]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 17.]	Page
REPRODUCTIVE LOANS FUND (IRELAND) ACT—LOANS TO IRISH FISHERIES— Questions, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	26
ARMY—RELATIVES OF MARRIED SOLDIERS PENSIONS—Question, Colonel Colthurst; Answer, Colonel Stanley	27
HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Vans Agnew; An- swer, Lord Elcho	27
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—PLUNDERING OF ZULU VILLAGES— Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	28
BOILER EXPLOSION AT STONE CLOUGH—Question, Mr. J. Cowen; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	31
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE IRREGULARS—Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	31

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY—COMMERCIAL AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS— NOTICE OF MOTION—Observations, Question, The Chancellor of the Exchequer; Answer, Mr. Mac Iver; Question, Mr. Newdegate; An- swer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	32
--	----

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 10th June] After long time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday . The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock. The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.	33
---	----

MOTION.

COUNCIL OF INDIA—DUTIES ON COTTON GOODS—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS— Moved , "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Minute by Members of the Council of the Governor General of India on the Despatch of the Secretary of State, dated the 11th day of November 1876, and re- ferred to in the Despatch of the Government of India, dated the 17th day of March 1876: And, of all Communications which have passed between the Secretary of State for India and the Government of India, or the Governor General, relating to the repeal of the Cotton Duties (in continuation of the Papers presented to Parliament in 1876,)"— (Sir William Harcourt)	83
After debate, Amendment proposed, To leave out from the words "of all Communications," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "of the Memorandum of Sir Henry Sumner Maine, dated the 25th day of April 1876,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer ,)—instead thereof. Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After further short debate, Question put, and negatived . Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to . To be presented by Privy Councillors.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 18.

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

Money Laws (Ireland) Bill [Bill 12]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Delahunty) .. 110

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months,”—(Sir Joseph M’Kenna.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 30, Noes 146; Majority 116.—(Div. List, No. 123.)

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to:—Second Reading put off for three months.

Gun Licence Act (1870) Amendment Bill [Bill 57]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Sir Alexander Gordon) .. 118

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months,”—(Mr. Bruen.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

Warranty of Animals Bill—Ordered (Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Serjeant Simon); presented, and read the first time [Bill 208] .. 130

Ulster Tenant Right (No. 2) Bill—Ordered (Lord Arthur Hill-Trevor, Marquess of Hamilton, Viscount Castlereagh, Colonel Lowry Corry, Mr. Mulholland); presented, and read the first time [Bill 209] .. 130

New Forest Act (1877) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Selater-Booth, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 210] .. 130

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 19.

London Bridge Bill—

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read .. 131

After short debate, Order postponed:—Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill—

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read .. 132

After short debate, Second Reading put off to Monday next.

Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Bill (No. 76)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Lord Chancellor) .. 133

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Prosecution of Offences Bill (No. 74)—

House in Committee (according to Order) .. 134

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 121.)

Children’s Dangerous Performances Bill (No. 64)—

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read .. 137

After short debate, House in Committee.

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 122.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 19.]	Page
INDIA (FINANCES,) &c.—Petition presented	138
Moved , “That the Petition do lie upon the Table,”—(The Earl of Northbrook :)—After debate, Petition ordered to lie on the Table.
MR. LEONARD EDMUNDS—“THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. EDMUNDS”—Questions, The Earl of Redesdale; Answer, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon; Observations, The Lord Chancellor	167

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 19.

QUESTIONS.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS, 1854 AND 1876—THE BRIGANTINE “CALENICK”—Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Viscount Sandon	169
THE CAPE COLONY—MR. JUSTICE FITZPATRICK—Question, Mr. W. H. James; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	169
THE GOVERNMENT OF HAYTI—MR. MAUNDER—Question, Lord Arthur Russell; Answer, Mr. Bourke	171
JAMAICA—COOLIE IMMIGRATION—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	171
FLOODING OF RIVERS—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Harcourt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	172
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—AMBULANCE ARRANGEMENTS—Question, Mr. Ernest Noel; Answer, Colonel Stanley	172
DOMINION OF CANADA—LOAN FOR THE PACIFIC RAILROAD—Question, Mr. John Bright; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	173
LAW AND JUSTICE—PRISONERS AT THE YORKSHIRE ASSIZES—Question, Mr. Barran; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	173
ARMY—DISCIPLINE OF THE MILITARY SCHOOLS—Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Colonel Stanley	174
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—OUTBREAK OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE AT DERBY—Question, Colonel Kingscote; Answer, Lord George Hamilton	174
ARMY—ORDNANCE STORE DEPARTMENT RE-ORGANIZATION—Question, Sir George Bowyer; Answer, Colonel Stanley	176
INDIA—COMMISSION ON MILITARY EXPENDITURE—Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	176
FRANCE—THE NEW TARIFF LAW—Question, Sir Joseph M’Kenna; Answer, Mr. Bourke	176
IRELAND—IRISH BUTTER—DEPRECIATION OF VALUE—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	177
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACTS—LONDON SCHOOL BOARD EXPENDITURE—Questions, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answers, Lord George Hamilton	177
INDIA—THE FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT—Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	178
PUBLIC BUSINESS—HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Vans Agnew; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	179
CRIMINAL LAW—VACCINATION ACT, 1871—Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Mr. Sclater-Booth	179
CUSTOMS RE-ORGANIZATION—THE CLERICAL SERVICE—Questions, Sir Edward Watkin, Mr. Ritchie; Answers, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	180
NEW PALACE AT BAGSHOT PARK—Question, Dr. Kenealy; Answer, Mr. Gerard Noel	181
NAVY—ADMIRALTY CHARTS—Question, Mr. J. Stewart; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	181

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 19.]	Page
INDIA—PETITION OF MR. WILLIAM TAYLER—SIR FREDERICK HALLIDAY— Question, Mr. Staveley Hill; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope ..	181
COLONY OF VICTORIA—THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION—POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION—Question, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; Answer, Mr. A. Mills ..	182
QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY (IRELAND)—ASSUMPTION OF A UNIVERSITY DEGREE— Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	182

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 17th June] ..	183
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow , at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

—o—o—o—

DEATH OF THE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Questions, Mr. Benett-Stanford, Mr. Puleston; Answers, Colonel Stanley ..	283
---	-----

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

Indian Marine Bill [Bill 182]— Order for Committee read ..	284
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee:—Bill reported ; to be printed , as amended [Bill 211]; re-committed for Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.
Public Health Act (1875) Amendment (Interments) Bill— Moved , "That the Bill be now read the third time,"—(Mr. Marten) ..	285
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Dillwyn):—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 15, Noes 43; Majority 28.—(Div. List, No. 129.)
Original Question again proposed:— Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Callan):—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 10, Noes 45; Majority 35.—(Div. List, No. 130.)
Original Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read the third time, and passed .

MOTION.

—o—o—o—

Poor Law Amendment (No. 2) Bill— Motion for Leave (Mr. Salt) ..	289
Motion agreed to :—Bill to make better provision for the adjustment of Parish Boundaries, and to make further amendments in the Acts re- lating to the relief of the Poor in England, ordered (Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth); presented , and read the first time [Bill 212.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

SUPPLY—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That a sum, not exceeding £500,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay off and discharge Exchequer Bonds that will become due and payable on the 29th day of June 1879.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again
To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 19.]	Page
WAYS AND MEANS—
Considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)
Resolved , That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, the sum of £6,567,023 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.
Resolution to be reported To-morrow , at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again To-morrow .
<hr style="width: 10%; margin: 10px auto;"/>
Mungret Agricultural School, &c. Bill—Ordered (Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Synan, Mr. Gabbett); presented , and read the first time [Bill 213]	290
Petroleum Act (1871) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented , and read the first time [Bill 214]	290

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 20.

ARMY ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE—THE MEMBERS — Observations , Viscount Bury	290
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—HOUR OF MEETING FOR PUBLIC BUSINESS—
RESOLUTION—
Moved to resolve, That, in the opinion of this House, the Sittings for Public Business should commence at 4 P.M. instead of 5 P.M.,—(The Earl of Dunraven) ..	291
After debate, on Question? their Lordships divided ; Contents 64, Not-Contents 101; Majority 37.
Division List, Contents and Not-Contents	304
Resolved in the Negative.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 20.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY — THE AUXILIARY FORCES — THE ROYAL NORTH GLOUCESTERSHIRE MILITIA—Questions , Mr. J. R. Yorke, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answers, Colonel Stanley	306
EGYPT—ABDICATION OF THE KHEDEVE—Observations , Questions, Mr. Otway, Mr. Childers; Replies, Mr. Bourke, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	307
THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Questions , Major Dickson, Sir Robert Peel; Answers, Colonel Stanley	310
INDIA—BRITISH AND PORTUGUESE INDIA—CUSTOMS UNION—Question , Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. Bourke	311

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 19th June]	312
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day .

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 20.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

CYPRUS—MOTION FOR PAPERS—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Ordinance No. VIII. of 1879, giving power to the Government of Cyprus to exile persons without trial:

“Of the Ordinance No. VI. of 1878, prohibiting the sale of land to any but British or Turkish subjects:

“And, of the Ordinance No. XVI. of 1879, confiscating uncultivated lands,”—(Sir Charles W. Dilke,)—instead thereof 358

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After long debate, Question put, and negatived.

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—

Consolidated Fund (No. 4) Bill— }

Resolution [June 19] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson); presented, and read the first time .. 400

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 23.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Statement, The Duke of Cambridge; Observations, The Earl of Beaconsfield, Earl Granville 401

EGYPT—ABDICATION OF THE KHEDIVÉ—Question, Earl Granville; Answer, The Marquess of Salisbury 404

Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a” 404

Moved, “That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill, that they have power to alter the Bill so as to charge to the rates of the Metropolis the cost of all works carried out on public property and the expense of works of exceptional character and cost that may be ordered to be executed on private property,”—(The Lord Truro.)

Instruction withdrawn.

Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed; the Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—NOTICE OF QUESTION—ORDERS OF THE DAY AND NOTICES
—Observations, The Earl of Redesdale 412

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 23.

NOTICES OF QUESTIONS.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Notices of Questions, Sir William Fraser, Sir Henry Havelock 414

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 23.]

Page

QUESTIONS.

EXPLOSIVES ACT, 1875—Ireland—Question, Mr. Charles Lewis; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	414
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—ASSISTANT TEACHERS—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	415
FISHERIES (IRELAND)—THE SLIGO AND BONET FISHERIES—Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	416
POST OFFICE—POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS—Question, Mr. Wait; Answer, Lord John Manners	416
COLONIAL DEFENCES—LOANS—Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	417
ARMY—COMMITTEE ON SERVICE OF OFFICERS UNDER AGE—Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Colonel Stanley	417
FISHERIES (IRELAND)—LOANS TO CLARE FISHERMEN—Question, Lord Francis Conyngham; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	418
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CORONERSHIP OF LIMERICK—Questions, Mr. O'Connor Power, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	418
POOR LAW MEDICAL RELIEF (SCOTLAND)—Question, Sir William Cuninghame; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	419
SOUTH AFRICA—SIR BARTLE FRERE'S DESPATCHES—Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	420
ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—YEOMANRY, &C. ADJUTANTS—Question, Mr. Dalrymple; Answer, Colonel Loyd Lindsay	420
AFGHANISTAN—THE TREATY—Questions, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answers, Mr. E. Stanhope	421
TURKEY—CRETE—MURDER OF MR. W. ANDERSON—Questions, Mr. G. Howard, Mr. Vans Agnew; Answers, Mr. Bourke	421
CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, CLASS IV.—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES AND THE QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	422
POST OFFICE—CONTRACT WITH THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL COMPANY—Question, Mr. Dalrymple; Answer, Lord John Manners	423
INDIA—TENDERS FOR SUPPLIES—Question, Admiral Egerton; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	423
TURKEY—MURDER OF MR. OGLE—Question, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	424
INDIA—THE COUNCIL OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Mr. E. Stanhope	424
INDIA—BRITISH AND PORTUGUESE INDIA—CUSTOMS UNION—Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	425
AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	425
LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—ANNUAL REPORT—Question, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth; Answer, Mr. Sclater-Booth	426
BRAZIL—BRITISH CLAIMS—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Bourke	427
NAVY—ROYAL MARINES—OFFICERS—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	427
BANKRUPTCY ACT—COMPTROLLER'S REPORT—Question, Mr. Osborne Morgan; Answer, The Attorney General	428
NAVY—THE ARCTIC SHIP "RESOLUTE"—Question, Captain Pim; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	428
RAILWAYS AND CANALS—THROUGH RATES—Question, Mr. Arthur Peel; Answer, Viscount Sandon	429
EGYPT—ABDICATION OF THE KHEDIVE—Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Mr. Bourke:—Short debate thereon	429
TURKEY AND GREECE—THE PAPERS—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Bourke	432

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 23.]	Page
POST OFFICE STATISTICS—INDIA AND CHINA MAILS—Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, Lord John Manners	432
LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)—THREATENED EVICTION OF A PRIEST— Questions, Mr. Verner, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	432
ARMY ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE—THE INSTRUCTIONS—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Colonel Stanley	434
TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE 23—THE PROVINCES—Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Mr. Bourke	435
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ORANGE RIVER TRIBES—Questions, Mr. Goschen; Answers, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	435
HAMPTON COURT PARK—THE MASTER OF THE HORSE—Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Mr. Gerard Noel	436
THE CHARITY COMMISSION—THE EXPENSES—Question, Mr. Pell; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	436
GRAND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	436
PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—Statement, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	436

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 20th June]	437
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow , at Two of the clock.

PUBLIC LOANS [REMISSION]—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the remission of certain Loans formerly made by the Exchequer Loan Commissioners, and the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and by the Irish Exchequer Loan Commissioners, and the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or out of moneys formerly raised by the authority of Parliament for the purpose of such Loans. Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 24.

ORDERS OF THE DAY — NOTICE OF MOTION — THE STATE OF IRELAND— Explanation, Lord Oranmore and Browne; Observations, The Earl of Beaconsfield	522
--	-----

Workmen's Compensation Bill (No. 7)—

Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Motion for Second Reading, read	522
After short debate, Adjourned Debate put off to Thursday the 17th of July next.

Public Health Act (1875) Amendment (Interments) Bill (No. 123)—

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read	524
Second Reading put off to Tuesday next.

Companies Acts Amendment Bill (No. 71)—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Lord Aberdare)	524
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and com- mitted to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 24.]

Page

SMALL-POX—PRISONS (IRELAND)—Question, Observations, The Earl of Belmore; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon ..	525
--	-----

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS—MOTION FOR RETURNS—

Moved that there be laid before the House—

Return made out, county by county, in continuation of Return respecting the Endowed Schools Acts, Paper No. (5.), ordered to be printed on the 13th of February last, with in each case a proximate estimate of the annual endowments of (1) The number of Schemes finally approved and in force in England and Wales under the Endowed Schools Acts of 1869, 1873, and 1874; (2) The number of Schemes published by the Charity Commissioners under those Acts, but not yet finally approved; (3) The Endowed Schools not returned in (1) and (2) nor included in sect. 3 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1873, which are within the general provisions of the Endowed Schools Acts; (4) The aggregate number and income of Endowed Schools included in sect. 3. of the Endowed Schools Act, 1873:

Also

Return, as regards (1), of the grade, determined as in Paper (5.), 1879, of each school under the Scheme in force, as well as the total number and grades of such schools,—
(The Earl Fortescue)

527

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Return ordered to be laid before the House.

Cruelty to Animals Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Lord Truro) ; read 1 ^a (No. 125) ..	535
--	-----

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 24.

POSTPONEMENT OF QUESTION.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Postponement of Question, Observations, Sir Henry Havelock	535
---	-----

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—MILITIA BARRACKS AT CHESTERFIELD—Question, Lord George Cavendish; Answer, Lord Eustace Cecil	536
SOUTH AFRICA—THE WAR—DESTRUCTION OF ZULU VILLAGES—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	536
SOUTH AFRICA—INDENTURED NATIVE WOMEN AND CHILDREN—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	537
METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (WATER EXPENSES) BILL—Question, Observations, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Monk; Replies, Mr. Raikes, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg	538
SOUTH AFRICA—EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS—INCIDENCE OF COST—Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	540
HARBOURS—DUNBAR HARBOUR—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	541

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN—

Moved, “That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on Amendment on Motion [13th May] be read, and discharged,”—(Mr. Dilhoun)
Motion agreed to. 541

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—COURTS OF INQUIRY—Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Colonel Stanley	542
PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—Question, Captain Pim; Answer, Mr. Speaker	542

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 24.]

Page

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 23rd June] 543 After long time spent therein, it being 10 minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

Public Loans Remission Bill—Resolution [June 23] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 218] 595

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

[House counted out.]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 25.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

University Education (Ireland) Bill [Bill 183]—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [21st May], "That the Bill be now read a second time:"—
And which Amendment was—

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while this House recognizes that the funds set free by the disestablishment of the Irish Church should be devoted to the benefit of the people of Ireland, provided they are not again applied to the support of any sectarian religion, it is not desirable to devote additional public funds to the further promotion of higher education in Ireland till adequate provision is first made for elementary teaching in that Country without aid from Imperial funds exceeding that given to other parts of the United Kingdom,"—(Sir George Campbell),—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—Debate resumed 596

After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(The O'Connor Don):—After further short debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till Tomorrow.

School Boards (Duration of Loans) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Hanbury, Mr. Poll, Mr.
Reginald Yerke); presented, and read the first time [Bill 219] 670

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 26.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND)—Notice, The Lord Chancellor .. 670

SOUTH AMERICA—CHILI AND PERU—LETTERS OF MARQUE—THE HOSTILITIES —Question, The Earl of Airlie; Answer, The Marquess of Salisbury 671

EGYPT—DEPOSITION OF THE KHEWIVE—Question, Earl De La Warr; Answer, The Marquess of Salisbury 671

London Bridge Bill—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d" 671

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months,")—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 26.]	Page
London Bridge Bill —continued.
After short debate, Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn :—The Order for the Third Reading discharged ; and Bill referred to a Select Committee.
And, on June 30, Committee nominated :—List of the Committee ..	682
Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Bill (No. 83)—
Amendments reported (according to Order) ..	682
A further Amendment made :—Bill to be read 3 ^a on Thursday next; and to be printed , as amended. (No. 130.)

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 26. NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (WATER EXPENSES) BILL—Notice of Resolution on Second Reading, Mr. Monk ..	685
---	-----

QUESTIONS.

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS—THE CONTINUANCE BILL—Question, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth; Answer, Lord George Hamilton ..	686
THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell, Sir William Fraser, Sir Henry Havelock, Mr. P. J. Smyth; Answers, Colonel Stanley ..	686
POST OFFICE—VICTORIA—MAIL SERVICE vid GALLE OR COLOMBO TO MELBOURNE—Question, Mr. J. Holms; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	689
HIRING FAIRS (SCOTLAND)—Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, The Lord Advocate ..	690
AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS—THE WEEKLY CORN AVERAGES—Question, Mr. Foljambe; Answer, Mr. J. G. Talbot ..	691
RAILWAYS—CONTINUOUS BRAKES—Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, Mr. J. G. Talbot ..	691
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—OVERTURES FOR PEACE—DETENTION OF MESSENGERS—Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	692
TRAMWAYS ACT—WANTAGE TRAMWAY—Question, Mr. J. Cowen; Answer, Mr. J. G. Talbot ..	692
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—EXCESSES OF BRITISH TROOPS—Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	693
ANTI-RENT AGITATION (IRELAND)—TENANT RIGHT MEETING AT MILLTOWN—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	694
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. O'Connor Power :)—After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
KINGDOM OF SIAM—ACTION OF MR. KNOX, BRITISH CONSUL GENERAL—Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	719
AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—DISASTER TO THE 10TH HUSSARS—Question, Mr. Serjeant Sherlock; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	719
SOUTH AFRICA—EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS—INCIDENCE OF COST—Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	720
REPUBLIC OF NICARAGUA—Question, Mr. P. J. Smyth; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	720
SERVIA AND BULGARIA—COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH AUSTRIA—Questions, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Muntz; Answers, Mr. Bourke ..	721
POST OFFICE—EXPRESS LETTER SERVICE—Question, Mr. Ryder; Answer, Lord John Manners ..	722

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 26.]	Page
AFGHANISTAN — DEMARCOATION OF TERRITORY — Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	722
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—DESTRUCTION OF VILLAGES—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Colonel Stanley	723
THE TRUCK SYSTEM — NAILERS AND RIVET MAKERS — Questions, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Mundella; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross	724
EGYPT — ABDICATION OF THE KHEDEVE — Explanation, Question, The Marquess of Hartington; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer: —Short debate thereon	725
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) — EXPENDITURE ON ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Lord George Hamilton	730

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 24th June.]	730
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow , at Two of the clock.
Volunteer Corps (Ireland) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 200]—
Bill considered in Committee	807
After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.
—
Charity (Expenses and Accounts) Bill— Ordered (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer); presented , and read the first time [Bill 221] ..
810
Industrial Enterprise (Ireland) Bill— Ordered (Mr. P. J. Smyth, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Colonel King-Harman, The O'Donoghue); presented , and read the first time [Bill 222] ..
810

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 27.

TREATY OF BERLIN — ARTICLE 61 — ARMENIA — ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE—
Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Correspondence respecting the 61st Article of the Treaty of Berlin, in respect of the Armenian people,—(The Earl of Carnarvon)	811
After debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn .
INLAND NAVIGATION (IRELAND)—LIMERICK TO BELFAST—Observations, The Earl of Leitrim, Lord Harlech; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon
831
ARMY ORGANIZATION—REGIMENTAL COMMANDS—OVER-REGULATION MONEY —Question, Lord Truro; Answer, Viscount Bury 834
Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1 st (No. 132)
835

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 27.

QUESTIONS.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—LIMERICK COUNTY PRISON—Questions, Mr. O'Sullivan Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	836
LOWER THAMES VALLEY MAIN SEWERAGE SCHEME—THE SEWAGE FARM NEAR MOLESEY—Question, Mr. Giles; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth ..	837

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 27.]	Page
SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE MOUNTED YEOMANRY—Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	837
IRELAND—RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCES IN THE WEST OF IRELAND—Questions, Mr. Holt, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	838
LICENSING ACTS—EXEMPTION LICENCES—SOUTHAMPTON BOROUGH MAGISTRATES—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	839
ORDER—WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION “THAT THIS HOUSE DO NOW ADJOURN”—Question, Observations, Mr. Newdegate; Reply, Mr. Speaker	840

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 26th June]	842
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”—(Mr. W. H. Smith)	888
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to .

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £891,615, Half-Pay, Reserved Half-Pay, and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Marines.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	889
(2.) £803,920, Military Pensions and Allowances.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	889
(3.) £301,211, Civil Pensions and Allowances.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply,—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—CHILDREN IN IRISH WORKHOUSES—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire what steps it is desirable to take to improve the state of children in Irish workhouses,”—(Mr. Arthur Moore),—instead thereof	889
--	-----

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

INDIA—EMIGRATION OF COOLIES—Observations, Sir George Campbell	905
---	-----

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 27.]

Page

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read—continued.

IRISH FARMERS—"THE SPENCER SYSTEM"—RESOLUTION—
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as it appears that great benefit has arisen in certain parts of Ireland by the working of 'the Spencer system,' under which small farmers have been encouraged and stimulated to improved cultivation by a distribution of small money prizes for competition, it is therefore expedient that this system should be encouraged by Her Majesty's Government undertaking to provide official inspection in all cases where individuals, or public or corporate bodies, are willing to provide funds for the carrying out of the system of rewards, more especially as the funds now available from the closing of certain model farms will be more than sufficient to enable this to be done,"—(Colonel King-Harman,)—instead thereof ..

906

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE ROYAL NORTH GLOUCESTER MILITIA—Observations, Mr. J. R. Yorke, Mr. Price; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer :—Short debate thereon

917

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till Monday next.

Tramways Orders Confirmation (re-committed) Bill [Bill 215]—

Order for Committee read 925
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

Partnership Bill—Considered in Committee :—Resolution agreed to, and reported :—Bill ordered (Mr. Sampson Lloyd, Mr. Herschell, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Whitwell); presented, and read the first time [Bill 225]

928

Cork Borough Quarter Sessions Bill—Ordered (Mr. Murphy, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Goulding, Colonel Colthurst); presented, and read the first time [Bill 226]

928

Highway Accounts (Returns) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt); presented, and read the first time [Bill 227]

928

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 30.

THE LATE LORD LAWRENCE—Question, Observations, Earl Granville; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield

929

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS—VILLAGE OF LEIGHTON—Question, The Earl of Sandwich; Answer, Earl Stanhope

930

NEW NORTHERN (VICTORIA) UNIVERSITY—Question, Lord Winmarleigh; Answer, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

930

INSURANCE COMPANIES—PARTICIPATION OF PROFITS—Question, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Answer, The Lord Chancellor

931

University Education (Ireland) Bill—

Bill to promote the advancement of learning and to extend the benefits connected with University Education in Ireland—Presented (The Lord Chancellor)

931

After short debate, Bill read 1st (No. 134.)

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL — Question, Observations, Lord Campbell; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield

945

Prayer Book Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Ebury); read 1st (No. 133)

947

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 27.]	Page
SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE MOUNTED YEOMANRY—Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	837
IRELAND—RELIGIOUS DISTURBANCES IN THE WEST OF IRELAND—Questions, Mr. Holt, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	838
LICENSING ACTS—EXEMPTION LICENCES—SOUTHAMPTON BOROUGH MAGISTRATES—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	839
ORDER—WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION “THAT THIS HOUSE DO NOW ADJOURN”—Question, Observations, Mr. Newdegate; Reply, Mr. Speaker	840

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 26th June]	842
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”—(Mr. W. H. Smith)	888
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to .

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £891,615, Half-Pay, Reserved Half-Pay, and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Marines.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	889
(2.) £803,920, Military Pensions and Allowances.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	889
(3.) £301,211, Civil Pensions and Allowances.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply,—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—CHILDREN IN IRISH WORKHOUSES—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire what steps it is desirable to take to improve the state of children in Irish workhouses,”—(Mr. Arthur Moore),—instead thereof	889
--	-----

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

INDIA—EMIGRATION OF COOLIES—Observations, Sir George Campbell	905
---	-----

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 27.]

Page

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read—continued.

IRISH FARMERS—"THE SPENCER SYSTEM"—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as it appears that great benefit has arisen in certain parts of Ireland by the working of 'the Spencer system,' under which small farmers have been encouraged and stimulated to improved cultivation by a distribution of small money prizes for competition, it is therefore expedient that this system should be encouraged by Her Majesty's Government undertaking to provide official inspection in all cases where individuals, or public or corporate bodies, are willing to provide funds for the carrying out of the system of rewards, more especially as the funds now available from the closing of certain model farms will be more than sufficient to enable this to be done,"—(Colonel King-Harman,)—instead thereof ..

906

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE ROYAL NORTH GLOUCESTER MILITIA—Observations, Mr. J. R. Yorke, Mr. Price ; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer :—Short debate thereon

917

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till Monday next.

Tramways Orders Confirmation (re-committed) Bill [Bill 215]—

Order for Committee read 925

After short debate, Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment ; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

Partnership Bill—Considered in Committee :—Resolution agreed to, and reported :—Bill ordered (Mr. Sampson Lloyd, Mr. Herschell, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Whitwell) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 225]

928

Cork Borough Quarter Sessions Bill—Ordered (Mr. Murphy, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Goulding, Colonel Colthurst) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 226]

928

Highway Accounts (Returns) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Salt) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 227]

928

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 30.

THE LATE LORD LAWRENCE—Question, Observations, Earl Granville ; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield 929

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS—VILLAGE OF LEIGHTON—Question, The Earl of Sandwich ; Answer, Earl Stanhope 930

NEW NORTHERN (VICTORIA) UNIVERSITY—Question, Lord Winmarleigh ; Answer, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon 930

INSURANCE COMPANIES—PARTICIPATION OF PROFITS—Question, Lord Stanley of Alderley ; Answer, The Lord Chancellor 931

University Education (Ireland) Bill—

Bill to promote the advancement of learning and to extend the benefits connected with University Education in Ireland—Presented (The Lord Chancellor)

931

After short debate, Bill read 1st (No. 134.)

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL — Question, Observations, Lord Campbell ; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield 945

Prayer Book Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Ebury) ; read 1st (No. 133) 947

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 30.

Page

QUESTIONS.

NEW NORTHERN (VICTORIA) UNIVERSITY—Question, Mr. Birley; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	947
POST OFFICE — CAPE AND ZANZIBAR MAIL CONTRACT — Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	947
INFANT LIFE PROTECTION ACT, 1872 — INFANT MORTALITY, EXETER—Question, Mr. A. Mills; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	948
MINING ACCIDENTS—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	948
ARMY—COMMISSION ON MILITARY EXPENDITURE AND ORGANIZATION (INDIA)—Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	949
THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Question, Sir William Fraser; Answer, Colonel Stanley	949
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POST OFFICES IN MAYO—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Lord John Manners	950
IRELAND—CHURCH MISSIONS IN THE NORTH — CIRCULATION OF OFFENSIVE TRACTS AND PLACARDS—Question, Colonel Colthurst; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	950
AFGHANISTAN—THE TERRITORIAL ARRANGEMENTS—THE KHYBER PASS, &c.—Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Mr. E. Stanhope	951
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—THE CAT-O'-NINE-TAILS — Questions, Mr. Callan; Answers, Colonel Stanley, Mr. Assheton Cross	951
POST OFFICE ORDER DEPARTMENT—UNPAID ORDERS—Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Lord John Manners	952
CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Attorney General	953
IRELAND — ARRESTS FOR DRUNKENNESS — Question, The O'Connor Don; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	953
THE GREEK PAPERS—Question, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice; Answer, Mr. Bourke	953
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—NORTH DUBLIN BOARD OF GUARDIANS — Question, Sir Arthur Guinness; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	954
ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE ROYAL NORTH GLOUCESTER MILITIA —Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Colonel Stanley	954
DOGS REGULATION (IRELAND) ACT (1865) AMENDMENT BILL — Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	955
CUSTOMS RE-ORGANIZATION — CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS — Question, Mr. Rathbone; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	955
BUILDING SOCIETIES—LOANS—6 & 7 WILL. IV. c. 32—Question, Mr. Jacob Bright; Answer, The Attorney General	956
CYPRUS—PURCHASE OF LAND BY FOREIGNERS—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Bourke	956
THE LATE LORD LAWRENCE—Question, Mr. Evelyn Ashley; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	957
EGYPT—THE SUCCESSION—THE FIRMAN—Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Mr. Bourke	958
ARMY—WAR DEPARTMENT—PURCHASE OF HAY—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Colonel Stanley	958

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 27th June]	959
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 30.]	Page
SUPPLY—REPORT—Resolutions [27th June] reported ..	1046
Moved , "That the said Resolutions be now read a second time :"—After short debate, Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn . Original Question put, and agreed to . Resolutions read a second time, and agreed to .
CHARITY COMMISSIONERS' EXPENSES [STAMP DUTY]—RESOLUTION— Charity Commissioners' Expenses, considered in Committee ..	1057
(In the Committee.)
Resolved , That it is expedient to authorise the imposition of a Stamp Duty of One per centum on the gross income of Charities towards meeting the Expenses of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, and to make further provision respecting the Accounts of Charities.
Resolution to be reported To-morrow , at Two of the clock.
VOLUNTEER CORPS (IRELAND) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 200]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress, Clause 2, 26th June] ..	1058
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow .
—
CUSTOMS BUILDINGS Bill— Ordered (Mr. Noel, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson ; presented , and read the first time [Bill 228],	1060

LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 1.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT (1875) Amendment (Interments) Bill— Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl Stanhope) ..	1060
Amendment moved , to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months,")—(The Earl Granville). On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided ; Contents 116, Not-Contents 65; Majority 51.
Division List, Contents and Not-Contents ..	1067
Resolved in the Affirmative .
THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Question, Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, Viscount Bury	1069

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 1.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

EAST INDIA RAILWAY Bill (by Order)— Moved , "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration,"—(Mr. J. G. Hubbard)	1074
Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, adopting the recommendation contained in the Special Report of the Committee to which this Bill was referred, is of opinion that its provisions should not be regarded as a precedent for defining the terms on which the Indian Government may hereafter exercise its right of acquiring possession of the other guaranteed Railways in India,"—(Mr. Fawcett),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After long debate, Question put, and negatived . Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to .
VOL. CCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.] [d]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 1.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Indian Marine (re-committed) Bill [Bill 211]—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”—(Mr. E. Stanhope) .. 1140
Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Sir Charles W. Dilke):—
 Motion agreed to:—Debate adjourned till Thursday.

Poor Law Amendment (No. 2) Bill [Bill 212]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Salt) .. 1141
 It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

EDUCATION (WALES)—RESOLUTION—

Moved, “That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government to consider the best means of assisting any local effort which may be made for supplying the deficiency of higher education in Wales,”—(Mr. Hussey Vivian) .. 1141
 Amendment proposed, to leave out the words “assisting any local effort which may be made for,”—(Viscount Emlyn).
 Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After long debate, Question put, and negatived.
 Main Question, as amended, put:—The House divided; Ayes 54, Noes 105; Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 142.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Supply of Drink on Credit Bill [Bill 224]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Serjeant Spinks) .. 1183 Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

Children's Dangerous Performances Bill [Bill 229]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Evelyn Ashley) 1185
 After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

Charity (Expenses and Accounts) (No. 2) Bill—Resolution [June 30] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Raikes, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer); presented, and read the first time [Bill 230] .. 1187

New Forest Act (1877) Amendment Bill [Bill 10]—

Order for Committee [9th July] read, and discharged:—Bill committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two by the Committee of Selection:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum.—(Mr. Selater-Booth.)

And, on July 3, Committee nominated:—List of the Committee .. 1187

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 2.

Page

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

East India Railway Bill (by Order)—

Moved, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration,"—
(Mr. J. G. Hubbard) 1187

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon Wednesday next,"—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"
—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered 1206

Bill to be read the third time.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Spirits in Bond Bill [Bill 19]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. O'Sullivan) .. 1208

After debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act (1870) Amendment Bill

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. D. Taylor) .. 1228

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"
—After debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 3.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL — Question, Observations, Earl Granville ; Reply, The Lord Chancellor 1246

Divinity School (Church of Ireland) Bill (No. 36)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Earl of Belmore) .. 1248

After debate, Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—Observations, The Earl of Camperdown ; Reply ; The Earl of Beaconsfield 1262

Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Bill (No. 83)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a,"—(The Earl of Galloway) .. 1263

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months,")—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

After debate, on Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided ; Contents 66, Not-Contents 29 ; Majority 37.

Division List, Contents and Not-Contents 1271

Resolved in the Affirmative :—Bill read 3^a accordingly, with the Amendments, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 3.]	Page
SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT, SOUTH KENSINGTON — STUDY OF AGRICULTURE—Question, Observations, Earl Granville; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon; Observations, The Marquess of Huntly ..	1272
Then, on the Motion of the Earl Granville, Memorandum of the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, as to instruction in Agriculture: Ordered to be laid before the House.
Return laid before the House accordingly, and to be printed . (No. 137.)
UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL — Question, Observations, Lord Oranmore and Browne, Earl Granville; Reply, The Earl of Beaconsfield ..	1275

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JULY 3.

QUESTIONS.

METROPOLIS—THE MAIN DRAINAGE—Question, Sir Andrew Lusk; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1278
THE LUNACY COMMISSIONERS — Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1279
SPAIN—CLAIM OF MR. FIELD — THE “MARIE LOUISE” — Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1279
POST OFFICE — INDIA, CHINA, AND AUSTRALIAN MAILS — Question, Mr. Rathbone; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson ..	1280
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ESTIMATES OF COST—Questions, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Childers; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1280
CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—Question, Mr. Cole; Answer, The Attorney General ..	1281
NAVY — ADMIRALTY — PURCHASE OF HAY — Questions, Mr. Anderson; Answers, Mr. W. H. Smith ..	1281
ARMY—ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS—SCHOOLS OF INSTRUCTION—Question, Mr. W. Holms; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1282
IRELAND—TYRONE COUNTY COURT—SIR FRANCIS W. BRADY — Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1283
PETTY SESSIONS (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther ..	1283
SOUTH AFRICA — DESPATCHES OF SIR BARTLE FRERE — Questions, Mr. Mundella, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Courtney; Answers, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach ..	1284
JAPAN—THE TARIFF—Question, Mr. Sampson Lloyd; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..	1285
SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL — COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, LONDON — Questions, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Rathbone; Answers, The Attorney General ..	1286
THE NEW NORTHERN (VICTORIA) UNIVERSITY—Question, Mr. Jacob Bright; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1287
ARMY (ENTRANCE) PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS — Question, Sir Henry Havelock; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1287
ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS IMPROVEMENT ACT, 1875—Question, Colonel Beresford; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1288
SOUTH AFRICA—SEAMEN AND MARINES—Question, Lord Charles Beresford; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith ..	1289
EGYPT — THE PAPERS — Observations, Questions, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answers, Mr. Bourke, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1289
COAL MINES — EXPLOSION OF FIREDAMP AT BLANTYRE — Questions, Mr. Macdonald; Answers, Mr. Assheton Cross ..	1290

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 3.]	Page
PARLIAMENT—STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Question, Sir Joseph M'Kenna, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1292
POST OFFICE — ILLEGAL LOTTERY TICKETS — Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Lord John Manners ..	1293

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 30th June] ..	1294
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress.
Moved , "That this House will resolve itself into the said Committee on Saturday, at One of the clock,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) ..	1401
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "One," and insert the word "Four,"—(Mr. Parnell .) Question proposed, "That the word 'One' stand part of the Question :"
—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn .
Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Resolved , That this House will resolve itself into the said Committee on Saturday, at half after One of the clock.
Inclosure Provisional Order (Maltby Lands) Bill [Bill 173]—
Order for Second Reading read ..	1403
After short debate, Order discharged :—Bill withdrawn .
Children's Dangerous Performances Bill (Lords) [Bill 229]—
Order for Committee read ..	1404
Bill considered in Committee; Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 4.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR — OVERTURES OF PEACE — Question, The Earl of Kimberley; Answer, Earl Cadogan :—Short debate thereon ..		1404
LEONARD EDMUNDS—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE—
Moved , That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the proceedings taken upon an order of reference made by the Court of Common Pleas on the 26th June 1869 in an action entitled "Edmunds v. Greenwood," and in relation to the award of the arbitrators under the said order of reference,—(The Earl of Redesdale) ..		1407
After short debate, on Question ? Resolved in the Negative .
INDIAN PRINCIPALITIES—RIGHTS OF SUCCESSION—RESOLUTION—
Moved to resolve, That this House is of opinion that all cases of disputed succession to Indian Principalities or States not involving preponderating political considerations or criminal elements should be decided by judicial authority, and be referable to the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council,—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley) ..		1415
After short debate, on Question ? Resolved in the Negative .

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 4.

QUESTIONS.

COAL MINES — DINAS COLLIERY EXPLOSION — Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross ..		1417
TURKEY—GOVERNOR GENERAL OF SYRIA—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Mr. Bourke ..		1417

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 4.]	Page
INLAND REVENUE—THE INCOME TAX—SCHEDULE A—Question, Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1418
FUNERAL OF THE LATE LORD LAWRENCE — Observations, Question, Sir George Campbell; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1418
EGYPT—THE PAPERS—Question, Sir Julian Goldsmid; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1419
RAILWAY COMMISSION—CONTINUANCE—Questions, Mr. A. Mills; Answers, Mr. J. G. Talbot	1420
METALLIC CURRENCY AND TRADE—A ROYAL COMMISSION — Question, Mr. Sampson Lloyd; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1421
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—THE CAT-O'-NINE-TAILS — Questions, Mr. Callan; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer; Personal Explanation, Mr. W. H. Smith :—Short debate thereon ..	1421
LAW AND JUSTICE—BRIDPORT COUNTY COURT—MR. LEFROY—Question, Mr. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1424
ARMY—PAYMENTS BY REPLACED OFFICERS — Notice of Question, Major O'Gorman	1425

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:~:~:~:—

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the depressed condition of the agricultural interest, and the causes to which it is owing; whether those causes are of a temporary or of a permanent character, and how far they have been created or can be remedied by legislation,”—(Mr. Chaplin,)—instead thereof 1425

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After long debate, Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,” —(Mr. O'Connor Power:)—Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” put, and negatived.

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Railways and Telegraphs in India Bill [Lords] [Bill 192]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Edward Stanhope) 1544

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

— — —

Knightsbridge and other Crown Lands Bill—Ordered (Mr. Noel, Mr. Secretary Stanley); presented, and read the first time [Bill 231] 1546

Commons Act (1876) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Pell, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice); presented, and read the first time [Bill 233] 1546

Slave Trade (East African Courts) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Bourke, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson); presented, and read the first time [Bill 232] 1547

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, SATURDAY, JULY 5.

Page

QUESTIONS.

SCOTLAND—DUNBAR HARBOUR—Question, Lord Elcho ; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson ..	1547
THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—LIEUTENANT CAREY—Question, Sir Robert Peel ; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1548
ARMY — MILITARY PRISONERS — CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—Question, Mr. Callan ; Answer, Colonel Stanley ..	1548
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—THE CAT-O'-NINE-TAILS—Question, Mr. Parnell ; Answer, Mr. Callan ..	1549
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—NEGOTIATIONS WITH CETYWAYO—Question, Sir Robert Peel ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1550

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 3rd July] ..	1551
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday .

LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 7.

POLICE (IRELAND)—DISTURBED DISTRICTS AND INTIMIDATION—MOTION FOR RETURNS— Moved that there be laid before this House, Return of all persons now receiving police protection in Ireland, and of police posts of constabulary located in disturbed districts; and a Return of farms now unoccupied from intimidation,—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne) ..	1684
After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn .
Summary Jurisdiction Bill (No. 97)— Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,”—(The Lord Chancellor) ..	1699
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 15 th instant.
CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND)—CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—Question, Observations, Lord Emly ; Reply, The Duke of Richmond and Gordon :—Short debate thereon ..	1704
ARMY — DEATHS AND INVALIDS ON FOREIGN STATIONS—MOTION FOR A RETURN— Moved that there be laid before the House a Return showing the numbers and respective ages of non-commissioned officers and privates in the Army who died or were invalided home from Her Majesty's Indian, Colonial, and other Foreign Possessions during the five years from January 1, 1874, to December 31, 1878, in a tabulated form, set forth in the Notice of Motion,—(The Earl of Galloway) ..	1708
Motion agreed to :—Return ordered .

COMMONS, MONDAY, JULY 7.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

PRIVILEGE—TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) BILL—REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE— Moved , “That the Report be taken into consideration To-morrow at Two o'clock,”—(Lord Henry Lennox) ..	1711
Motion agreed to .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 7.]

Page

QUESTIONS.

COMMITTEE ON SERVICE OF OFFICERS UNDER AGE — Question, Colonel Arbuthnot; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1711
TREATY OF COMMERCE, 1873—FRENCH DUTY ON MINERAL OILS—Question, Mr. W. Holms; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1711
INLAND NAVIGATION SYSTEM (NORTH OF IRELAND)—Question, Sir Thomas M'Clure; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1712
INDIAN NATIVE TROOPS—COST OF CONVEYANCE TO EUROPE—Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1712
TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE IX—RASURE OF THE FORTRESSES—Question, Mr. C. Beckett-Denison; Answer, Mr. Bourke	1713
ISLAND OF CYPRUS—HEALTH OF THE TROOPS—Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1713
INDIA — ILLEGAL LOTTERIES IN RACING SWEEPS — Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	1714
THE HERRING TRADE (SCOTLAND)—BRANDS — Question, Mr. Grant Duff; Answer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson	1715
BANKING AND JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL—Question, Colonel Ormerod Walker; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1715
ARMY—THE 7TH DRAGOON GUARDS — BILLETING — Question, Sir Arthur Hayter; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1716
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—COOTEHILL UNION—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1716
GRAND JURIES (IRELAND)—COUNTY DOWN GRAND JURY — Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1717
METROPOLIS—METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS AND THE NEW STREET FROM CHARING CROSS TO TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD—Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg	1718
THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—Question, Sir William Fraser; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1718
INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—THE FIVE PER CENT LOAN — Question, Sir Charles Mills; Answer, Mr. E. Stanhope	1719
LICENCES (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. B. Whitworth; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland	1719
GRAND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Sir Thomas M'Clure; Answer, Mr. J. Lowther	1720
SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—PEACE NEGOTIATIONS — LATEST TELEGRAM—Questions, Mr. Richard, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Sullivan, Mr. Courtney; Answers, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1720
DISTURBANCES IN CONNEMARA (CLIFDEN)—Questions, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Sullivan; Answers, Mr. J. Lowther	1721
ARMY—PASSAGE MONEY OF OFFICERS—Question, Major O'Gorman; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1722
ARMY — THE AUXILIARY FORCES — THE VOLUNTEERS — Question, Mr. Leighton; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1723
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—THE "NAVY CAT"—Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Mr. W. H. Smith	1723
ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—FLOGGING—Question, Mr. Milbank; Answer, Colonel Stanley	1724
NAVY—ADMIRALTY—PURCHASE OF HAY—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. A. F. Egerton	1725
SOUTH AFRICA — THE ZULU WAR — ALLEGED CRUELITIES—Questions, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answers, Colonel Stanley, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach	1726
CRIMINAL LAW—THE EUSTON SQUARE MURDER—Question, Sir William Fraser; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross	1727
PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—NOTE-TAKING IN MEMBERS' SIDE GALLERY — Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1727

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 7.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 5th July] 1728
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again
To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Charity (Expenses and Accounts) (No. 2) Bill [Bill 230]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) 1821
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LORD CLERK REGISTER (SCOTLAND) [SALARY AND PENSION]—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the Salary of the Deputy Clerk Register of Scotland, and of a Retiring Allowance to William Pitt Dundas, esquire, which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to make provision in regard to the Office of Lord Clerk Register of Scotland; and for other purposes.
Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Trustees Relief Bill [Bill 145]—

Second Reading deferred till Monday next 1822
[House counted out.]

LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 8.

Tramways Orders Confirmation Bill (No. 135)—

Moved, That the Order of the 4th of March last which limits the time for the Second Reading of Provisional Order Confirmation Bills be dispensed with with respect to the said Bill, and that the Bill be now read a second time,—(The Lord Henniker) .. 1822
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed: The Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

University Education (Ireland) Bill (No. 134)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Lord Chancellor) .. 1823
After debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 8.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE QUEEN V. CASTRO—THE CONVICT ORTON—Question,
Dr. Kenealy; Answer, Mr. Assheton Cross 1863

PUBLIC LOANS REMISSION BILL—INTEREST UNPAID—Question, Mr. Dodson; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer 1863

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL — FLOGGING — Questions, Mr.
Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir Henry James; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Assheton Cross, Colonel Stanley .. 1864

EXHIBITION OF ZULUS—Questions, Mr. E. Jenkins, Mr. Callan; Answers,
Mr. Assheton Cross 1865

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 8.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRIVATE BILLS (GROUP A)—TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) BILL—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—

Moved, "That the Special Report of the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill be now considered,"—(Lord Henry Lennox) .. 1866

After short debate, Moved, "That Mr. Charles Grissell do attend this House To-morrow, at Twelve of the clock,"—(Mr. Callan.)

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Special Report from the Committee on Group A of Private Bills be referred to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)—instead thereof.

After further short debate, Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Army Discipline and Regulation Bill [Bill 88]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 7th July] .. 1887

After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

MINISTER OF COMMERCE AND AGRICULTURE—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That it is desirable that those functions of the Executive Government which especially relate to Commerce and Agriculture should be administered by a distinct Department, under the direction of a Principal Secretary of State, who shall be a Member of the Cabinet,"—(Mr. Sampson Lloyd) .. 1919

After debate, Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words "under the direction of a Principal Secretary of State, who shall be a Member of the Cabinet,"—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After further short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 71, Noes 65; Majority 6.—(Div. List, No. 154.)

Main Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 76, Noes 56; Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 155.)

Resolved, That it is desirable that those functions of the Executive Government which especially relate to Commerce and Agriculture should be administered by a distinct Department, under the direction of a Principal Secretary of State, who shall be a Member of the Cabinet.

Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill—Ordered (Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth); presented, and read the first time [Bill 239] .. 1955

Commons Act (1876) Amendment (No. 2) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Mundella, Mr. Walpole, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Sir Henry Peek); presented, and read the first time [Bill 240] 1955

Saint Giles Cathedral (Edinburgh) Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented, and read the first time [Bill 238] .. 1955

Channel Islands (Applicability of Acts) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Solicitor General); presented, and read the first time [Bill 287] .. 1955

Occupation Roads Bill—Ordered (Mr. Pell, Sir Thomas Acland, Mr. Rodwell); presented, and read the first time [Bill 241] .. 1955

Industrial Schools (Powers of School Boards) Bill—Ordered (Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross); presented, and read the first time [Bill 242] .. 1956

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 9.

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:O:—

PRIVATE BILLS (GROUP A)—TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS)

BILL—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE—

Moved, “That Mr. Walpole be a Member of the Committee,”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) 1956

After short debate, Motion agreed to.

Mr. Dodson, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Gray, and Mr. Pemberton nominated other Members of the Committee.

Moved, “That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records,”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer :)—After short debate, Motion agreed to.

Moved, “That it be an Instruction to the said Committee that it be an open Committee,”—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

[The Motion, not being seconded, could not be put.]

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill [Bill 20]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Stevenson) .. 1970

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months,”—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question :”

—After debate, Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr.

Monk :)—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 165, Noes 162;

Majority 3.—(Div. List, No. 156):—Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

COMMONS.

TOOK THE OATH.

THURSDAY, JULY 3, 1879.

The Lord Bishop of Durham, for the first time.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 9.

For Glasgow, v. Alexander Whitelaw, esquire, deceased.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SIXTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 MARCH, 1874, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 5 DECEMBER, 1878, IN THE FORTY-SECOND YEAR OF
THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FIFTH VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 17th June, 1879.

RACECOURSES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

(The Viscount Enfield.)

(NO. 45.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—

Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment* (115); Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common)* (107); Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons)* (109); Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common)* (108); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford)* (112); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.)* (111); Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton-by-Rochdale, &c.)* (114); Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.)* (113); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.)* (110).

Committee—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment (83); Supply of Drink on Credit* (84); Children's Dangerous Performances* (64).

Committee—Report—Racecourses (Metropolis) (45); Omnibus Regulation (re-comm.) (41-117).

Third Reading—Costs Taxation (House of Commons)* (99), and passed.

EARL MANVERS said, that, as their Lordships were aware, he was not in the habit of trespassing upon their attention; but before they proceeded to consider the measure in Committee he wished to be allowed to say a few words. The Bill, in his (Earl Manvers') opinion, had been introduced by the noble Viscount (Viscount Enfield) with great moderation and ability, and it was not brought forward before it was required; for he believed that the small race meetings, against which it was levied, were a great evil, demoralizing to the Metropolis, demoralizing to the suburbs, and an unmitigated nuisance to all of the better class of people who resided in their vicinity. Notwithstanding that the meetings might be an advantage to a few publicans whom, as a class, he had no wish to disparage, he thought the consideration of their interests was hardly sufficient reason for the continuance of that which was a nuisance. The majority of those who attended these meetings did not know one horse from another; and if any noble Lord were to get up and say that they were calculated to improve the breed of racehorses, he could only say that he should be surprised. The noble Lord on his left who moved the rejection of the Bill, and who bore a highly respected judicial name in that House (Lord St. Leonards), told them something about vested interests, and declared that people might just as well complain of railways being a nuisance on account of the traffic and the number of travellers they brought into a neighbourhood as the sufferers from these gate meetings. Well, he (Earl Manvers) disputed that analogy altogether. Railways, it must be remembered, were made for the convenience of the whole travelling public, and where there were cases of residential injury compensation could be obtained; but no one ever heard of compensation being given through residential injury owing to these gate-meetings, by their proprietors. The noble Duke the Lord President of the Council had told them how great were the powers of the Jockey Club. He had said, moreover, that they had gone so far as to exercise their powers in the case of the race meeting at West Drayton. He (Earl Manvers) rejoiced that they had exercised those powers, and he would tell their Lordships why. Some years ago, on a very hot summer's afternoon, he was travelling from Windsor. He had taken his seat in a first-class compartment, of which he was the sole occupant, and he was congratulating himself, as it was a very hot day, on being alone, and on the pleasant journey he should have, all unconscious of the fact that it was the day of West Drayton races. The train he was in called at that station only, and on reaching it, the door of the compartment was opened, and in rushed 12 persons to occupy the seven vacant seats, without the slightest attempt at interference on the part of the railway officials. He should be sorry to characterize harshly any of his fellow-creatures; suffice it to say, therefore, that his fellow-travellers were not to be reckoned amongst the most refined of the human race. They were vinous, they were spirituous, and their language was neither classical, nor Parliamentary; but as they did not relieve him of his watch he had nothing further to say against them. From all that he had heard he had no reason to suppose that the frequenters of Kingsbury and Alexandra Park were at all more civilized than the persons he had just described, and of whom he had had such an unenjoyable experience. He thought their Lordships had heard of this Bill before, or of one very like it; and, unless he was much mistaken, the old one had been withdrawn on a sort of understanding that the matter should be taken up by the Jockey Club. That august body, however, evidently had had very important matters to deal with, for it had not found time, or had not had the inclination, to deal with the matter. They had been told that the police could put down these meetings, if ill conducted; but did they ever hear of the police interfering except in the case of a regular free fight taking place? Perhaps it was right that the police did not interfere, for if they did it was possible that they might exceed their duty. Since, therefore, neither the Jockey Club nor Her Majesty's Government were willing to take up the matter, he thought that all those who agreed with his noble Friend (Viscount Enfield) would rejoice that the Bill had passed a second reading, and would cordially co-operate with him in endeavouring to increase rather than impair its efficiency in Committee.

Earl Manvers.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE regretted that he was not present when the Bill passed a second reading; but he hoped the House would lend him its indulgence for a few moments whilst he made an observation or two on the measure. Perhaps no one had more right to address a few words to their Lordships on a Bill of this nature than he had, for it was only six months ago that he relinquished the position he had held as a steward of the Jockey Club. He was rather astonished, on reading over the observations of the noble Viscount who moved the second reading (Viscount Enfield), to see the various reflections he had cast upon the executive powers of the Jockey Club. His noble Friend who had just addressed them hinted that the Jockey Club was not a strong enough body to perform the duties that it had to discharge. He believed, however, that the Jockey Club was perfectly well able to deal with all matters connected with racing without Acts of Parliament, which were really fancy legislation. During the whole of the time he had been in Parliament he could safely say that he had never known either House consent to pass any Act that was not really called for by the desires of the people or the interests of the country. This Bill, which had been brought up from the House of Commons, never seemed to him to have received the discussion in the Lower House which it ought to have received. The House of Commons treated it rather as a joke, and they might well do so, because if it was such a necessity, and if it was called for to remove such crying evils, how was it that on no single occasion had the Jockey Club received any petition on the subject? No single individual had ever made a representation to them about it. Gate meetings were, as their Lordships were aware, becoming a very considerable mercantile business, and the interest in the business was by no means strictly confined to publicans or to sinners; because he knew perfectly well that some most respectable and monied gentlemen in the country had, in the belief that they conferred considerable benefits upon racing in the country, and that they promoted legitimate sport, identified themselves with gate meetings. He doubted, if they analyzed them, whether they would not find that nearly all the meetings—Royal Ascot and Ducal Goodwood amongst them—resolved themselves into some emolument, which, in some form or another, was for the benefit of individuals or for the benefit of racing. These small Metropolitan meetings would die, or had died, a natural death. They were meetings which were got up by individuals for the purpose of making money; and in the case of Kingsbury and West Drayton, Streatham and the Alexandra Park—which meeting had been resuscitated, after having been stopped—all the meetings were at an end. Some two years ago the Jockey Club made remonstrances as to the way in which the Kingsbury and West Drayton Meetings were conducted. They said that a sufficient body of police should be employed before they could give countenance to such meetings. On the understanding that these meetings were not looked upon favourably by the Governing Body of the Turf, they fell into disrepute, and were now, he believed, done away with. He objected to the Bill, not because it sought to remedy evils to individuals or to the public, but on the ground that it was a Bill quite contrary to the general principle of legislation. If they were to take up in Parliament the question of racecourses, he considered they ought to do it with regard to the whole of England. There were large meetings at Liverpool, Manchester, York, and other places, and it would astonish their Lordships if he were to tell them the numbers of people who attended those meetings. Why did not the people of Manchester, if they objected to the race meetings, petition against them? The area of the Bill was so limited that it would only deal with the race meeting at Alexandra Park. If they wanted to make it of any value, they should apply it to every race meeting—to the whole of England. He would rather see it made to apply to every racecourse in the Kingdom, than that they should stultify themselves by passing fancy legislation. He must say that the noble Viscount who had moved the second reading of the Bill (Viscount Enfield) had shown an amount of ignorance on the subject that would lead one to believe that he had not attended a single race meeting since his father took such an important part in racing. The noble Viscount wished them to believe that the Jockey Club was so effete that they were in utter ignorance of their own duties. He could tell the noble Viscount, though he perhaps could not agree with him, that the amount of work the Jockey Club did in its own quiet way was very considerable, and that it was such a power in England that when its decisions were given they were never brought into disrepute. The noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack (Earl Cairns), in the high position he held in the Legal Profession, would be exceedingly glad if all the decisions given by him on the Bench, of which he was so great an ornament, were received by the general public with equal approval. If they wished to strengthen a body which was upheld by the public, they would not seek to legislate in Parliament for that which the Jockey Club could do unaided.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 (Definitions) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Horse-races unlawful within 10 miles of London unless licensed) agreed to.

Clause 3 (Power of justices to license at Michaelmas Quarter Sessions).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON desired to say a few words with respect to the principle of an Amendment which he would place upon the Paper to this clause. He might, however, say that the noble Earl (Earl Manvers) who had first addressed them seemed to have taken a very strange view of the stage of the Bill at which they had now arrived, and had given their Lordships a number of details with respect to the inconvenience which he had experienced in railway travelling, which it was by no means necessary now to enter into. Their Lordships had on a previous occasion decided that race meetings should not take place within 10 miles of Charing Cross without being licensed by the magistrates in Quarter Sessions assembled. Although he had opposed the Bill, he accepted the principle which had been laid down upon the second reading—namely, that all race meetings which took place within 10 miles of Charing Cross must be licensed by the magistrates. He hoped he need hardly say that, although he had opposed the second reading, he did not sympathize with gate-money meetings. He believed them to be very injurious to racing, and he believed no one would wish to uphold, or in any way encourage, such meetings. But he also believed that in introducing this Bill, and bringing forward what he considered to be a remedy against the evils of these gate-money meetings, the noble Viscount (Viscount Enfield) had included within the provisions of the Bill other race meetings which might be of a totally different character to the gate meetings which he sought to suppress. The principle of the Bill, however, having been conceded that these meetings must be licensed by the magistrates in Quarter Sessions, he was placed in this great difficulty—that the noble Viscount, in moving the second reading of the Bill, did not vouchsafe to explain its provisions. The noble Viscount confined his remarks very much to abuse of the Jockey Club, and entirely omitted to tell their Lordships how the provisions of the Bill would carry out the objects which he had in view, or the reasons why several of the clauses contained in the measure had been introduced. The effect of the 3rd clause was that the licences should be granted at any Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the Peace. He wanted to know why the licences should only be granted at the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions? He thought that if that were done, it would cause very considerable annoyance to persons who were desirous of holding a legitimate race meeting, and not a gate meeting, within 10 miles of Charing Cross. If any persons desired to have a race meeting they would have to wait until the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions, and then the licence would not have effect until the following Lady Day. He certainly could not understand the reason of this. He could not see any reason why the licence should not take effect immediately after it was granted. If the noble Viscount had asked for a fortnight or a month's notice before the application, he could have understood it; but to say that after a licence had been granted to the persons applying they should not be allowed to hold a meeting until six months after, he could not understand. It might be that race meetings might be got up which were quite of another character to gate meetings—say, for instance, by the Household Brigade, which was quartered in London. If the Household Brigade wanted to hold a race meeting amongst themselves, where no liquor would be consumed except what they took down in their hampers, they must make up their minds—according to the Bill of the noble Viscount—to do so before the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions, and then they could not hold it until no less a period than six months had expired. He maintained that that was putting an excessive and undesirable restraint. He did not object to licences being granted by the magistrates; but he wished to point out that magistrates were magistrates at all the Quarter Sessions which were held during the year. His proposal, therefore, was to strike out the word “Michaelmas,” which would have the effect of giving power to the magistrates to grant licences at any of the Quarter Sessions held throughout the year; and he should certainly take the sense of the Committee upon it if the noble Viscount could not see his way to accept it.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("Michaelmas.")—(The Lord President.)

VISCOUNT ENFIELD was sorry he could not agree to the Amendment which had been moved by the noble Duke. This Bill was not intended to put down absolutely any race meetings which might take place within 10 miles of Charing Cross, supposing licences were granted by the magistrates; but it was desired by the promoters of the measure to give the public some assurance that there would be good order, sobriety, and regularity at those meetings. The Michaelmas Quarter Sessions had been named in order to make the Bill similar in the time of granting licences to the Act regulating the granting of licences for music and dancing, and two month's notice was required of the intention to apply for a licence, in order to give the public an opportunity of making objection, either by themselves or by counsel. Clause 4 went together with Clause 3, and as Middlesex and Surrey were the two counties within 10 miles of Charing Cross where race meetings took place—for he believed there were no race meetings in Essex—he thought it right that the licensing of music, dancing, and racing, should all be placed on the same footing within the Metropolitan area. Under these circumstances, he must ask their Lordships to adhere to the present wording of the clause.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON thought the noble Viscount argued as if all race meetings were gate meetings. He objected to race meetings got up by the Household Brigade, and others in the same high category, being considered as gate meetings. Music and dancing licences were granted, too, for a whole year, and he thought the noble Viscount must have forgotten that fact. The noble Viscount said there were no race meetings in Essex. That was very likely at present. If publicity was what the noble Viscount desired, it could be obtained by other means than those which the noble Viscount had provided. The noble Viscount would also do well, when they came to it, to explain what he meant by Clause 4.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he assumed a somewhat different position to that of his noble Friend who had just spoken. He thought his noble Friend was opposed to the Bill altogether; but, on the contrary, it seemed to him (the Lord Chancellor) that it was a Bill which deserved support, and he had voted for its second reading. But he was bound to say that he thought his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill (Viscount Enfield) would act wisely in re-considering this question as to the days for licensing. Those who prepared the Bill appeared to have been led away by the Statute of Geo. II. with regard to licences for music and dancing. In the cases of licences for music and dancing, it was right that the public should have a proper notice—a fortnight's notice—in order to be able to appear before the Quarter Sessions to oppose them. He could not help thinking that the noble Viscount had mistaken the sense of the Statute of Geo. II. The Act of Geo. II. required no notice whatever. The notice was simply a regulation made by the Quarter Sessions; and it would be perfectly competent for the Court of Quarter Sessions, even if the word proposed to be omitted was left out, to make a rule as to a certain amount of notice being given, so that any member of the public who wished to oppose the granting of a licence might have full opportunity of doing so. Unlike halls for music and dancing, race meetings were not places of continuous amusement; and, therefore, the arguments applicable to the former had no force in reference to the latter. Provided proper notice was given and no march stolen on the public, why should a licence not be granted at Whitsuntide, for instance, as well as Michaelmas, and take effect immediately it was obtained? He hoped the noble Viscount would see the propriety of leaving the question of notice to the magistrates.

LORD ABERDARE said, the noble Viscount's only object was due publicity. If licences for race meetings were given at the time when the other licences for places of amusements were granted, they would have some security that a large amount of public attention would be directed to them. If, on the contrary, they were given at any Quarter Sessions, there would not be the same security for publicity. Some of the races at which the Bill was aimed were run several times in the course of the year.

If officers of the Household Brigade wished to hold race meetings, there would be nothing to prevent them taking out a licence from year to year, or if they had not a licence, and wished to hold a race meeting at once, there was nothing easier for them than to go beyond the ten-mile limit.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE pointed out that the most valuable stakes were those in which the entries were made some two years before the race, and the present Bill would make the period of the future race dependent upon the will and pleasure of the magistrates. If the Bill were to become law, he should prefer that licences were to be granted at one fixed Quarter Sessions, instead of at any of the four held throughout the year. If two right rev. Prelates, or a couple of Judges, now in favour of this Bill, were to ride along Rotten Row, and test the respective qualities of their horses in a gallop, they might unexpectedly find themselves within its provisions and subject to its penalties.

EARL GRANVILLE opposed the Amendment. The Bill had been passed by the House of Commons, and been approved of by both the Home Secretary and the Lord Chancellor. That being the case, it was not desirable to risk the passage of the measure when it went back to the other House by the introduction of any material Amendments, especially as it was one which was in private hands.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, if they once admitted the principle of magisterial licence, they would have to extend it to all manner of amusements in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis, to the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race, the Eton and Harrow cricket matches, and similar amusements, for they all tended to collect crowds, and were, no doubt, considered nuisances by some people.

On Question, That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 88; Not-Contents 57: Majority 31.

CONTENTS.

Canterbury, L. Archp. Albemarle, E.
Bedford, D. Annesley, E.
Devonshire, D. Beauchamp, E.
Bristol, M. Belmore, E.
Lansdowne, M. Camperdown, E.
Northampton, M. Carnarvon, E.
Coventry, E.
Cowper, E.

Lord Aberdare

De La Warr, E.
Devon, E.
Ducie, E.
Fortescue, E.
Granville, E.
Grey, E.
Hardwicke, E.
Harewood, E.
Harrowby, E.
Jersey, E.
Kimberley, E.
Lovelace, E.
Lucan, E.
Malmesbury, E.
Manvers, E.
Morley, E.
Powis, E.
Shaftesbury, E.
Stanhope, E.
Stradbroke, E.
Strafford, E.
Sydney, E.
Waldegrave, E.
Wharcliffe, E.

Cardwell, V.
Hardinge, V.
Portman, V.
Powerscourt, V.
Carlisle, L. Bp.
Hereford, L. Bp.
London, L. Bp.
Winchester, L. Bp.

Aberdare, L. [Teller.]
Airey, L.
Balfour of Burleigh, L.
Bateman, L.
Belper, L.
Blachford, L.
Blantyre, L.
Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.)
Brodrick, L. (F. Middleton.)

Clements, L. (E. Leitrim.)
Crewe, L.
De Mauley, L.
Ebury, L.
Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.)
Emly, L.
Greville, L.
Hammond, L.
Harlech, L.
Hartismere, L. (L. Hen-niker.)
Houghton, L.
Kenry, L. (E. Dun-raven and Mount-Earl.)
Leigh, L.
Lyttelton, L.
Lyveden, L.
Monson, L.
Mostyn, L.
O'Hagan, L.
Penrhyn, L.
Rivers, L.
Salterford, L. (E. Cour-tain.)
Sherborne, L.
Silchester, L. (E. Long-ford.)
Somerton, L. (E. Nor-manton.)
Stanley of Alderley, L.
Strafford, L. (F. En-field.) [Teller.]
Stratheden and Camp-bell, L.
Strathapey, L. (E. Sea-field.)
Sudley, L.
Turo, L.
Wenlock, L.
Wolverton, L.
Zouche of Haryng-worth, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Cairns, E. (J. Chan-celler.)
Northumberland, D.
Richmond, D.
Salisbury, M.
Airlie, E.
Amberst, E.
Bathurst, E.
Beaconsfield, E.
Bradford, E.
Cadogan, E.
Clonmell, E.
Durham, E.
Ellesmere, E.
Mar and Kellie, E.
Nelson, E.
Redesdale, E.
Romney, E.
Rosslyn, E.
Saint Germans, E.
Selkirk, E.
Strathmore and King-horn, E.
Vane, E. (M. London-derry.)
Wilton, E.
Zetland, E.
Bolingbroke and St. John, V.
Clancarty, V. (E. Clan-carty.)
Cranbrook, V.
Hawarden, V.
Bagot, L.
Bolton, L.
Castlemaine, L.
Clanbrassill, L. (E. Roden.)
Colchester, L.
de Ros, L.
Dorchester, L.
Dunsandle and Clan-conal, L.
Ellenborough, L.
Gerard, L.
Gordon of Drumsarn, L.

Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)	Norton, L.
Grey de Radcliffe, L. (V. Grey de Wilton.)	Oranmore and Browne, L.
[Teller.]	Ribblesdale, L.
Hampton, L.	Sandhurst, L.
Hanmer, L.	Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
Howard de Walden, L.	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Inchiquin, L.	Vivian, L.
Meldrum, L. (M. Huntly.) [Teller.]	Walsingham, L.
Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)	Windsor, L.
	Winmarleigh, L.

Resolved in the Negative.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to, without Amendment.

Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^d on Friday next.

VALUATION OF LANDS (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 83.)

(The Earl of Galloway.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE begged to ask the noble Earl who had charge of this measure, whether he had any objection to setting forth the objects of the Bill? Such a proceeding was the more necessary, because no statement of its objects was made on the second reading.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he had no objection to comply with the desire of the noble Earl—especially as some serious Amendments had been placed upon the Paper. The object of the Bill was to introduce certain amendments into the law relating to the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland. As many of their Lordships were aware, there were various bodies in Scotland known as Commissioners of Supply. Now, it had been found extremely inconvenient that so large a number of persons as the general body of Commissioners of Supply for each county should be called upon to sit for the purpose of hearing appeal cases; and the principal object of that Bill was that the Commissioners of Supply of each county should themselves form out of their own body a Committee—to be called the County Valuation Committee—to whom should be delegated the same powers as the whole body at present had. That was the real object of the measure; but it also provided for what were called “misnomers,” and provided an easy way of rectifying such misnomers. It further provided that, in case any person should feel aggrieved at his assessment, when made by persons who were not officers of Inland Revenue, and an appeal from their judgment might be brought before the Commissioners of Supply, there should be a further power of appeal to any two Judges of the Court of Session. Where the assessor was an officer of the Inland Revenue no appeal was allowed. The remaining part of the Bill was merely formal. It gave power to Commissioners of Supply by a majority of two-thirds of their number at any time to alter the place of meeting. These were the provisions of the measure. He hoped that the explanation he had given would satisfy his noble Friend, and that they would now proceed with the Committee upon the Bill.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, the noble Earl who introduced this Bill had explained that its main provision was that, inasmuch as the whole body of Commissioners of Supply amounted to an inconvenient number, they should elect among themselves a smaller number. That did not seem a very logical proceeding, neither did he see any reason why all the owners of land in the counties should be compelled, whether they willed it or not, to submit a valuation of their land to a Committee simply of the Commissioners of Supply. For his own part, he should think that that was a question of which the whole body of Commissioners themselves were the best judges.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, that if the Commissioners chose to sit as a whole body to the number of 20 for the purpose of investigation, instead of appointing from their body a smaller Committee for the purpose of hearing any appeal, there was power to do so.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that he should prefer to see the introduction of the word “shall,” so as to make it compulsory on the Commissioners, in the first place, to investigate the case; but he had no wish to prevent the progress of the Bill in Committee.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Evidence to be taken if required).

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, he had given Notice of his intention to move the omission of two clauses in this Bill—namely, the 8th and 9th; and, inasmuch as the question involved in both clauses was the same, it would be the most convenient course to move the rejection of both at the same time. Many of their Lordships were probably aware that, by an Act which was passed in the 17th and 18th years of the Queen, and which was amended by an Act passed three years afterwards, power was given to the Commissioners of Supply in burghs and counties to appoint such assessors and valuers as might be thought necessary; and a power was given to appeal from their decision to the Commissioners of Supply, and from the Commissioners of Supply to a Judge of the Court of Session. Now, the object of the 7th clause of the present Bill was to extend the right of appeal to all cases in which the assessors were not officers of the Inland Revenue. It was also provided that the appeal should be to two Judges, which he did not think was necessary; but he did not wish to raise any unnecessary objection to a measure which he thought would, in the main, prove a very useful one; and he did not think it mattered much whether the appeal went to one Judge or two. Clause 8 provided that if either party to any appeal or complaint to the Commissioners of Supply of any county, or the magistrates of any burgh, required at the hearing of any appeal or complaint that the evidence should be taken down in writing, it should be so taken. That was not the course at present pursued in all cases. He was not a sufficient lawyer to say whether the word “writing” would include “shorthand;” but, if not, he conceived that to take it all down in ordinary writing would be a very cumbrous mode of proceeding in these days of rapid progress, and he thought it would be incurring a very unnecessary expense. He had yet to learn that any dissatisfaction had been expressed with the present system. He thought, moreover, that the 9th clause, which required that in stating any case the grounds of complaint and the replies should be set forth, in addition to the particulars required by the Bill, very objectionable. It made appeals much more cumbrous and expensive. It would make more work for the lawyers; but he had great diffidence in using that argument in their Lordship’s House; but at any rate he did not think they should go out of their way to make more work than was absolutely necessary for members of that Profession. He thought, also, that if this new method of stating cases for appeal, as provided by Clause 9, was adopted, the duties of the Commissioners of Supply would become very onerous, and there would be a difficulty in getting gentlemen to sit on the appeals. It must be remembered that the Commissioners of Supply were not a body of salaried officers, but a body of private gentlemen unpaid, and it would be impossible to induce them to spend a large portion of their time in hearing the long discussions which would be likely to arise under these clauses. It would probably be replied that it was only necessary to take the evidence in writing in certain cases; but he ventured to think, if they read Clause 9 carefully, it would be found to be necessary to take evidence in writing in every case—and for the reason that if they went to the Court of Session the case stated must contain the evidence, and if none was taken there could be no case stated. In his mind, to require the evidence to be taken in writing was virtually pre-judging the case; because, if before the case was begun to be heard one party requested that the evidence should be taken down in writing, it showed that he meant to be dissatisfied with the finding of the Commissioners. Again, he did not think that there should be an appeal given in the case where the assessor was not an Inland Revenue officer, and not in cases where he was; and he might point out that in no less than 10 counties in Scotland the assessors were not officers of the Inland Revenue; neither were they in 45 burghs, including Ayr, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Greenock, Perth, Galashiels, Arbroath, and Stirling—these burghs included some of the largest and most populous towns in Scotland. He had, he thought, shown their Lordships that these clauses were not only unnecessary, but objectionable; but there was a further point—namely, the history of these clauses, and the manner in which they came to be inserted in the Bill. The noble Earl might possibly tell them that several counties and burghs had petitioned in favour of the Bill. So they had; but when they did so these clauses were not in the Bill. These clauses, in fact, had not yet been discussed. The Bill came up to their Lordships as having passed all its stages in "another place;" but, as a matter of fact, they were never discussed at all. These two clauses were only inserted in the last stage of the progress of the Bill, and he ventured to say that very few conveners of counties or magistrates of burghs knew of their existence; and, most certainly, no opportunity had been given to them to consider the nature of the clauses, or how they would affect the valuation of lands. He, therefore, begged to move that Clause 8 be omitted from the Bill.

Lord Balfour of Burleigh

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he must confess he was not prepared to hear such an elaborate argument from his noble Friend. He had not the slightest objection to take Clauses 8 and 9 together; but he was afraid that he could not accept the proposition to strike out Clause 8. The noble Lord objected to there being any distinction between the position of the Inland Revenue officers and other assessors; but he might remind his noble Friend that in the case of the 10 counties referred to, no such objection came from nine, and none from the burghs. The Bill had been introduced before Whitsuntide, and was read a second time three weeks ago, and before that time—indeed, before the Bill had left the other House of Parliament—these two clauses had been put in, and he had put off the Committee till now that there might be ample time for anyone to object to them; and yet only one county, that of Ayr, had objected. As a matter of fact, the two clauses were put in at the instigation of the Lord Advocate, who considered that inasmuch as there were many large manufacturers interested in this question of land valuation, and who might conceive that the judgment of the assessors was wrong, though they would probably find themselves mistaken, they would have a right to pay for their own protection, and it would be impossible for the Court of Appeal to judge of the merits of the case unless it had the written evidence thus before it. He thought it would be for the benefit of all classes that these two clauses should be retained. Then, again, with regard to the Commissioners of Supply, as he had already told their Lordships, the object of the Bill was to reduce the number of the Commissioners to a Committee; and he did not see any reason to doubt that such a proceeding would be beneficial. On these grounds, he opposed the omission of these two clauses.

On Question? Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Case to set forth grounds of appeal, &c.) agreed to.

Clause 10 (Place of meeting of Commissioners of Supply may be changed).

THE EARL OF SELKIRK said, there were several objections to this clause. He thought that if it was expedient to do this in any particular case, it could be best effected by a private local Bill, and not by this general measure.

LORD BLANTYRE supported the clause.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he did not feel very strongly upon the point, as he was not the original promoter of the Bill. He would, however, remind their Lordships that by the clause in question power was put into the hands of the Commissioners themselves, and that it was only by their strongly-expressed wish, and a vote of two-thirds of their number present, that their place of meeting could be removed. He had not had any communication on the subject from the promoters of the Bill; but if there was any strongly expressed wish upon the subject, he would withdraw the clause.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK objected to the clause. In the first place, the place of meeting might be shifted at the mere caprice of the Commissioners; and, in the second place, it was well known that in some counties these meetings of the Commissioners were held, if not simultaneously, in rapid succession—in fact, he had known five meetings to be held in five days—and the greatest confusion would take place, unless there was a certainty as to the place in which the meetings were to be held. These meetings of Supply were somewhat analogous to the Quarter Sessions of England, and they were generally held at the county towns; and very great inconvenience would be caused if the venue of the meeting were shifted to another town 10 miles distant. In many cases, also, they were held subject to private local Acts, and no great good could be gained by shifting, unless it was from an inconvenient place to a county town. In other cases it might be inconvenient to change them from such a place as Lanark to the great metropolis of the West of Scotland.

Clause struck out accordingly.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

OMNIBUS REGULATION BILL.—(No. 41.)

(The Earl of Redesdale.)

COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT).

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee (on re-commitment), read.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, in deference to the wish of the Government, he had taken out of the Bill everything relating to the Metropolis, which was to be provided for by another Bill introduced on this subject by his noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp). He had also taken out of the Bill those parts open to objection on the ground that they interfered with local Acts. It would also be provided that the Bill would come into operation on the 1st of January next.

House in Committee accordingly.

Bill reported without Amendment; Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^a on Friday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 117.)

CYPRUS — ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—PUNISHMENT OF PRIESTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, there had been several statements in the public prints that two priests imprisoned in Cyprus had been deprived of their beards. After reading the Blue Book just issued respecting the government of Cyprus, he should be inclined to disbelieve those statements; but, on the other hand, some time had elapsed since they were made, and they had not yet been contradicted on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. But even should those statements now receive an unqualified contradiction, it would not be a waste of the time of the House to place before it those considerations which should prevent the possibility of the occurrence which had been complained of, or of the introduction of English prison regulations into Cyprus. The case of these priests was a very painful one; or, as that word had recently been misused, and might be misleading—it was one of grievous hardship. If an individual were to deprive a priest of his beard, it would be a serious outrage, and it would prevent his officiating until it had grown again. At the time when the Bulgarians were intriguing against the Prelates of the Greek race, it was reported that one of these was got rid of by advantage being taken of his sleep to deprive him of his beard, after which, being unable to show himself in public in his diocese, he had to escape from it and go home. But when priests were deprived of their beards, as in this case, by the act of the civil authorities, it became a usurpation of ecclesiastical rights reserved to the Patriarchs. This was probably done by some subordinate official, in ignorance that its consequence was to degrade the priest, and to incapacitate him from fulfilling his holy office. This could not be done under the Turkish law, which, from the last Blue Book, we appeared to be still administering. But the noble Marquess could not plead ignorance, for this matter was brought before him when he was at the India Office, and a Jacobite Patriarch, who was going to India, came to see him and showed him his berat or charter, which gave him the right in Turkey to imprison and shave recalcitrant priests. This must have happened about the time that the Public Worship Act was passing; and the noble Marquess would, perhaps, recollect it, when he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) reminded him that the interpreter of the Patriarch made some observation or calculation as to the number of barbers that would have to be kept at Lambeth Palace, if the most rev. Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury had the same powers over recalcitrant priests as were possessed by his brothers of the Oriental Churches. It did not appear that this form of degradation of priests was ever followed in the Western Church; but, in the year 767, the Patriarch Constantine of Constantinople was deposed, degraded, and executed, and he was degraded by shaving his head, beard, and eye-brows. He (Lord Stanley of Alderley) must now say a few words for the laymen. Lay Christians did not wear beards, unless they were old men, or were in the Ottoman Service; but if they shaved the moustaches of the lay Christians, it would be putting an odious imputation on them. The beards of the Mussulmans must not be meddled with. There was an anecdote which well set forth the feeling on this subject; but as he did not wish to treat this subject otherwise than very seriously, he must refer their Lordships for it to the pages of Ibn Batoutah, the Arab Herodotus. Some time ago, but he did not exactly know when or where, in England, some playactors were sentenced by the magistrates to a short imprisonment, and were shaved; and as that interfered with their means of gaining their livelihood it caused great agitation, for the law did not allow of any greater hardship being inflicted on a prisoner than that which was contained in the actual sentence. English prison regulations were not in force in India; and, in the prisons in India, care was taken that the food of the Brahmin prisoners was cooked by cooks able to prepare their food. He thought, therefore, that an apology ought to be made to these priests for what they had suffered.

The Earl of Selkirk

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Those priests were deprived of their beards, so far as I can understand the matter, not in consequence of any firman or any decree of any Eastern or Western Council, but in accordance with the English prison regulations which have been introduced by Ordinance into the Island. I am compelled, however, to admit that there was an irregularity in the case, because, by the regulations of the prison, as they have been laid down, the hair ought only to have been removed in the case of a considerable period of imprisonment; and in the case of these particular priests, who were imprisoned for short periods, and for offences comparatively trivial, there was no justification, under the prison regulations, for depriving them of their beards. It was a misapprehension on the part of the Assistant Commissioner, of which notice had been taken, and in regard to which the High Commissioner, Colonel Greaves, had taken steps to prevent any such error occurring again. But I am unable to agree with the noble Lord in thinking that prisoners should not be subjected to personal indignities. It is a personal indignity to put a man into prison at all, and the best way to avoid such an indignity is to act so as not to get put into prison. The object of depriving prisoners of their hair, however, is of a cleanly and sanitary character. I am wholly unable to determine by personal knowledge whether the Cypriotes require such a precaution or not; but I do not think that we shall be able to give any instructions of the absolute character which the noble Lord requires. No doubt, if there is any strong prejudice or popular feeling on the question, as I see has been represented in the newspapers, it will be the duty of the local authorities to exercise due care in the modification of any regulations laid down; and I have asked Colonel Biddulph, who is about to be High Commissioner in the Island, to make inquiries as to whether this particular punishment is suited to the circumstances of the Island or not. But I am afraid that some of the opposition has arisen from a claim on the part of the Greek clergy to which it is impossible for us to accede—a claim, that is, that the jurisdiction over them should be reserved to their own ecclesiastical superiors, and should not be exercised by the civil power. That is contrary to our fundamental notions of justice in this country, and it is impossible that we should accept such a pretension. I agree, however, that in all these matters it is better not to lay down an absolute rule, and that the regulations ought to be suited to the habits and feelings of the inhabitants of the Island.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, in reply, that he was satisfied with the answer of the noble Marquess; but, owing to the lateness of the hour, he had omitted to say that whilst the English prison regulations were framed with regard to cleanliness, they were not required in this case, for whatever preconceived opinions there might be, he had no hesitation in saying that among the classes that usually filled the prisons there was much more cleanliness in the Ottoman Empire than in any country of Europe; and he must disagree with the opinion of the noble Marquess that the being in prison was a personal indignity such as those he had complained of.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 17th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [June 16] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Linen and Hempen Manufactures (Ireland) * [202].

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [88]—R.P.

Third Reading—Bills of Sale (Ireland) * [45], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

NEWCASTLE—THE WEAVERS TOWER.
QUESTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether in the matter of the threatened destruction of the Weavers Tower at Newcastle, the Lords of the Treasury had stated their opinion that its destruction ought not to take place except upon the decision of a clear majority of the whole number of the Council; whether he was aware that its destruction had been carried by a majority of one of the whole number of the Council; and, whether under the circumstances the Lords of the Treasury would not again interfere?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the Lords of the Treasury did express an opinion that the destruction of the building should not occur, except upon the decision of a clear majority of the whole number of the Town Council. I am informed by the Town Clerk that the Council when fully constituted consists of 64 members. When the discussion was held about the Weavers Tower there were two vacancies, reducing the numbers to 62. Of these, 48 were present at the meeting, 32 voted for the destruction, 6 against, and 10 declined to vote. The Treasury has no power to interfere further in the matter, as it has already signified its assent to the scheme for the free library, subject to a recommendation that the question of preserving the tower should be decided only by a clear majority of the Council. As only six members out of 62 were found to vote for the preservation, the division must be regarded as a decisive expression of local opinion, and I believe I may say that the leader of the former opposition to the proposal was not prepared to object to the decision come to at the last meeting.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)
ACT, 1875—COUNTY OF DONEGAL.

QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, having regard to the peaceable state of the county of Donegal, the Government have any intention of withdrawing the extra Police Force which has been stationed in Fannet consequent upon the murder of the late Lord Leitrim?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, he must remind the noble Lord of what really took place in Donegal. There was a murder, to which it was not necessary to refer further than to call attention to the fact that three persons, including the late Lord Leitrim, were deliberately murdered under circumstances which could not leave any reasonable doubt in the mind of any candid observer that the facts connected with it were matters of notoriety in the county. Notwithstanding the offer of a very substantial, he might say, in fact, almost unprecedented, reward, no evidence whatever was forthcoming. Certain persons against whom there was prima facie evidence were arrested on suspicion; but the evidence was not sufficient to justify the Government in putting them on their trial, and when released they were received with something in the nature of a popular ovation. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him that the neighbourhood was very justly charged with the cost of maintaining the police force which was considered necessary for the security of the district. It also appeared that persons who had no right whatever upon certain lands had, contrary to law, returned to those lands, which it seemed they had formerly occupied, and that otherwise resistance had been made to the execution of the law. The Government did not, therefore, think they would be justified in reducing the police force of the district. With regard to the contribution of the inhabitants towards the cost of maintaining the police, the Government did not intend to enforce payment of the tax now becoming due, provided any further attempt to resist the authorities was abandoned. If peace was restored in the district, no further contribution would be levied; but if any further attempt should be made to resist the law, the tax would be enforced.

MR. SULLIVAN: Might I be allowed to ask the right hon. Gentleman, when he says that persons re-entered on the lands contrary to law, Whether there is any other case except that of a respected Presbyterian lady, the Widow Algoe, and if so, what are the other cases; and, also, I wish to ask, why the persons against whom there was not sufficient evidence were not brought to trial; and, furthermore, when the innocent men who so long suffered in prison were released, if any recompense were made to them?

MR. PARNELL: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I would ask him, Whether any contribution has as yet been levied or collected for the maintenance of this extra police?

MR. J. LOWTHER: A contribution has been levied, and partially collected. As to the Question of the hon. and learned Member for Louth, I cannot, of course, without notice, give details; but the information we have received is to the effect that there have been several such cases. As to the reasons why those persons to whom he refers were not brought to trial, I stated that there was sufficient prima facie evidence to justify their committal; but we could go no further. Conviction is a very different matter.

MR. SULLIVAN: Then may I understand that these men have been discharged, there being no case to warrant their being put on their trial; and, if so, are they not innocent persons in the eyes of the law?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I must really refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to the Law Officers of the Crown, if he wishes to know precisely the law on the subject; but what has taken place is this—those persons were committed for trial; they were not put on trial, but they were not discharged.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— FLOGGING.—QUESTIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been directed to the statement of the Special Correspondent of the "Cape Times" published in the "Echo" of June the 12th, who writes from the Lower Tugela that—"There has been a good deal of flogging in the camp and on the march since the reinforcements were landed in Natal. Three of the Buffs were tied up on Tuesday morning, and the 88th, I hear, have had quite a festival of cats on the banks of the Tugela."

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that beyond the statements which had appeared in the newspapers, to which the hon. Member referred, he had received no information on the subject. He would, however, direct inquiries to be made with reference to it.

MR. CALLAN asked, if information in regard to such allegations would not be sent as a matter of course to the Horse Guards, with directions to make inquiry?

COLONEL STANLEY: I can only repeat that I have no information on the matter.

REPRODUCTIVE LOANS FUND (IRE- LAND) ACT—LOANS TO IRISH FISHERIES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the loans recommended, under the Irish Reproductive Loans Fund Act, by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, will be made in the district of Mulranny, County Mayo; and, whether he can give an assurance that loans of this description will be issued by the Board of Works without unnecessary delay, in all cases where the required guarantees have been given?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, as soon as the legal formalities have been gone through these loans will be made; but with regard to the particular case of Mulranny in the County Mayo, the Report of the Inspectors was made on the 6th of this month, and the matter is in course of being arranged.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman answers the latter part of the Question, and I may remark his answer gives no light as to the probable date when the loans may be expected. The Board of Works, no doubt, will do so, when these formalities have been complied with; but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will say at what time.

MR. J. LOWTHER: What I stated was, that in the case of the particular loans referred to, the Report of the Inspectors approving of them was delivered on the 6th of the month. Therefore, in this case, no unnecessary delay has occurred; and I hope in a very few days the matter will be arranged. As regards the general question of unnecessary delay, I am assured it is the intention of the Board to avoid any delay, necessary or unnecessary, as soon as the formalities have been complied with.

ARMY—RELATIVES OF MARRIED SOLDIERS PENSIONS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will consider the desirability of allowing a pension to the widows and orphans of soldiers married with leave, and who have re-engaged after completion of twelve years' service?

COLONEL STANLEY: If the hon. and gallant Gentleman means to ask whether I have prepared any scheme for allowing the pensions to which he refers, I cannot say that that is the case. Of course, the question of the desirableness of allowing such pensions has often been considered; but they have never been granted generally, and I fear that the enormous cost and difficulty of their payment would prove a very great bar to the adoption of any such scheme.

HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. VANS AGNEW asked the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, Whether, considering that the Members representing Scottish constituencies have in this Session voted in favour of the Second Reading of the Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Bill in the proportion of forty-seven to two, he will now withdraw his notice, which blocks that Bill, and prevents its being considered on Report, as amended in Committee, after half-past Twelve o'clock?

LORD ELCHO, in reply, said, he intended to allow his Notice of opposition to remain upon the Paper, in order to give Her Majesty's Government an opportunity of re-considering their view with regard to it. This was the more necessary as in the Division on Hypothec nine Members of the Government had voted with him for its maintenance, and only four had voted for its abolition. And, subsequently, the Government had resisted a Motion for the abolition of the Law of Distress in England and Ireland, which was a less "mild and limited" law than that of Hypothec; and he found that 26 Conservative Members who had voted for the abolition of hypothec voted for the maintenance of distress.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, that, in those circumstances, he should on Thursday next ask Mr. Chancellor of Exchequer, Whether, considering that the Lord Advocate had supported the measure, and that hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies had in this Session voted in favour of the second reading in the proportion of forty-seven to two, he would undertake, on the part of the Government, to give facilities for the progress of the measure.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—PLUNDERING OF ZULU VILLAGES.

QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to the "Graphic" of this week, in which a number of the Native Contingent of the British Forces in South Africa are depicted as plundering a Zulu village; whether it is true that several hundreds of Native villages have been plundered and destroyed since the rising of the Galekas down to the present time, and that the practice is still continued; whether his attention has been directed to the remarks of Colonel Bellair to General Sir Arthur Conynghame (South African Correspondence C. 2079 of 1878) on the results to the non-combatant population of the destruction of villages and the plundering of the village stores of provisions—

"I desire to point out that the condition of the Gaika women and children has become most deplorable. . . . Their habitations burnt, their meal-pits destroyed, their cattle captured. . . . Wherever our patrols go they seem to meet with these helpless creatures;"

whether his attention has been called to the statements in the South African correspondence of the "Standard" and "Daily News" of the 16th instant, that great indignation has been caused by the imprisonment of the Zulu King's messengers, and that the Basuto insurgents are being driven out of their caves by smoke and dynamite; and, whether, during or since the year 1878, besides asking for information, he has sent any specific instructions to the British authorities in South Africa on the subject of burning and plundering Native villages, smoking out refugee insurgents, and similar alleged practices?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have not seen The Graphic; but, whatever the merits of the illustrations to which the hon. Member refers may be, I do not think an illustration in a newspaper is quite of sufficient importance to base an opinion upon as to what is occurring in South Africa. I do not know that it is true that several hundreds of Native villages have been plundered and destroyed since the rising of the Gaikas down to the present time, nor do I believe there is any practice of the kind going on now. No doubt, in the war, many of these villages may have been destroyed as a necessary part of military operations; but I do not believe that in any case they have been destroyed where it has not been necessary for that reason to do so. The quotation the hon. Member has made from the remarks of Colonel Bellairs, I think, to a great extent, proves this; and it also proves the humanity with which these operations, as far as possible, have been conducted. I will, with the permission of the House, read the whole quotation, because the hon. Member has omitted some parts from his Question, which show that the condition of these women and children is due to other causes besides the destruction of villages, and that they were humanely treated afterwards. The full quotation, which refers to events that occurred in 1877 and the beginning of 1878, is this—

“I desire to point out that the condition of the Gaika women and children has become most deplorable. Left by the rebels to shift for themselves, their habitations burnt, their meal-pits destroyed, their cattle captured, and with a drought prevailing over the land, they are reported to me during the past fortnight as frequently passing our outposts in bands of 50 or 60 strong, pathetically replying, when questioned—‘We have no food, and are going in search of work.’ Wherever our patrols go, they seem to meet with these helpless creatures.”

Then Colonel Bellairs goes on to say—“Humanity requires that they should be immediately cared for.” In his work, Sir Arthur Cunynghame says—“I immediately placed this humane suggestion before the Government;” and I have information from South Africa to the effect that the result of this suggestion was that the Colonial Government spent thousands of pounds in succouring these unfortunate women and children. I have seen the statements in the South African correspondence of The Standard and Daily News; but I have no information of my own with regard to them. As far as I am able to judge from the telegram, the purport of which I read to the House the other day in reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), I do not think the last messengers from Cetewayo were detained, far less imprisoned. It appears they were sent back by Lord Chelmsford with a message to Cetewayo. As to the mode in which the Basuto insurgents are dealt with, I know nothing; but, however painful it may be to drive the insurgents out of caves and mountain fastnesses, where they had not exactly “taken refuge,” but where they were maintaining themselves in rebellion, and from whence it was found impossible to dislodge them—however painful it may be to drive them out by smoke, yet I will venture to say that that is a more humane process than driving them out by starvation. Even if these telegrams be true, at any rate, it would appear that the surrender of these insurgents was secured with very little loss of life, whatever operations may have taken place. As to the last part of the Question of the hon. Member, I really must say it seems to me to contain insinuations as to the action of the British authorities in South Africa which ought not to have been made; and I trust the House will deem me justified in declining to answer them.

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice that on another day he would ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the phrase “left to shift for themselves” did not refer to a period when their male relatives had been driven away? He should also take an early opportunity of stating to the House, from the Blue Books, all the Native villages which had been destroyed in South Africa since 1877 down to the present time.

BOILER EXPLOSION AT STONE
CLOUGH.—QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has had his attention called to the serious boiler explosion that occurred at Stone Clough, near Bolton, on the 15th instant, and if he will order an independent inquiry into the circumstances in accordance with the promise made during the recent discussion on Boiler Explosions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that a barrister had been ordered to attend, on behalf of the Home Office, the inquiry into the causes of the explosion referred to; but that he had given no promise to institute an independent inquiry with regard to it.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—
THE IRREGULARS.—QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has received information that, in addition to the Regular Troops and Native Contingent, considerable forces of Irregulars and Volunteers are employed in South Africa, recruited from the floating population of the Colonies and Diamond Fields; whether he has seen the statements in the last Mail News from South Africa that parties of these men, known as "Lonsdale's Horse," have taken to highway robbery in the neighbourhood of Durban; and, whether he is aware that Sir Arthur Conynghame, lately commanding in South Africa, has described these Volunteers as enlisting for the purpose of plundering, "fighting, not for Country, but cattle?"

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, it is the case that considerable Forces of Irregulars and Volunteers are employed in South Africa, and they have done excellent service. I have not seen the statements in the last Mail News from South Africa quoted by the hon. Member; he has not stated where they are to be found. I have heard nothing at all confirming them; but if any members of "Lonsdale's Horse" had been guilty of highway robbery, which I cannot believe, they could, of course, be made amenable by the civil and military authorities; and I am sure that that efficient and gallant officer, Commandant Lonsdale himself, would be the first to take steps for the purpose. Sir Arthur Conynghame never, so far as I know, described the Volunteers as enlisting for the purpose of plundering, "fighting, not for country, but cattle." He quotes, in his book, an opinion expressed by a speaker in South Africa to that effect; but he prefaces the quotation by saying that he had always had a high opinion of the Volunteers, and does not altogether agree with it.

MR. PARNELL said, the statement was made by the correspondent of the Eastern Province Herald of Durban, who spoke of the Lonsdale Horse as a desperate set of roughs, who had committed open robbery in public, and defied everybody, including the police. On one night, after having received a month's pay, 20 of them were taken to the station for drunkenness, and three "run in" for theft.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

NOTICE OF MOTION—STATE OF THE COUNTRY—COMMERCIAL AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.—QUESTIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I wish to make an appeal to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), who has given Notice of his intention to call the attention of the House on Friday next to the condition both of commerce and of agriculture, and to move for a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) has also given Notice of a similar Resolution. I would ask the hon. Member for Birkenhead whether, in these circumstances, he has any objection to postponing the Motion of which he has given Notice, seeing, as I have already privately informed him, that the state of Public Business would render it more convenient that it should not be brought on during the present week?

MR. MAC IVER felt that it was impossible that the very important questions which his Motion would raise could be properly discussed unless they could be brought on at a time convenient both to the House and the Government; and, therefore, he had much pleasure in withdrawing his Notice, on the understanding that he should propose to move, as an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, that the inquiry he suggested should be extended to both commerce and agriculture.

MR. NEWDEGATE inquired, Whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to give facilities to the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire for bringing forward his Motion?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, having expressed his obligation to the hon. Member for Birkenhead for giving way, said, that while her Majesty's Government were anxious that the important subjects which the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire would raise should be fully discussed, he was unable at that moment to fix any time for bringing it on. If arranged in that way, there would be a Morning Sitting next Friday; but not on Friday, the 4th of July.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Punishments.

Clause 44 (Scale of punishments by courts martial).

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 27, to leave out the word "fifty," in order to insert the word "six."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'fifty' stand part of the Clause."

MR. HOPWOOD said, he was not going to detain the Committee at any length; but it was fitting that the position of matters, when the Committee last parted from the consideration of his Amendment, should be recalled. The Amendment was to insert the word "six," instead of "fifty," as the number of lashes to be inflicted in certain cases. The object of his Amendment might appear, as was suggested by the Secretary of State for War, inconsistent with the later Amendments standing in his name; but he felt sure that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would know, from his own experience, how necessary it was to try every possible means and suggestion when anything was to be attained. He had only suggested the word "six," because it was admitted on all hands that the instrument of torture with which this punishment was inflicted caused nine stripes or weals at each blow; and, therefore, he wished that the House would not submit any longer to the hypocrisy of allowing the number to appear in the Bill as 50 lashes, when, in fact, it was 450. Therefore, he suggested that as six times nine made 54, by adopting his Amendment the charge of hypocrisy would be done away with, and Her Majesty's Government would get into the bargain four additional lashes. He had urged, on a former occasion, some of his hon. and gallant Friends to stand up and say why, in their judgment, it was necessary that this punishment should be maintained for the government of the Army. He still persisted in his Amendment, because he found that the more he persisted the more progress was made inside and outside the House; and rumours had reached him that many hon. Members were changing their views as they saw how little could be said for the punishment except vague generalities. He had heard, also, that there were those who began to think that a smaller number of lashes than that named in the Bill might be introduced. All these were matters of very encouraging import to those who were fighting this battle against corporal punishment. They did not believe in it. If they thought its abolition would in any way impair the efficiency of the National Army, they would be ready to join with hon. and gallant Members on both sides of the House in maintaining it. But they did not think so, and, therefore, they had a right to set their opinion against those who did. Hon. and gallant Members would say—"We have professional experience;" to which he replied—"We, too, know something of the government of men, and have seen this punishment applied over and over again; it has fallen into disrepute with every man who has any idea of the art of governing his fellow-creatures, and we cannot conceive why an exception should be made with regard to the government of the Army." He supposed the right hon. and gallant Gentleman liked the punishment as little as anybody, but was pressed forward and urged into the position which he occupied with regard to it by the officialism which existed. He believed this punishment to be founded upon the force of officialism which, whenever it took root, could only be removed as an agent in the government of men in the Military or Civil Departments of the State by constant threshing out in the House of Commons; and that not until people had heard enough of it, and had been cruelly undeceived, in spite of themselves. It was astonishing how, in public matters, the progress of a cause was furthered by repetition. It seemed that men would not listen until they were forced to do so; therefore, he concluded that a matter like the present would force itself by persistence upon the conviction of the Members of the House of Commons. Every day gave some fresh confirmation of the necessity of getting rid of the punishment of flogging in the Army. The other day there was the question of flogging on board ship; and now it was stated that the same unfortunate regiment had again suffered in the persons of several of its soldiers in this respect, and it was stated, he believed, that the 88th had undergone this punishment. The Secretary of State for War said, with regard to the last case, that he had heard nothing of it; but he (Mr. Hopwood) wished the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would tell the Committee whether it was not the duty of somebody to let him know, and to let the Commander-in-Chief know of every case of flogging which occurred; otherwise it would come to this—that persons invested with a little authority might inflict the punishment to too great an extent, and then even the General commanding in the field, and, perhaps, the authorities at home, might hear of it. He wished the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had gone a little further in his answer to the Question put that day by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) with reference to the flogging at the Cape; the answer would have been more sufficient had he said that he “must hear and was determined that he would hear” of these cases of flogging. But no such answer had been given, and it was quite certain that the punishment was going on to a great extent. He should, therefore, stand by his Amendment, and trusted that the Committee would adopt it.

MR. J. HOLMS rose with much pleasure to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Hopwood). He had never yet voted in any Division on the general question of flogging, because he had not been able clearly to understand whether it was essentially necessary for the maintenance of order in the Army that this punishment should be retained in time of war. He had waited patiently to hear from the Secretary of State for War, or the Judge Advocate General, some reasons in favour of retaining this punishment; and he had come to the conclusion that the main argument in favour of its retention was that as it was impossible, when on the field against an enemy, to deal with men having committed certain crimes by imprisonment, it was necessary to flog or shoot them. He entirely agreed that this punishment was of less severity than that of death; but he would remark that a man of high courage would rather be shot than flogged. Prisoners of war were subjected to neither of these punishments; but were sent, somehow or other, into confinement. Was the Committee to be told that the trifling number of men flogged in time of war was to be compared with the number of prisoners of war? They were often reminded of the more severe punishments inflicted in the Armies of Europe; but was there no other Army in the world besides these with which our Army could be compared? There was the Army of the United States of America in which flogging was not practised. He should support henceforward every Motion tending to the entire abolition of flogging in the Army.

MR. MUNTZ supposed no man in the House would wish to retain the punishment of flogging if any proper substitute could be found. He thought his hon. Friend who had just spoken could hardly have read the Articles of War of the United States. The Americans, it was true, had abolished flogging in time of peace; but they retained corporal punishment in time of peace and war. Then they were told that there was no corporal punishment in the Armies of the great European Powers, and that even Russia had entirely abolished it. But he knew that recently a captain of a company in the Austrian Army could order 25 lashes without court martial. He pointed out to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms), in reply to the argument made use of by him for getting rid of soldiers in the same way as prisoners of war were dealt with by sending them to the rear, that it was impossible that all the soldiers could be treated in that way. He (Mr. Muntz) should not be in favour of the retention of the punishment if he thought discipline could be maintained without it; but he thought we must come at last to the alternative of flogging or death. There was no getting out of the fact that there must be corporal punishment of some kind, without which discipline could not be maintained. If any efficient substitute for it could be devised, he should be very glad to see it. Coming to another point, he knew that cases of gross tyranny had occurred in cases where flogging was ordered by the provost marshal. He had always objected to that practice, and should have much pleasure in supporting the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), the object of which was to prevent the infliction of the punishment except by order of court martial. He had witnessed great tyranny on the part of provost marshals, and that would always occur where men of violent temper had absolute control of their fellow-creatures. If the hon. and learned Member for Stockport moved to reduce the number of lashes to 30, he should vote with him.

Mr. Hopwood

MR. RYLANDS did not intend to go into the general question of flogging, because it had been discussed on a former occasion; nor did he think that any sufficient argument had been advanced to justify the Committee in believing that the existing system of punishment by flogging should be maintained. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport had proposed this Amendment, not because he liked flogging in any degree, but in order to see whether Government could not be induced to go some way to meet the views of those who were altogether opposed to the punishment. He (Mr. Rylands) felt sure that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was aware that a very strong feeling existed upon this question both inside and outside the House, and he referred to the fact that the opinions expressed in the House two years ago were very considerably in this direction. When the old Mutiny Bill was under discussion the opinion of the House was very strong that they had been in the habit of passing from year to year, without alteration, Mutiny Bills based upon the judgment and on the idea of punishment which belonged to an age by no means so humane as our own; and it was contended that the time had come when the Mutiny Bill should be dealt with in a broad spirit, with a view to see if a number of clauses unsuitable to the characteristics of the present day could not be got rid of. Her Majesty's Government met the objections which were urged in the House against the general provisions of the Mutiny Bill, in a debate which lasted a long time, by saying that they would refer the whole question to a Select Committee. But the result of that Committee had been very disappointing; for, instead of dealing with the question on broad lines, and in the spirit indicated by the discussions which had taken place in the House two years ago, the Government had taken the most extraordinary course of laying before that Select Committee a Bill which systematized all the characteristics of the Mutiny Act and Articles of War which had been in existence for years. The Committee did not, however, much approve of the position in which they had been placed, for he observed they said—

“Your Committee have mainly directed their inquiries to the examination of the schemes of Military Law submitted by the Secretary of State for War, and to the explanation of them by Sir Henry Thring, a course which, though somewhat unusual, appeared the most convenient.”

The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was fettered by the course taken by the Government in bringing to the Committee a form of Bill which practically crystallized the Articles of War and the Mutiny Act of former years, and which, instead of making the law more lenient, made it harsher. Hon. Members on both sides of the House had stated very positively that the Bill had been drawn on wrong lines, and that its effect would be to increase the harshness rather than the leniency of legislation. He wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, if he would do him the favour to attend for one moment, that the difficulty in transacting Public Business was very much increased by this Bill having been laid upon the Table. The Bill had resulted from a Select Committee appointed with a very different expectation, and received cordial support neither on the one side of the House nor the other. Moreover, he had observed that opinion out-of-doors was going against the Bill; and the leading journal, after supporting it for some time, expressed an opinion, two or three days ago, that it would be much better, and would save the time of the House, if the Government were to pass a provisional Bill this Session, with a view to the introduction of a more mature measure next year. He should be prepared to support any Amendment, the effect of which was to reduce the application of corporal punishment in the Army to a minimum, which he held had not been proved to be necessary either for its efficiency or discipline. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), whose good sense was always manifest in his speeches, had given his authority, which he (Mr. Rylands) looked upon as worthy of great respect, in favour of maintaining a portion of this punishment—for even he had indicated a very important modification—but his hon. Friend ought to have borne in mind that the same arguments as his were used in the House of Commons 20 years ago to maintain an extreme of corporal punishment which would at the present day be shrunk from as perfectly disgraceful. And yet there were Gentlemen in those days, of high spirit and great judgment, who maintained that this punishment must be continued. He did not for a moment charge any hon. Member with inhumanity in supporting the punishment at the present time; on the contrary, he could believe him to be quite as humane as any of those who opposed it, and wished it to be excluded from the Bill altogether. He admitted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had conducted the Bill with great courtesy; but was obliged to refer to the circumstance that on a former occasion, in allusion to the Amendment under discussion, he had gone out of his way to say that he would oppose all the other Amendments on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). [Colonel STANLEY dissented.] He was glad to see that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman shook his head, because he must have been misunderstood. But he would submit to the Secretary of State for War, in view of the number of Amendments to the Bill of which Notice had been given, that the progress of the measure might probably be promoted, if the Government were prepared to meet the views of hon. Members on some material point, and say that they were willing to reduce the infliction of this degrading punishment, and surround it with certain limitations.

Mr. Rylands

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was rather too much to expect the House to consider this as an agreeable subject; at the same time, he believed it had too strong a sense of duty to agree to anything which might tend to render exaggerated punishment necessary, and to substitute the punishment of death for that of flogging; or that the majority would do anything that might tend to the disorganization of Her Majesty's Forces in the field. He must recall to the Secretary of State for War that Questions had been put in that House reflecting very grossly and very unjustly on Her Majesty's Forces in South Africa. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that day after day attempts had been made to impute to Her Majesty's Forces, and to the highest officers in the employ of Her Majesty, acts of the most disgraceful barbarism. Reflections had also been thrown upon the Contingent Forces in South Africa; and almost immediately some hon. Members, actuated by humanitarian motives, had risen to propose alterations which would deprive the officers of those corps of the means of enforcing discipline amongst them. He felt sure the Committee would see the utter inconsistency of such proceedings. The proposals of hon. Gentlemen opposite were the more extraordinary because the Bill before the Committee proposed to reduce this punishment to a minimum. He was sure that Her Majesty's Government ought to guard themselves against being induced unduly to relax the means of maintaining discipline, as also against giving any countenance by such relaxation to the gross charges of want of discipline, plundering, and the like, which, truly or falsely, were reiterated in that House.

MR. J. BROWN was one of those who had supported the Government all through in the matter of flogging, because he did not believe it could be dispensed with; but he trusted that some understanding might be arrived at and an end put to the discussion, which had lasted a long time, by the substitution of a less number of lashes than that named in the Bill. Remarks had been made with regard to the discipline in the Army of the United States, in which it was said there was no flogging; and it was true that in the war between the North and South there was very little. But, as most of his schoolfellows had been in the Army in America, he was in a position to state that the cruelty used as a substitute was something beyond belief, people being strung up in trees, and suffering other varieties of cruelty, instead of flogging. He made these remarks for the purpose of showing that in our Army flogging could not be done away with; but he thought that an understanding might be come to that 25 lashes should be the limit; and the fact that it was considered sufficient that not exceeding 25 lashes were to be inflicted in prison led him to hope that the same number might be introduced into this clause, instead of 50. He ventured to appeal to the Government to consider this suggestion, with a view to shortening the discussion; as also to the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), who would, perhaps, accede to the proposal, inasmuch as it went in the direction in which he and his hon. Friends desired to go.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he quite appreciated the spirit in which the hon. Member who had last spoken had made his suggestion; at the same time, he was obliged to say that it was one which the Government could not accept. The Committee should not lose sight of the fact which, with his strong common sense, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had brought out, that if they were to abandon this punishment they would, in certain circumstances, in order to maintain discipline, inevitably be driven back to the repression of crime by other and more severe means. Flogging was the punishment which, by custom, had been adopted in the British Army in preference to picketing—making a man stand with his heel upon the small point of a picket—or such punishment as riding a wooden horse. He firmly believed that if they were to attempt to make the punishment too slight in cases where severe discipline was necessary, they would run the risk either of forcing the authorities, now obliged, in some cases, to keep down crimes with an iron hand, to inflict capital punishment in cases where they were now able to flog, or to resort to other means which might be of far greater cruelty. Of course, corporal punishment was severe, and he was not for a moment going to say it was not; but the crimes committed on active service for which it was inflicted were of a very serious character, and it had been well pointed out by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that, on the one hand, the authorities were accused of allowing a state of loose discipline to exist; and, on the other, that the Committee were asked to deprive those authorities of the means of enforcing discipline. There was not, so far as he was aware, that sense of degradation felt by soldiers at being flogged which some hon. Members supposed. Of course, he did not suppose that soldiers upon whom this punishment had been inflicted would come forward and say so; but the other day he was informed of the case of a private soldier who, having been flogged by the provost marshal, was willing to bear another punishment from his commanding officer rather than say he had fallen into the hands of the provost marshal. The man took the punishment of flogging; but it was obviously of so light a character that he was perfectly able to go about his duty in the ordinary way. What he said in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had been misunderstood. The hon. and learned Member had several Amendments to Clause 44; these Amendments all hung together, and he said he could not accept any of them. But he was far from saying that he could not take into consideration other Amendments. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had really gone to the root of the whole matter. If they wished to support discipline they must retain summary punishment, and if they did not have such a summary punishment as flogging, they would probably have to take to summary punishments quite as severe, though more irregular, than flogging. Either the latter or capital punishment would have to be adopted for the cases in which it was proposed to inflict flogging. He did not feel it consistent with his duty, occupying the position he did, to recommend to the Committee that the maximum of lashes should be reduced below 50, particularly as it was within the discretion of the court to inflict what number of lashes below 50 that it pleased.

MR. SHERIDAN said, that there were two points to which he wished to refer. It had been stated by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that no common soldier had expressed his disapproval of this mode of punishment, and that had been offered as a reason for its retention. He should like to know what opportunity any common soldier had of expressing his approval or disapproval of the punishment? They were there as one class, legislating for another, and inflicting punishment upon another. One class was in the ascendancy, and what opportunity was there for that class to know the wishes of the other class in connection with the administration of the Army, or as to the infliction of the punishments which, it was said, must be resorted to? That House was composed of the class from which officers were taken; they had Gentlemen there holding commissions as officers in the Army, and they had Gentlemen whose fathers, or brothers, or sons, were officers in the Army; but what representation had the common soldiers? None. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had challenged them upon this question. He stated that no common soldier objected to this kind of punishment; but he did not state who represented the common soldier in that House. They had one or two hon. Members representing the mining interest; but they had no hon. Members representing directly the working classes, nor did any hon. Member represent the common soldier, or sailor before the mast. They were then enacting class legislation for the maintenance of peculiar privileges against another class, which had no opportunity of lifting its voice, or protesting, or explaining its views with respect to this peculiar description of punishment. It was said, further, that this punishment was not looked upon as an indignity. He remembered having heard from a man who was employed in the American Mercantile Marine that he was once pressed into an English man-of-war. He protested at the time that he was serving in the American Marine. That was before the war in 1830 broke out; but no attention was paid to his protest that he was serving under the American flag. He was compelled to serve in the British Navy.

Colonel Stanley

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member that the question he was going into was not the subject raised by this Amendment. The Amendment was with reference to the number of stripes to be inflicted in the Army, and not as to the principle of flogging.

MR. SHERIDAN was surprised that the Chairman of Ways and Means should make such an observation as that, for he was only giving this case as an illustration of his arguments in the matter. He had no wish to detain the Committee at any length with regard to the subject; but when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman told them that no common soldier had made any protest against the infliction of this punishment, he wished to urge upon the Committee that it should not take that for granted, but should remember that soldiers and sailors were not represented in that House; and that, in reality, this punishment might be felt by them as a great indignity, and might be very prejudicial to the Service of the country.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER rose to Order. He submitted that an hon. Member in discussing a clause of the Bill might illustrate his views by referring to a subject which had not been debated upon the second reading. He thought that his hon. Friend was perfectly in Order in the remarks he had made.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the question raised at that moment was rather one of the authority of the Chairman than of anything else. ["No, no!"] Perhaps he might be wrong; but he understood the hon. Gentleman to be challenging the decision of the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out that the question raised by the Amendment was as to the number of lashes that might be inflicted under sentence of court martial in the Army. That was the subject before the Committee, and as he was responsible to the House, it would be wrong if he were to allow the discussion to stray into a question of side-issues. Although, as the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) had observed, the question of principle had not been raised on the second reading, he must point out that it had already been decided in discussions on earlier clauses of the Bill.

MR. SHERIDAN said, that the Committee could not give too much attention to this question of corporal punishment. The Committee was asked to sanction the reduction of the power to inflict torture upon certain classes of the Army. They were asked, in the spirit which animated their forefathers in inflicting this punishment, to continue it when, by the spread of civilization and education, it was no longer necessary. They were asked to continue a power in the hands of a class, which, though in former days it was thought nothing of, was now resented. In former times, it was not thought too great a punishment to administer 1,000 lashes to a soldier for a small offence. Such a punishment as that would not now be continued; but it gave them some idea of the views which were then taken as to the infliction of this torture. It had been proved to demonstration that the views of the class which insisted upon this punishment were wrong. It had been admitted that they were wrong in desiring to retain a power to inflict 1,000 lashes; but still they asked for power to inflict 50 lashes, which would amount to 450 stripes. He would ask whether they could not do away with this antiquated punishment altogether? The spread of education and the system of short service ought to enable them at first to diminish this punishment, and then to abolish it. In these days, it was a confession of weakness on the part of any civilized nation to continue the practice of corporal punishment.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that up to that period he had not taken the slightest part in the discussion of this Bill; he trusted, therefore, that he might be allowed to make a few observations with regard to it. He was one of those who believed that the punishment of flogging was unnecessary in itself, and immoral and wrong altogether. The opponents of flogging found a very considerable difficulty in voting for an Amendment which proposed to inflict that punishment, although diminishing the number of lashes. All their objections to the administration of the punishment of flogging applied whether the number of lashes given was six or whether it was 60. He understood that his hon. Friend was, however, making one, of what he hoped would be many protests, against a system which justified, in his opinion, the most determined opposition. It might be said that such opposition as that amounted to obstruction. He thought that there was only one thing which justified such persistent opposition as was now offered—namely, the persistent obstinacy on the part of Her Majesty's Government to give way to the views expressed on that side of the House. The refusal on the part of those who had the conduct of this Bill to meet in any way the strong feelings which had been expressed on that side of the House justified any opposition to the Bill. He was convinced that, so long as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War met their objections with "no surrender," the progress of the Bill would not be facilitated. He wondered that the Government had not accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown). He objected to this punishment, not merely because it was degrading and brutal, and unworthy of our civilization, but because he was convinced that it was injurious to the discipline and character of the Army. He was aware that it might be said that he knew nothing about the Army; but he did know a great deal about the classes from which the Army was taken, and he had heard a great many men amongst the working classes complain of the punishments to which they would be subjected if they enlisted, and give that as a reason for their refusing to enlist; although, if that objection did not exist, other circumstances were such that they might have accepted the terms offered on behalf of Her Majesty. It had been stated by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that the private soldier did not feel that flogging was any indignity; but the illustration which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had given proved the contrary, for he told them of the case of a man who submitted himself to further punishment rather than confess that he had undergone the degrading infliction. But that only proved the degrading and debasing nature of the punishment, and he knew that the horror of this punishment on the part of the great number of the working class was very great indeed. The general effect was to lower the status of the Army, for it prevented the best men from going into the ranks.

The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had alleged that this punishment was only inflicted for very serious offences, and that, if it was not inflicted for such crimes, death must take its place. But one of the very gravest objections which he had to the punishment was that it was inflicted for very slight offences indeed. It could not be denied that flogging could be inflicted for very slight offences. He did not doubt that a good commanding officer—a thoroughly good man—would not inflict it upon those under his command for slight matters; but there were bad men as well as good men in the Service, and this clause would put it in the power of bad commanding officers to inflict the punishment of flogging for very trifling offences. Further, it had been said by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that a decent working man would have no fear of being flogged, for he was not likely to commit those disgraceful and serious offences for which flogging was to be employed. He would ask, what were those grave and serious offences for which flogging was to be inflicted? He found that flogging might be inflicted, under the clause they were discussing, for every offence for which the punishment of imprisonment was provided, or for which a greater punishment than imprisonment might be inflicted. He found that there were no less than 79 categories of offences for which imprisonment might be inflicted, and, probably, there would be another large class of offences for which the greater punishment of death was inflicted. Then there were more than 100 distinct classes of offences for which, under the circumstances mentioned in the Bill, flogging might be inflicted. In Clause 11, any person subject to military law—

“Neglecting to obey any general garrison order, or other order, was, on conviction by court martial, if a soldier, liable to suffer imprisonment, or such less punishment,” as was in that Act mentioned. Therefore, for that offence, a soldier might be flogged. Any soldier neglecting to obey any order! Was it possible for a clause to be framed which should contain a greater number of possible indefinite trivial offences than this? Then, again, in Clause 15, any soldier who, without leave from his commanding officer, absented himself from any school when duly ordered to attend there, was liable to suffer imprisonment, and, therefore, flogging. No doubt, it was ridiculous to suppose that any commanding officer would inflict the punishment of flogging for such an offence as that; but still it was not right to provide such a punishment for a soldier who could not be considered a criminal of the deepest dye. Then, again, any man who, after signing any document relating to pay, arms, ammunition, equipments, clothing, regimental necessaries, provisions, furniture, bedding, blankets, sheets, utensils, forage, or stores, left in blank any material part for which his signature was a voucher, or refused, or by culpable neglect omitted to make or send a report or return which it was his duty to make or send, was liable, if on active service, to be flogged. An instance had been adduced by his hon. Colleague the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) of the severity of the American martial law, in that they flogged even for the offence of drunkenness. But, under this Bill, they were going to inflict the punishment of flogging for quite as slight an offence as that of drunkenness, and many more trivial offences. Under Clause 19, any man drunk, either on duty or off duty, was liable to suffer imprisonment, and was, therefore, on active service, subject to be flogged. He would remind the Committee that, under Clause 44, the punishment of flogging might be inflicted for any offence punishable under the Act with imprisonment, or a greater punishment on soldiers while on active service, or on board any ship not commissioned by Her Majesty. Therefore, under those circumstances, drunkenness, although it had taken place off duty, and not in the slightest degree affecting the security of the troops, might render a man liable to the punishment which, at home, would be imprisonment; but which, being in the field, might be flogging. But that was not all, for, in Clause 40, other conduct to the prejudice of military discipline was dealt with. The gentleman who drew up the Act was so afraid that he might omit something that he provided, in Clause 40, that every person subject to military law, who committed any of the following offences—that was to say, was guilty of any act, conduct disorder, or neglect, to the prejudice of order and military discipline, though not in this Act otherwise specified, should, if a soldier, be liable to suffer imprisonment or some less punishment. He challenged the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to say how, in the face of the clauses which he had quoted, he could get up in his place and say that any decent working man could enter the Army without the slightest fear that he would be exposed to the punishment of flogging except for the most serious and grave offences? He thought he had shown, by reference to the Act, that a soldier rendered himself liable to be flogged for the most trivial offences when on active service, or on board ship, not being a ship of war. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman could show the sincerity of his convictions by agreeing to an Amendment to the effect that corporal punishment was only to be inflicted for offences to be specified in a Schedule. If the Government would put in a Schedule specifying the offences which, upon active service, would render a man liable to be flogged, then he would venture to say that a great deal of the opposition to the punishment would be disposed of, and they would make considerable progress with the measure. Unless the Government would do that, he maintained that they would be justified in resisting by all the means in their power the retention of the punishment of flogging.

Mr. Chamberlain

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought that the arguments which had been addressed to the Committee by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) were well worthy of attention. Flogging ought not to be inflicted, in his opinion, when on active service, and in the presence of the enemy, except for the gravest offences. When the Committee came to a decision on this subject, they thought that sentiment would be raised as much on the side of flogging as against it. Suppose a soldier, in the course of a war with France, was guilty of ravishing women, or doing any odious offence of that kind, they must have some severe restrictions in order to meet the evil. For, however high their opinion might be of soldiers, they knew that under temptation, and under the spirit of war, such offences as he had mentioned were sometimes committed. He could not come to the conclusion that this method of violent restraint was capable of being dispensed with altogether. He thought that the argument of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham was a very strong one; for he had shown that this Bill did allow the infliction of corporal punishment in a great many cases for trivial offences. This had not arisen, he believed, from the intention of the framers of the Bill, or from the views of the Government; but was rather a question of drafting. It had been said that everybody who was liable to imprisonment should also be liable, when on active service and on board ship, to be flogged. He thought it clear that they would not desire to flog, under these circumstances, for all offences for which a man, when at home, would be liable to imprisonment. He did think that if the Government gave an assurance that there should be some attempt to define and specify the offences for which flogging was to be inflicted, all reasonable objection would be met. He did not say that they should specify every offence for which flogging was to be inflicted, but that they should give some definition in the Bill of the class of offences to which the punishment was applicable. If that were done, he agreed that a great deal of the opposition to the punishment would be removed. It did not seem to him that that could be done at that moment, for it would require a great deal of time to consider how far the definition should be given. He was, therefore, willing to support the modification suggested by the hon. Member for Birmingham. With respect to the number of lashes, he thought that the proposal of the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown) was deserving of the attention of the Government. He thought that if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would give the Committee an assurance that there would be an attempt in the Bill to make an accurate specification of the cases in which flogging was to be inflicted under the Act, a very substantial benefit would result.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he could not undertake to give off-hand any such promise as was asked; but if he were in Order, he would say that he agreed in principle with what had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). An Amendment had been put down by the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), and he had conferred with him with regard to it. He was willing to adopt that Amendment, by which on board ship corporal punishment was to be limited to a certain specified class of cases. If he went any further in the direction in which the hon. and learned Gentleman had indicated, he thought that it must be not by the limitation of punishment as proposed, but by the limitation of the crime in respect to which the punishment was to be inflicted. In saying that he accepted the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire, he would state that his own convictions were in favour of limiting this punishment; but he could not give any promise with regard to the matter, for he might be misleading the Committee. Still, he would state that if any change could be made, he thought it should be in the direction which had been suggested.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could hardly expect those who were opposed to the punishment of flogging, except in extreme cases, to support Her Majesty's Government. Nor could they expect any support from those who were opposed to the infliction of the punishment even in time of war, or when troops went on board ships not belonging to the Royal Navy. He thought that the proper course to take would be to postpone the consideration of this clause, in order to enable the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to consult those who had framed the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] If that were done, he thought he had gathered from the cheers with which the suggestion had been received that the progress of the Bill would be facilitated, and that everything would be done to resume the discussion in a fair spirit. He thought that he had some right to appeal to Her Majesty's Government on this occasion, for he had stood very much alone in supporting the Government in its demands for the power to maintain the right to flog when troops were in the field or on board ship. In doing that, he believed that flogging would be inflicted only for really dangerous or grave offences. He was asked by other hon. Members for what kind of offences flogging would be inflicted? The kind of offences which he had in his mind were such as two or three men might commit in endangering the lives of all on board a ship by breaking into the spirit store. Under the circumstances, he thought it only right that summary punishment should be visited on those men by the commanding officer of the regiment. To that extent, he was prepared to support Her Majesty's Government. He had since had an opportunity of consulting a gallant officer who had seen much service in various parts of the world. He had asked him as to the cases in which flogging was inflicted in time of war. He replied that the flogging which was to be objected to was that inflicted by the provost marshal. He said that the provost marshal was an officer, usually a subaltern or some junior officer, who kept up the discipline of the regiment on the march, and that he could inflict the punishment of flogging whenever he chose. He said to him—"But surely he does not flog except for very serious offences?" The officer replied—"Ah! but he does."

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that the clause before the Committee related only to flogging by court martial, and that there was another clause in the Bill which related to punishment by a provost marshal.

MR. PARNELL would ask the Chairman of Ways and Means to re-consider his decision, for it was a most important matter. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport went to the principle of the measure. If he succeeded in limiting the number of lashes that were to be inflicted, that restriction would apply as well to the provost marshal as to the court martial. If they succeeded now in limiting the number of lashes to be inflicted by the court martial, surely the provost marshal could not inflict more.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he did not think that that was the accurate view. The clause which was now before the Committee related only to punishment by court martial, and had nothing whatever to do with the punishment by the provost marshal.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that the decision of the Chairman made it thus more important that they should agree to the Amendment which had been proposed with a view to limiting the number of lashes to be inflicted by a court martial. There was no possible reason why the Government could not consent to put in a Schedule the offences for which the punishment was to be inflicted. It might be said that flogging was to be inflicted in an emergency by some particular person for keeping up discipline; but now they had been told that flogging was to be inflicted by a court martial as well. A court martial was composed of several officers, and required time to assemble. It was a serious investigation, and there was plenty of time for deliberation. Of the flogging inflicted by court martial a record was kept; but of the flogging which went on under the orders of the provost marshal there was no record at all. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would agree to postpone this clause until it had made up its mind as to the course which it should take, and as to what ought to be done in the interests of the soldier, and in pursuance of the feelings of the House and the country in relation to the punishment.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE considered that the Government ought to accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). There could be no doubt that if they did not do so, looking to the strong feeling on the subject on that side of the House, they would waste a great deal of time. It was not only those who objected to the punishment of flogging who were against them, but also those who did not object to flogging altogether; but who, nevertheless, maintained that corporal punishment should not be inflicted for offences which the House had not defined, and of which they knew nothing. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had laid before the Committee a large number of offences drawn from the clauses of the Bill, for which he maintained the punishment of flogging could be inflicted. In Clause 6, there was an offence defined, of which no hon. Member, so far as he could find, could give any explanation. It was the military offence of forcing a safeguard. For that offence a soldier, if on active service, was liable to suffer death; and if the offence was not thought worthy of that punishment, then flogging. Under the Bill a soldier might be flogged for being drunk when on active service; but when off duty, although he might be a considerable distance from the enemy, and in a place where nobody would be endangered by his crime, surely, it could not be the intention of those who supported flogging as a punishment that it should be inflicted for an offence of that kind? With regard to the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had expressed his intention to accept, that Amendment, he would point out, was limited by the words "on board ship;" but if the Government did not define the offences for which flogging was to be inflicted, they could raise the whole question by proposing to omit from the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member the words "on board ship." That would enable the matter to be raised in the most definite form. He did not think there were many civilians who had seen so much of war as he had done. He went all through the Franco-German War, and was part of the time with the French and part with the German Army. In no case but one did he ever see any painful corporal punishment inflicted. One case which he saw was that of a Prussian soldier, who was tied to a tree; but no other torture was inflicted upon him. So far as he could make out, the man had been caught committing some disgraceful offence, and a disgraceful punishment was accordingly inflicted upon him. Every hon. Member of that House was well aware that flogging did not exist either in the French or the German Army. He did not believe that it existed in any European Army—it had certainly been abolished in the Russian Army—although, not being acquainted with the Austrian Army, he could not speak of that. Surely, it was not a good thing for any Army that they should remain behind in this matter. The infliction of this punishment must have a very injurious effect upon recruiting; no man could prove exactly whether it had an effect upon recruiting or not; but all they could do was to gather a certain amount of evidence from conversation with the classes from which the Army was drawn. Hon. Gentlemen that had done so were absolutely convinced that flogging had a prejudicial effect upon recruiting. But, having shown that a considerable amount of doubt existed upon the subject, surely it was most important that they should look into the matter and thoroughly investigate it. They were now making a Bill for all time, or for, at least, a very considerable number of years; and whenever that House enacted the punishment of flogging—a punishment which had been disapproved of by all foreign nations for a long time—the Government ought really to know the whole facts of the matter, and to postpone the consideration of the clause in order to make up their minds.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that a great deal of discussion had taken place upon this Bill, in which he had borne no part. From what had taken place, it was evident that, unless the Government would give some assurance that they would accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, no progress could be made with the Bill. The hon. Member for Birmingham had entirely upset the calculations of the Government, and his speech must have impressed everyone who listened to it. By way of parenthesis, he might say that he heard from all sides that the Bill was a bad one. The hon. Member for Birmingham had come forward and made a statement, which had been uncontradicted, that every person who was subjected to imprisonment by the Bill would be liable to be flogged on active service, or on board ship, and the hon. Member had drawn attention to the vast number of clauses of the Bill which thus enacted flogging. He thought that it was most important for the Government to pay some attention to those observations of the hon. Member for Birmingham, although they could not, as the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had very truly said, expect the Government at a moment's notice to specify all the offences for which flogging was to be inflicted. Still, the answer of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to the proposal was not satisfactory, for all he said was that he had adopted the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Aberdeenshire—an Amendment which dealt entirely with soldiers on board ship, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that he could give no pledge to entertain the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford to specify in a Schedule of the Bill all the offences for which the punishment of flogging was to be inflicted. They were wasting time by considering the question in that state of affairs; the Government could not be allowed to proceed in this matter until they had given an assurance that they would accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, based upon the proposal of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and that they would as soon as they could submit to the House a Schedule containing the offences for which flogging could be inflicted. Until they had done that, he did not think the Government should be allowed to proceed.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK thought the suggestion of the hon. Member for Birmingham was a reasonable one, although he had no hesitation in expressing his opinion that the punishment of flogging should be greatly restricted, but should be maintained. That was the position which he had always maintained upon this question, and he did not now recede from it; his contention being that, wherever necessary, flogging should be inflicted. Still, he did think that the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Birmingham was a perfectly reasonable and fair one. All that he asked for was that a Schedule should be prepared containing the offences for which, in extreme cases, a soldier should be liable to corporal punishment. To prepare such a Schedule would be a work of no difficulty to anyone who was practically acquainted with the infliction of punishment in the Army. Such a Schedule would leave no doubt as to the crime for which punishment was to be inflicted, and would, moreover, enable the good soldier to feel conscious that he was not liable to corporal punishment. It would have the effect of abolishing the fear of corporal punishment, which now acted as a strong deterrent to a large class of men, and prevented them from enlisting. The Schedule would not only render it impossible for a good soldier to be flogged, but it would tend to dissipate the delusion that there was any desire on the part of officers to abuse the powers that were placed in their hands.

DR. KENEALY thought it was very much to be regretted that Her Majesty's Government had not accepted the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. So far as he could understand, the population of this country had a strong repugnance to flogging in the Army. The proposal which had been made seemed to him to be a most reasonable one, if the Committee would bear in mind that in all enactments with reference to those who had broken the laws of the country the House had been most particular to enumerate the particular offences for which flogging was to be inflicted. Even Her Majesty's Judges, in administering the laws of the land, were tied down by very stringent limitations in the infliction of corporal punishment. In all enactments dealing with criminal matters, the House had decided and enacted by law the actual offences for which corporal punishment could be inflicted. He did not say that the same restrictions as regarded corporal punishment could be applied in reference to soldiers as to civilians. But it seemed to him that it was absolutely necessary to specify some offences. There was this additional reason for doing it in the case of military offenders. Courts martial were sometimes composed of very young officers, who might not all be possessed of very good judgment; and it was undesirable that the power of inflicting corporal punishment should be placed in the hands of any men, unless there were some assurance that it would not be exercised until the expediency of exercising it had been carefully considered. He thought that in the present case the difficulty would be met by giving the power to inflict corporal punishment for particular and grave offences.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he had had a great many observations addressed to him from various parts of the House, urging him to put certain limitations upon corporal punishment. He had always expressed himself as being only an advocate for corporal punishment where absolutely necessary, and with a view to preventing a more serious punishment. He had been asked whether he could reduce the number of lashes; but he did not feel it to be consistent with his duty to do so, because the punishment, if inflicted at all, ought to be severe. The junior Member for Birmingham had pressed upon the attention of the Committee the fact that there were many crimes for which, even inferentially, a soldier might be liable to corporal punishment. That might be so; but no one would ever suppose that flogging would be inflicted for some of the matters mentioned by the hon. Member. He freely admitted, however, that it was quite right to limit a severe punishment of this kind, and to fence it round in every way in which it could be done without destroying discipline. He had been asked whether he could give an undertaking that a Schedule of the crimes should be framed for which alone corporal punishment could be inflicted. In answer to that request, he had said that in principle he was in no way opposed to that; but that the matter was one of drafting and one of considerable difficulty, although it might appear to be simple enough, and he did not like to give a promise which he might not be able to fully carry out. So far as his own convictions went, they pointed very much to limiting the class of crimes rather than altering the nature of the punishment. He apprehended, also, that he would not be in Order in postponing this clause, even if they wished to do it, for it had been already amended. They were in a position of some difficulty. All that he could undertake to do, under the circumstances, and what he was perfectly ready to do, was to lay before the Committee a Schedule. That, he understood, was the only demand which had been made upon him on the part of the Committee; and it was all which, in view of the previous decision of the Committee that corporal punishment should be inflicted, he felt it consistent with his duty to do. He did not see that much good would be effected by leaving out the words "on board ship" from the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Aberdeenshire. It did not seem to him that the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend would meet all the cases on active service. Probably, it would be better to deal with both of these Amendments in connection with Schedules specifying the offences for which corporal punishment could be inflicted on board ship and also on active service. The House would then have clearly before it the offences for which that punishment could be inflicted. Of course, the Committee would be aware that the difficulty he felt was a matter of drafting; it was an important subject, and he was placed in a position of doubt, without time for consideration. However, he thought he should be taking up the time of the Committee in asking them to postpone the clause, after the explanation which he had given, and which he trusted would be satisfactory. He hoped that, the matter having been discussed very fully, they would be now allowed to proceed to a decision.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to point out that there was no difficulty about the Schedule at all, for the Amendment which he had put upon the Paper to substitute for the word "imprisonment" the word "death" would do all that was wanted. By simply making that alteration, they had their Schedule made for them. He wished, also, with the permission of the Chair, to speak for a moment to the point of Order. The Chairman seemed to consider that the number of lashes in Clause 44 did not affect the position of the provost marshal. What he wanted to point out was, that in the Peninsular War the provost marshal frequently gave 100 or 200 lashes, when he would not now have dared to give more than 40 or 50. The reason for that was, that in Clause 22 of the present Mutiny Act it was provided that no sentence of corporal punishment should exceed 50 lashes. That clause was put in about 30 years ago, and that clause prevented the provost marshal from giving more than 50 lashes. That was not a matter of contention, because the Government had put opposite this very line in the Bill — "Mutiny Act, Clause 22," referring to this clause. This clearly proved that the old Mutiny Act governed the number of lashes the provost marshal could inflict; and, therefore, that this clause fixed the number of lashes that the provost marshal could give—in fact, there was no other reference to him in the Bill than that contained in this clause. There was, also, another line of argument. Clause 22 declared that the powers of the provost marshal should be regulated by the rules of the Service, and that was exactly the point which they were now discussing. As the provost marshal chiefly dealt with flogging, this was a very important rule of the Service. He thought, upon consideration of these points, which could not have been known to him previously, that the Chairman might be fairly asked to consider his ruling, and not prevent them from discussing the powers of the provost marshal under this clause.

Colonel Stanley

MR. PARNELL, before the Chairman gave his decision, wished to point out, in addition to what had been said, that there was no limitation in Clause 72, either as to the nature or the extent of the punishment inflicted by the provost marshal; and, therefore, if it was not limited by this clause, it would not be limited at all, and the General in command might order any extent of flogging that he chose.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that it was not for him to pronounce any opinion as to the construction put upon the old Mutiny Act by the provost marshals. He could only give the Committee the benefit of the conclusion at which he had arrived as to the construction of the Bill before it. It appeared to him very clear that this clause defined the crimes for punishment as those crimes under the cognizance of courts martial. By Clause 72, the powers and jurisdiction of the provost marshal were indicated. Those powers were stated to be regulated, as the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had said, by the rules of war and the usages of the Service. The first part of the clause made provision that—"The general or other officer commanding the forces on active service shall cause the provost marshals to exercise the powers entrusted to them in such manner and under such circumstances as he may consider to be best calculated to prevent and instantly to repress offences injurious to the discipline of the forces under his command and to the public service. The duties of provost marshals shall be to take charge of persons confined for offences punishable under this Act, to preserve good order and discipline, to prevent the commission of offences by persons subject to military law belonging to the said forces, and to punish on the spot, or on the same day, those whom they may detect in the actual commission of any offence punishable under this Act which they may be instructed to repress."

It was quite true there was no express limitation of these powers, and it would be quite open to hon. Members, when they came to Clause 72, to propose to insert some limitation. But the present was not the time at which to propose a limit to the power of the provost marshal. If it was made at all, it ought to be made during the discussion of Clause 72.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, of course, every hon. Member would feel that the statement of the hon. Gentleman opposite was thoroughly satisfactory as far as his own personal inclination went; but, at the same time, the Committee would make a mistake, if it adopted the solution which was now proposed as an acceptable one. In fact, it would land them in very considerable difficulty hereafter. According to what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had proposed, it was to be left to him to see if he could, on a subsequent stage of the Bill, bring up such a Schedule of offences as had been suggested by himself and had been recommended by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). It must be remembered, however, that upon the Report the House would not have the opportunity which it enjoyed in Committee of examining the details of such a Schedule; and if this debate had taught them nothing else, it had certainly taught them the necessity and importance of considering a measure of this intricate character with all possible care. He was quite sure that the time which had been spent in discussing the offences for which flogging was to be inflicted would not be found to be wasted.

COLONEL STANLEY begged pardon for interrupting. He had used a wrong term. He, of course, did not mean to use the word "Report." The Schedule would be discussed when they came to the Schedule of the Bill.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that was what he was going to propose; and if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would agree to that, and would allow, in Sub-section 6 of Clause 44, after the word "lashes," the insertion of the words "and shall be subject to the provisions hereinafter mentioned," he would have done all that was necessary to meet the present difficulty and to satisfy the Committee. The conditions under which flogging should be inflicted would be more particularly discussed at another stage of the Bill.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was afraid he was out of Order in proposing it; but what he would suggest would be that after the word "circumstances," in line 34, they should insert these words, "or for any other crimes than those specified in the Schedules." He thought that would meet the difficulty.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON was anxious to point out that if Her Majesty's Government could see their way to accept the Amendment of the hon.

and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), which occurred a few lines further down in the Paper, it would meet the views of hon. Members. ["No, no!"] Well, it would, at any rate, meet the views of a very large number of hon. Members on that side of the House. If the punishment of flogging were restricted for those offences for which death could be inflicted, it would obviate the necessity of a list of offences, and would confine the punishment to the most serious crimes. The provost marshal could not flog a soldier when he was under his own officers. It was only when he was straggling away from the Army and from military control—it was only when he was a camp-follower, in fact, that the provost marshal had the right to punish. ["No, no!"] Well, at any rate, he had no doubt he was correct in that statement, and the Committee ought not to run away with the idea that the soldier could be flogged by a provost marshal whenever he thought fit.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War had now said that he would specify in the Schedules those crimes for which flogging ought to be inflicted. What more did the Committee want? By inserting the words proposed after the word "circumstances," they had practically assured the result they desired.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the assurance given was perfectly satisfactory. When they came to Sub-section 7, however, it should be made to read thus—

"Corporal punishment, in pursuance of this Act, may be inflicted on active service, or on board any ship not commissioned by Her Majesty under the conditions stated in the Schedule to this Act," leaving out the words "which punishment, or a greater punishment."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought, as they were to be called upon to divide before very long, it was necessary they should really know what they were going to divide about. The original proposition before the Committee was that moved by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), which restricted the number of lashes to be inflicted. He wished to point out to the Committee, notwithstanding the many appeals which had been made to the Secretary of State for War, that he had made no promise which indicated his willingness to make the slightest concession. It had been properly forced on his attention that if he could not consent to the restriction of the lashes to six, he might, at least, consent to their reduction to 25. When that suggestion was made, there was to all appearance a strong disposition among hon. Members below the Gangway not to vote for the original Motion, but to accept 25 lashes as a partial settlement of the question, and to regard that as a very fair triumph for the time. But, instead of having such a promise, they had a promise given them of a totally different character, and of a very ambiguous nature. Instead of being told that the number of lashes should be reduced, they were told that the infliction of them should be limited to offences specified in the Schedule. They did not know what offences those were. And as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had not told them what would be the limitation, or what would be the character of the Schedule, they were entirely in his hands. While he would strongly advise the withdrawal of the Amendment in favour of one reducing the lashes to 25, he submitted that it would be impossible for the hon. and learned Member for Stockport to enter into any agreement on terms of the kind now proposed, for they were very indefinite, and did not touch the real proposition at all. He, for one, saw no remedy for the condition in which they were now than to adjourn the whole subject until the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could come down and make a clear and definite statement on the whole matter. The further they went, the more they discovered their inability to discuss these clauses by themselves, because they were all so mixed up one with the other that each affected the other. He would respectfully suggest, in view of the different opinions expressed, and the different interpretations put upon this clause, that it would be better to withdraw it from the consideration of the Committee until the Government could come down with a clear Schedule.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Committee would come to a decision. The vast majority of the House accepted with entire approval the proposition of his right hon. and gallant Friend. No one, of course, would ask the hon. and learned Member for Stockport to withdraw his Amendment, and he had never intended to suggest anything of the sort. What he wanted to suggest was that, the question having now been fully discussed, they should, at all events, take a Division on the maximum number of lashes. Those persons who had taken an interest in the discussion of the other question were quite content provided this Schedule were produced before the Bill left the Committee.

MR. J. BROWN thought it would be much better they should divide at once on the number of lashes, as it was absurd to keep on talking in this way about the subject. The question whether it was to be a maximum of 25 was a much better issue to put before the Committee than six, the number proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport.

MR. HOPWOOD thought the House would give him credit, although he had spoken several times, for having also held his tongue a good deal. They were now in this position—that this was the third day they had devoted to discussing this question of corporal punishment, and it was evidently one which moved the House greatly. As the debate proceeded the ranks of those who supported him had thickened, and in that fact he found a justification for the extent to which he had dwelt upon this important question. He had moved to reduce the number of these lashes, because really they were guilty of hypocrisy in talking of inflicting 50 lashes upon the soldier when the number really was in fact 450. As, therefore, the Government had declared that 50 lashes were sufficient for the purpose, he thought they should let the number really be 50 lashes. The present instrument of torture, the use of which they were again called upon to sanction that day, had nine tails, which, multiplied by six, gave 54 lashes. He submitted it was most hypocritical to pretend to be more merciful than they really were. It had been suggested to him, however, that he should remove his Amendment in order to take that suggested by his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Brown). He did not like the use of corporal punishment at all in the Army; but still he was ready to give way, if his hon. Friend would undertake to press his Amendment to a division—of course, on the understanding that he should be at liberty to press the other Amendments of which he had given Notice.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I have not taken any part in the discussion to this point, and I rise only to make an observation upon the course which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) has taken upon the question of 50 or 25 lashes. I have always supposed that the punishment which a man suffers is not merely the bodily pain and anguish to which he is put, but that part of it is the discredit which is thrown upon him by the infliction of the punishment. Well, it is obvious that the infliction of 25 lashes will bring just as much discredit upon a man, and be to him as great a disgrace, as the infliction of 50 lashes. Then, we come to the question of pain. I believe there is no Member in this House who has undergone the punishment, although some hon. Members have been in prison. I believe I cannot appeal to anybody in the House as to his personal knowledge of this indignity; but I think it is always understood that it is the first few lashes that cause the greatest pain, and that after a certain, or rather an uncertain number, according to the nervous temperament and constitution of the prisoner, that the punishment becomes, so far as feeling goes, almost nil. If that be so, if you have a sufficient amount of odium cast upon a man by 25 lashes, and you give him the proportion of pain which 50 lashes would give him, surely it may fairly be argued that 25 lashes would be just as influential in the field, or anywhere else, to restrain men by the fear of it, or to punish them if they be guilty, as any larger number. We see that the barbarism of past times has been condemned. Fifty years ago—I think it was in the year 1832—the limitation of 50 lashes was introduced. May not we now go further, and limit still more the barbarism even of 50 years ago? I am not, happily for myself, connected with military affairs at all, except, indeed, so far as helping to pay a great deal of taxes; but, if I were a soldier, I should speak, I think, much more strongly than I do now, in condemnation of this punishment. It is, no doubt, wholly out of accord with our times. War itself is barbarous enough, but even Armies are less barbarous than they were in times past; and surely a legislative and popular Assembly like this, feeling, as we must feel, that we should speak the sentiment and the feeling of the vast majority outside this House, must prevail upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to accept the Amendment of 25 lashes. If he should not consent, I hope the House will put a conclusive pressure upon him, and that he will find himself in a minority in the Lobby on the division. I shall vote most certainly and most anxiously in favour of the limitation which has been proposed.

MR. MACDONALD had listened to the debate with very great interest, because he was himself well acquainted with the effects of corporal punishment. They were asked to continue by this Bill in the hands of officers a power which they had held for centuries. They were to confer on persons of a certain class the same powers which their predecessors had held. The power, he would assert, had neither been used wisely or well, but positively in a brutal and unmanly manner. They, therefore, ought not to be intrusted with the power of flogging their fellow-men. A case in point came before his mind most forcibly. His father served in Her Majesty's Fleet, and distinguished himself at the taking of no less than seven Islands in the West Indies; but a drunken captain, in a moment of caprice, at 2 o'clock in the morning, because he was drunk, thought that his father had let the tiller fall upon his head. The hands were ordered up for punishment, although it was 2 o'clock in the morning; his father received seven dozen lashes on his back, and, to the hour of his death, the weals stood up thicker than his fingers. He did protest against this power being placed in the hands of any man. He protested against even 25 lashes; that number represented 225 cuts, and a skilful man could bring his lash to bear with such precision that every single cut told with unerring certainty. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had told them that a soldier liked this, and had produced a miserable instance of a single soldier who had preferred flogging to another sort of punishment. He ventured to say that no Minister had ever offered such a defence for so abominable and degrading a punishment. They were told that soldiers liked it. No doubt, as eels liked skinning. What opportunity had the soldiers had of telling them their views about it. If they had met in their barracks, or out of them, to tell the House their views and to protest against the punishment, they would have got a dose of "cat" that would have kept them lively for weeks, and made them, if not wiser, at any rate suffering men. Had they met to vote for the lash in the Colonies, in the Settlements—in any of the great military depôts? the theory was too monstrous to conceive. It did not do credit to the head, the heart, or the humanity of the Secretary of State for War to make a statement of the kind. The punishment was a degrading one, and the power of inflicting it should never be placed in the hands of any man.

MR. O'DONNELL was especially glad that a Member of the House, who was, in so practical a sense, a representative of the mass from whom the Army was recruited, had spoken, and spoken, too, in a manner so worthy of the obligation which he owed to his constituents. He, himself, was opposed, root and branch, to the infliction of flogging in the Army, whether inflicted by the provost marshal or by a court martial. He looked forward with hope to the time when the Army would be really a respectable Army; when men would not consider it a slur to have served Her Majesty in the ranks; and he believed that every limitation which the Committee placed upon the use of barbarous punishments would tend to force the authorities at the War Office so to improve the conditions of the Service as really to make the Army an Army of respectable citizens. At present, he would only refer to two points under discussion. He might say, in the first place, that, from personal information received from most trustworthy authorities, there was never a thing done or spoken in that House which would produce so evil an effect, or so rankling an effect, in Ireland, as the news that there had been constant flogging in the Connaught Rangers. Certainly he desired most strongly to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport, when he protested against the composition of the British lash. On this subject he had received a letter that morning which, with the permission of the Committee, he would read. He did not know the writer; but, still, he believed the letter was one which ought to be laid before the House. It was as follows:—

Mr. Macdonald

"Sir, seeing that Members of the House of Commons doubt the statements made as to the effects of the punishment of the lash, I will give you my experience of it. Thirty-five years ago I belonged to the 7th [Queen's Own] Hussars, and at the time I bore a good character."

Now, that statement must impress upon hon. Members the demoralization that was produced by the lash once inflicted even in the lightest possible manner.

"My crime was calling out 'hullo' in answer to a sergeant who called my name. I was warned for a court martial, tried, sentenced, punished, and in hospital in less than two hours."

The name of the colonel was given in this letter, but he (Mr. O'Donnell) did not think it was necessary to state it in that House; for, clearly, the colonel was one of those martinets who were daily becoming more scarce in the Army as civilization proceeded. This man was sentenced by his colonel, who was at once judge and prosecutor, to 100 lashes—that being, as the hon. and learned Member for Stockport had correctly pointed out, not 100, but 900 lashes. This happened in the year 1846, and the writer, detailing what had occurred, continued—

"My boots were filled with blood. The marks are still to be seen on my back and neck. My back is often aching, and where the cords of the cat cut I can get no rest; so that I have been, in reality, punished for 33 years by a bad tempered colonel, and that for no crime. I am now nearly 60 years, and I suppose I shall suffer to my death."

The writer had given him (Mr. O'Donnell) his name, but he did not think it necessary to repeat it. The man served in the C troop of the Queen's Hussars, and the letter was open privately to the inspection of any Member of the Committee who desired to see it. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport had, indeed, done good service, when he pointed out the cruel mockery of taking the 50 lashes inflicted as 50 lashes only, when really there were nine cuts inflicted by every blow of the lash.

MR. BIGGAR was of opinion that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport had made a mistake in withdrawing his Motion to reduce the number of lashes to six, merely for the sake of getting a rather larger ma-majority in favour of the Motion to reduce the number of lashes to 25. In his opinion, he would have done much better to have stood by his first proposal; for, even as a matter of tactics, it was injudicious to withdraw the Amendment. After all, the final authority which must decide this question was not the House of Commons, but the people of England; and the question they had to consider was, whether or not they would submit to return Members who had voted in favour of this outrageous and degrading punishment. The Army was drawn from a class of people from whom a large proportion of the electors was also drawn, and to them must be left the decision of the question. They had certainly not had the advantage of very much argument in favour of this proposition. So far as he could recollect, the front Government Bench had not contributed anything in the shape of argument in support of the principle of flogging, but simply stated, in general terms, that they believed it was advisable that the system should continue. But if they had heard nothing of argument from the front Treasury Bench, they had listened to some arguments from independent Members; and, certainly, from one of them he should never have expected to have heard a word in support of such a system—he meant the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). That hon. Gentleman argued very strongly in favour of flogging; but the illustration he quoted was a most unfortunate one. The troops in South Africa, they had already heard, were killing the wounded in the field, and smoking the savages out of caves; but the hon. Gentleman seemed to forget that the men who did this were under the control and protection of their officers—the same men who, were they on a court martial, would be parties to inflicting the punishment of flogging upon them. If, then, this punishment was to be continued, he should be disposed to argue that the officers, equally with the men, should be liable to it. The correspondent of The Evening Standard at the Cape had made a long statement as to the flogging which was going on there, from which it appeared that it was even inflicted for offences arising out of drunkenness, if not for drunkenness itself. The hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) had twitted the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) with his ignorance on this subject, and had declared that this punishment, which was exceedingly rare, could only be inflicted by a court martial. As a matter of fact, it was quite the other way; they had the testimony of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), that this punishment was very often inflicted for the most trivial offences.

MR. MONK wished to say a word or two before the Amendment was withdrawn. The hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown) had suggested 25 lashes instead of six, as proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport; but he was afraid, from the language used by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that he would not accept the Amendment. At any rate, there was no intimation on the part of the Government that they would accept any lower number of lashes than 50. That being so, it would be very undesirable that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport should withdraw his Amendment. There were many Members on that side of the House who considered this punishment of flogging was utterly repugnant and utterly unworthy of the British Army. Therefore, he hoped he would not withdraw his Amendment, and that he would do his best to limit the number of lashes. Unless they heard from the Treasury Bench that the Government were willing to reduce the number from 50 to 25, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not withdraw.

MR. SHERIDAN thought, if the Government would adopt 25 instead of 50 lashes that some progress might be made; as he gathered from what had been said by his hon. Friends sitting round him that such an Amendment would be accepted on that side of the House as a settlement of the question for this Session. In the event, however, of that Amendment not being accepted, he understood his hon. and learned Friend would not be satisfied by merely taking one division on the subject.

MR. CALLAN said, some few days ago the Home Secretary informed them that he had placed in the Library, for the information of Members, some specimens of diseased salmon. It would tend very much to the elucidation of this serious calculation about nine times six, if the War Office would place in the Library some specimens of this cat with nine tails. It was very unfair, as he thought, to ask Members to withdraw a Motion as to flogging until they had before them some specimens of the cat. There was a Society in England, of which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was a distinguished ornament—the Protestant Alliance—and the other morning he received from it a series of illustrations of the implements of torture employed by the Jesuits, and among them was a cat for flogging. That, however, was a cat with only three tails.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged pardon for interrupting; but he wished to inform the hon. Member that he did not belong to the Protestant Alliance.

MR. CALLAN replied, that if the hon. Member was not a member of that Society he ought to be, for it was a highly respectable body, composed of persons of extreme views. The cat, shown in those woodcuts he had referred to, had three tails, with a number of pellets on each, and it was said to be used in the unfortunate monastic institutions of this country. He, for one, would not consent to the withdrawal of the Amendment. He objected to lay a single lash on the back of the British soldier. They did not flog men for beating their wives, and yet they proposed to submit a soldier, at the decision of a military tribunal, to this degrading punishment.

MR. HOPWOOD, in asking the permission of the Committee to withdraw his Amendment, wished to read again the letter quoted by his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell), in order to make a correction of the letter. This punishment was given in 1846, and the man now wrote—

“My boots were filled with blood. The marks are still to be seen on my back and neck. My back is all breaking out where the knots of the cat cut, and I can get no rest; so that I have been punished for 33 years by a hot-tempered colonel, and that for no crime.”

The time was past for an act so arbitrary as that. He wished to withdraw his Amendment, in deference to the proposition pressed upon him by a number of his Friends. He would ask those who had been supporting him to yield. He urged the hon. Member for Gloucester and other hon. Members to let him do so, because he had still other Amendments upon which this struggle could be renewed. They had fought this battle together, and he asked them now to let him withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that he would proceed with his other Amendments, and ask them to assist him in fighting them.

MR. SULLIVAN earnestly appealed to the Government not to press the matter on without taking notice of the feeling which had been expressed by hon. Members. He shared with the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) his sentiment of horror and aversion for this brutality; and he put it, upon those strong observations made by the hon. Member, that the Government ought to see that there existed a deep and conscientious horror at this punishment. In the matter of the lash they were dealing with no ordinary question of legislation, but with a matter which touched every man of conscience. He put it to the hon. Member for Gloucester to defer to the discretion and guidance of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport, who, he believed, had that day gained a great victory for humanity. He (Mr. Sullivan) had the honour of standing opposed to this punishment when friends were few, and when endeavours to do away with it were characterized as obstruction. But they were vindicated that day by many hon. Gentlemen who, to their credit be it told, had said there had been a great grievance. He had a strong aversion to any number of lashes whatever; but he asked his hon. Friends to offer no opposition to the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), whose work that day would long be remembered by his countrymen.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. BROWN moved, in page 19, line 27, to leave out “fifty,” and insert “twenty-five.”

MR. SULLIVAN could not agree that the right hon. Gentlemen whom he saw before him would allow officialism to make torpid their high personal sense of responsibility. He appealed to them, as individuals, not to allow their official character to blind them to the position in which they stood with regard to this question. The Committee had listened to the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), who had advanced to the Table a short time ago. If he (Mr. Sullivan) might say anything in the nature of a compliment to him after his long years of service to his country, he would say that he never interposed in a public debate more creditably to his public character than upon that occasion. Twenty-five lashes were surely enough; what defence could possibly be made for retaining 50 as against 25? The defence that would be attempted was, he supposed, that they could not do without that number. That had been the defence used for 1,000 lashes, and for 500 lashes; and it was, moreover, the defence which had obstructed the humane efforts of the man who brought the number down to 50. He felt it would be less than human not to make an effort to push still further this reform. He appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and said, upon this matter of 25 lashes, that, as it was to the credit of this Government to bring the punishment down from 100 lashes to 50, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be the man to push that great reform still further in the direction of humanity, and say that 25 lashes would be amply sufficient to preserve discipline.

Mr. Callan

COLONEL MURE thought the Government should agree to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown). Fifty lashes were, in his opinion, too many, and were apt to make a man ill. He did not think that flogging could be done away with entirely; but the time had, in his opinion, arrived for its further reduction.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I venture, also, to appeal to the Government. I would ask them very seriously to consider the position in which they stand, and will stand, if they resolve to reject this Amendment. During a great part of the discussion I admit I have not been present, and I, therefore, have no intention of entering again into arguments which have formerly been stated upon one side and the other as to the maximum number of lashes which is necessary to be given. But I say, first, that I have been, in common with a very large number of Members on both sides of the House, very much struck with what has fallen from my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). No one of us can doubt that, as to the degradation of punishment, it exists to the same extent, whether the number is 25 or 50. As to the pain, also, there can be but very little difference. What I wish the Government to consider is, how they stand in relation to the progress of this Bill by adhering to the number of 50 lashes, which it specifies. This question has been discussed at very great length; and it must be evident to the Government that if they refuse to take the compromise that is now suggested, the matter will not be disposed of at this Sitting. Now, I should be the very last to ask the Government to give way to any proposition based upon any unworthy motive, or instituted simply for the purpose of retarding or obstructing the Public Business; but the Government must very clearly see by this time that there does exist amongst the Members of the House a very strong, vehement, and honest feeling that the number of lashes inflicted in corporal punishment should not be so great as is proposed by the clause. The Government, I think, would be wise not to disregard that strong feeling, considering how it has been manifested, and to accept the proposed Amendment which, I believe, offers the only chance they will have of making the progress with this measure which we all desire. I hope they will not determine to persevere in a course which is unnecessary, and which must cause great delay in the progress of the Bill.

MR. MILBANK was old enough to remember men getting 100, 200, and 300 lashes, and had himself seen their backs cut to a jelly:—he had seen, not only the blood but the flesh fly off their backs. It was the practice in the Army to exercise 10 or 12 drummer-boys in the art of drumming for two days before the flogging took place; this could not but be degrading to the Army. In the Cavalry regiments the farrier majors did the flogging. He had seen 100 lashes given to a man, who took them without wincing; another man would faint very soon, and water would be given him from a sponge, for he would have no power to drink. He thought that flogging in the Army ought to be done away with.

Mr. HERMON rose for the purpose of adding his voice in favour of the appeal made to the Government. He could not help thinking that the extreme punishment of 25 lashes would never be administered. At the same time, it appeared to him that that number would be sufficient for the enforcement of discipline. After the appeal which had been made from both sides of the House, he trusted the Government would give way. He did not urge this upon the score of saving time, but upon a principle of humanity, for he felt quite certain that flogging was sufficient to ruin a man for life.

COLONEL ALEXANDER desired, also, to join in the appeal to the Government to assent to the proposed Amendment. He agreed with the view expressed by the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) that 25 lashes were really quite sufficient, for when a soldier was on service he was disqualified for duty by receiving 50 lashes. Even taking it upon that low ground, it was very important that the number should be reduced. With regard to the severity of the punishment, there was very little feeling or sense after the first few lashes.

COLONEL STANLEY trusted the Committee would allow him, very briefly, to interpose. He could not help feeling that the position in which he was placed was one of some difficulty. On one side, he stood with very little experience, as the Representative of a Department over which he had the honour to preside, in a matter which concerned the interest of a Service spread over all parts of the globe, under circumstances of discipline which were not analogous to those in any other country. On the other hand, he did not wish to shelter himself behind the opinions of anyone. But he was bound, nevertheless, to consider and weigh the opinions of those who, from their position, authority, or experience, were cognizant of the necessities of the Army, and were best able to give advice in matters of discipline. Owing to the consideration of which he had spoken, he had hesitated long to assent to any alteration in this punishment, because he felt that the only alternative for the maintenance of discipline would be to fall back upon the severer systems known to other countries; but when officers, like the hon. and gallant Members for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) and Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), who had served in various countries in the world, declared that 25 lashes would be as effectual as the 50 proposed in the clause, he could not but feel that, supported by their opinion, there was room for the exercise of further judgment and consideration. He had never been one of those who had left out of sight that the military law of this country, though in some respects based upon usage, had, in later years, as had been distinctly pointed out, been held to be guided by statutory powers. He did not think, having said this much, that it would be right on his part to avoid noticing the evident pre-disposition of the House in favour of a reduction of this punishment. He hoped the House would understand that it was not a personal matter. He had briefly stated why he considered it his duty not lightly to give way to an Amendment which, to his mind, would perhaps in some cases make the punishment of so little effect as to render it necessary to substitute another of greater severity; but he felt, after the discussion which had taken place, after considering the quarters from which opposition had arrived, and being greatly influenced by the opinion of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire—who, he believed, was not alone on his side of the House in the view which he took of the question—that he ought to assent, however tardily, to the evident judgment of the Committee. Therefore, without asking the Committee to go to the trouble of a division, he would assent to the reduction of the number of lashes to 25.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the Committee would remember that in agreeing to the withdrawal of his last Amendment he had carefully guarded himself against being supposed to retreat from the position which he had assumed with regard to this matter; because he felt that this was due to those around him who entertained with him an absolute, determined, and resolute hatred to this punishment in every shape and form. He still wanted that which he called the hypocrisy of the clause done away with. When the Committee said 25 lashes, it did not mean nine times 25 stripes. If any hon. Member would calculate the number of stripes that would be given by 25 lashes of the cat, he would see for himself that it was a gross and excessive punishment. He would therefore move, in page 19, line 28, to leave out the word "lashes," and insert the word "stripes."

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 28, to leave out the word "lashes," and insert the word "stripes."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question put, "That the word 'lashes' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 219; Noes 102: Majority 117.—(Div. List, No. 121.)

MR. HOPWOOD said, the Committee would not be surprised to find that he proposed to proceed with the next Amendment standing in his name—to insert, in page 19, line 28, after the word "lashes," as now confirmed by the House, the words—

"With an instrument or whip of not more than one thong or tail, of a pattern to be submitted to Parliament."

He wanted still to urge upon the Committee that they ought to do away with the hypocrisy of saying they wanted 225 lashes, when they meant only 25. He could not too often impress upon the Committee that such hypocrisy amounted to falsehood in law, and that a falsehood would be put through our Statute Book unless his Amendment was adopted. He had been reminded the other day by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that one might make a whip of one thong or tail so cruelly brutal in its effects as to deceive and disappoint his (Mr. Hopwood's) expectations after the passing of a law which defined the lashes to be inflicted by "a whip of one thong or tail." It was perfectly true that a whip might be made—as was the case in the Island of Jamaica—of pianoforte wire; but when once they entered upon this path of endeavouring to repress crime by cruelty, there was no limit to the demands which were made upon their ingenuity. There was, although the right hon. and gallant Gentleman might not be aware of the fact, a precedent for the suggestion of having a sealed pattern of the instrument of torture submitted to Parliament, which occurred in the Naval Department under the late First Lord of the Admiralty, where it now remained, for the prevention of the vagaries of private cruelty in the manufacture of the instrument of severity. He, therefore, moved his Amendment; and if there was any difficulty as to the manner in which the instrument should be submitted to Parliament, it could be settled later on; but the Committee, he thought, should at least pass the words directed against the ingenious inventions of cruelly-disposed persons.

Amendment proposed,

After the word "lashes," to insert the words "with instrument or whip of not more than one thong or tail, of a pattern to be submitted to Parliament."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had already explained that the words proposed to be added were entirely unnecessary, and might lead to a misapprehension which would entirely defeat the object of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport. He had communicated with the Home Office and with the Admiralty on this subject, and understood that, in regard to the instrument of discipline which was used in prisons and on board ship, there were sealed patterns. He had himself in the same manner offered to seal a pattern, but did not propose to place it anywhere in the House.

Mr. A. H. BROWN hoped the hon. and learned Member would not press his Amendment, and suggested that the effect of an instrument which would concentrate the force now spread over nine lashes into one would be far more painful, and certainly more dangerous.

LORD ELCHO said, he had listened very carefully to the discussion which had taken place on that occasion. His sympathies were strongly in favour of the speech made by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) who, he was very glad, had succeeded in inducing the Government to schedule the crimes for which this punishment might be inflicted. He was also glad that the Government had yielded to the evidently strong feeling which existed in the House in favour of reducing the number of lashes to 25; but the Amendment now proposed to the Committee by the hon. and learned Member, who in this matter of reducing the punishment had the House really with him, was, he could not help feeling, a reductio ad absurdum. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport would, in his opinion, do well to be content with his victory, and not throw away its fruits, as he was in a great measure doing. Let him, if he chose, on another occasion, try to improve his victory by proposing the entire abolition of the punishment of flogging; but, in following up his present line, he was making the whole thing ridiculous; and he (Lord Elcho) would suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman, in order to carry out his view of what the kind of "cat" ought to be, should get the word "Manx" inserted before "cat," because Manx cats, it was notorious, had no tails at all.

MR. PARNELL said, the Amendment was not so much a reductio ad absurdum as the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) seemed to think. The reason why the First Lord of the Admiralty had promised that a sealed pattern of the "cat" should be kept in his Department was, that it had been pointed out to him by the noble Lord the Member for Clare (Lord Francis Conyngham), who had been at sea, that two descriptions of cats were in use in the Navy, and that one of these was of a very severe nature, indeed. The other "cat" was much less severe in its effects. He would like to know what description of "cat" had been adopted by the Admiralty and the Home Office? The Committee had a right to know what pattern the Secretary of State for War proposed to adopt, because he might select a very severe instrument in ignorance. There was a great point in this; as punishment might be made very much more severe by adopting the "cat" now used for flogging thieves and men convicted of disgraceful offences.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) was quite right in asking whether the "cat" to be used in the Army was the same as that employed in the civil prisons and in the Navy? The House and the country were entitled to know if that was so or not. The cat consisted really of three elements—first, there was the handle. ["Oh, oh!"] Who said "Oh?" [An hon. MEMBER: I did.] He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) wished the hon. Member who said "Oh!" had something to say "Oh!" for. The cat consisted of the handle, the lashes, and the knots upon the lashes. According to the length of the handle, the material or lashes, and the number of knots, was the severity of the punishment to be measured. A much more severe punishment could be inflicted by a cat of a greater length than that which was in ordinary use. He believed that in the prisons of this country there was a standard laid down. The handle had to be of a certain length, the lashes made of a certain material, and to have upon them a certain number of knots. It might seem to hon. Members rather an absurd thing to enter into these details; but when the Jamaica Mutiny was put down a few years ago what was the cat that was used there? It was recorded in the Blue Books of the House that the cat used there was made of piano wires. Could the Government suppose that when they were settling this painful subject once for all it was to be left entirely at the option of the colonel of a regiment to select any kind of cat he pleased? The cat employed in the civil prisons of this country had frequently been described in recent years by the reporters of the principal newspapers who had witnessed the punishment of garotters; and the details, though disagreeable enough, were not of a character that seemed to show that the punishment was more severe than it ought to be, if it was to be retained at all. He apprehended that they would all be satisfied if the Secretary of State for War would give them an assurance that the instrument to be employed would be similar to that in use in the civil prisons of the country.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was not desirable that the House should too much usurp the functions of the Executive Government by attempting to regulate such details as they were now asked to consider. He hoped it would not go forth to the country that the sympathies of the House were entirely on the side of criminals in the Army. If the Committee could not trust the Government to regulate the form and size of the "cat-o'-nine tails," how were they to be trusted to provide for the clothing and arming of our troops, and for the health and comfort of men who had committed no offence at all? It would be just as reasonable to ask for sealed patterns of everything in use in the Army. It appeared to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had done all that it was in his power to do. He had promised that there should be a sealed pattern; and it would not be fair to presume that the authorities at the War Office would make that one of unnecessary severity. If it should be so, the pattern would be accessible to inspection, and the fact concerning it could be easily ascertained; and he, therefore, suggested that the proper time to bring the subject forward was on the Army Estimates, and not at the present time.

Lord Elcho

MR. HOPWOOD said, that anything which fell from the noble Marquess would always have great weight with him; but he could not help thinking that on the present occasion the noble Lord had misconceived the precise bearing of the question and the meaning of his (Mr. Hopwood's) remarks upon it. He did not care so much for the submission of the thing to Parliament; so that if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would agree that the instrument to be used for flogging purposes should only have one thong, and be made according to a sealed pattern, he would withdraw his Amendment; but he objected to the number of lashes to which a man was sentenced being multiplied by nine, or any other number of thongs, which might be attached to the handle of the whip. It was not possible to let this proposal pass in its present abominable shape—a shape which embodied a lie promulgated by the Parliament of this country, and inflicting upon its gallant Army the liability to a shameful punishment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, it was perfectly true, as had been stated, that this was a question of detail; but it was not fair to object to the course which had been taken on that ground, because the Committee had been fighting on a point of detail during the whole day, and had just changed the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. It was not sufficient to leave these matters in the hands of the Executive Government; because it was one of the essential functions of the whole House and of its Committees to criticize the actions of the Executive, and to see that such Government conformed to the intentions of the Legislature. The detail now before the Committee was as to the nature of the instrument to be employed in flogging the soldiers forming the British Army; and, as far as he was personally concerned, he should be glad to get rid of the questions of detail by getting rid of the flogging altogether; for, in his view, no man who was capable of an offence justifying so degrading a punishment was fit to carry arms in the Forces of Her Majesty. There ought to be no floggees in the Army; but as long as there were, he should maintain his right to discuss questions of detail as to the nature of the instrument to be used, and further to be informed on the point. The remarkable letter which he read a little time back also referred to a matter of detail; but it was a matter of the utmost importance to the writer of the letter, a soldier 60 years of age, who stated that during 33 years he bore, in a shattered constitution and aching frame, the consequences of a ruthless flogging inflicted upon him for one crime; and he laid especial stress upon the point that the knots on the cat-o'-nine-tails had so eaten into his flesh that his back was continually breaking out at the places where the knots had hit him. He therefore ventured to submit that a lash with knots upon it was not a bond fide lash, but an instrument calculated to inflict not only stripes, but punctured wounds in addition. If it was not beneath the dignity of the House to consider the question of flogging the defenders of the country, it could not be beneath its dignity to consider the character of the instrument with which the discipline was to be inflicted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the Committee would agree to divide at once upon this question, which had been very fully discussed. He was unwilling to believe there was any intention to talk out the matter. One important point in connection with the Bill had been settled to the general satisfaction of the Committee; and if this question was settled also, some progress, though not much, would have been made with the measure.

MR. PARNELL hoped it would not be necessary for the Committee to divide at all, as he thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had misunderstood the nature of the Amendment, which had only been proposed for the purpose of eliciting information as to whether in future the cat at present in use was to be used. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not know let him say so, and the question could be brought up again on the Army Estimates.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he did not know whether the Army cat was more severe in its punishment than that used in prisons; but he did know that the same cat was used generally in the Army, and he proposed to leave the matter in its present state.

MR. BIGGAR could not accept the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Burghs (the Marquess of Hartington), that this was a matter which could be well left in the hands of the Executive Government. The House, having been unfortunate in leaving several important matters connected with prison discipline in the hands of the Executive, had a right to give instructions as to what should be done as far as this matter was concerned.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 164: Majority 110.—(Div. List, No. 122.)

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

COUNCIL OF INDIA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in rising to call attention to the manner in which the design of Parliament in providing a Council both in India and in England, composed of men of experience in Indian affairs as advisers and checks upon the Executive, particularly in matters of finance, has been evaded and defeated by the action of the Viceroy and the Secretary of State; and to move—

“An Address for Copies of the Minute by Members of the Council of the Governor General of India on the Despatch of the Secretary of State, dated the 11th day of November 1875, and referred to in the Despatch of the Government of India, dated the 17th day of March 1876; and, of all communications which have passed between the Secretary of State for India and the Government of India, or the Governor General, relating to the repeal of the Cotton Duties (in continuation of the Papers presented to Parliament in 1876);”

said, that the Government of India was, perforce, a despotic Government. That was a fact which we might regret, but which we were obliged to accept. We had been unable to give to India the inestimable boon of self-government and representative institutions; but if our government of that country should ever result in our being able to give its people that boon, our government would reach its legitimate end. Meanwhile, there was no doubt whatever that the central authority which governed India must be supreme, and he should not, in his observations, therefore, say anything which would contravene that position. It was indispensable that the English government of India should be an absolute government; but it would not, he thought, be consistent with the sentiments, the sympathies, and the traditions of the English people or Parliament, if they were to allow that absolute government to be unrestricted and uncontrolled. No man had as yet been created who was fit to exercise uncontrolled power over 200,000,000 of his fellow-creatures. That being so, England had to solve the great problem of reconciling the necessity of a supreme power with such checks as should restrain the faults which must always gather round a despotism. England had, consequently, given to India a Constitution which, though much inferior to our own, would, if fairly worked, present checks against the abuse of the supreme authority of the central power. What he wanted to ask the House was, whether the restraints provided by the Constitution upon the absolute despotic government of India had been fairly dealt with and honestly accepted? He was sorry to say that public opinion had failed to exercise much control over the supreme central authority in India. The English Parliament had, up to a recent date, been too much occupied with other matters, which were not, perhaps, of the same magnitude as the government of India. He felt bound to say that the history of Parliament in reference to its duties to India was not creditable to the Legislature. The object of the English people was that the blast of despotism should be tempered to the shorn lamb of the subject-race; and during the time of the old East India Company, Parliament had a sufficient guarantee that that would take place. The Charters of that Company had to be renewed at intervals, and, on such occasions, opportunities were afforded to decide whether India was being properly governed; but since the government of India had passed into the hands of the Crown, the set opportunities which previously existed for reviewing the nature of our Indian responsibilities had unhappily disappeared, and we had now to depend entirely on public opinion as expressed in the House, and according to the chance opportunity which might be afforded. He thought, however, that now there were indications that Parliament had shaken off its lethargy with respect to the affairs of our Eastern Empire. He could not forbear at this point of his remarks from paying a tribute of praise to his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), who, triumphing over natural infirmities, had, by his indefatigable industry and noble tenacity, induced public opinion at last to concern itself with India. Notwithstanding the exertions of his hon. Friend, however, he feared there was a growing tendency to set aside the checks placed upon the increasing despotism of England in the government of India. He had put upon the Paper no Party Motion—no censure upon Her Majesty's Government. The issues were far too important to be made the sport of a Party debate. He would, therefore, accept from them any reply they chose to make to it, except the tu quoque argument. If Liberal Viceroy had transgressed, let them be condemned as well as Conservative Viceroy, and let them do that, rather than allow the principles of the Indian Constitution to go by the board. What, he would ask, was the Constitution of India? It was this—the Secretary of State was the final depository of power over India. That must be so, and it ought to be so. If they desired that the English Parliament should have the supreme rule over India, the responsible Minister for that rule must sit in Parliament, or otherwise he could not be controlled by Parliament. But the House of Commons had neither the time nor the knowledge to exercise the control which was desired, and from time to time they had new men undertaking the work. When Lord Cranbrook, for whom he had the greatest respect, for instance, became Secretary of State for India, he knew just as much about our Indian Empire as any other well-educated English gentleman knew about it. The Governor General of India was in precisely the same position, and the Secretary of State was expected to act as a brake or check upon the Government of India. Therefore it was that Parliament most wisely established, as a control upon the Secretary of State in England, the Council of India—a body of intelligent, impartial, and experienced men, of about the same number as the ordinary Cabinet of England. That number—15—could not be said to be too large, when they considered the variety of interests there were to deal with. Practically speaking, the Secretary of State for India was obliged, in every communication which he made to India, to submit it to the Council, or lay the communication open for their perusal; but he was not bound by their opinion, even if it were that of the majority; in which case his opinion for differing from them must be recorded, except in the case of inquiry, when he need not wait for their opinion to be reconsidered. In all other matters, he was bound to communicate what he sent to India to his Council, and they had the right to make their Minutes on those communications, and, in that manner, be a check on the action of the Secretary of State for India. There was, however, one exception from that rule—and it had reference to matters which used to go through what was called “the Secret Committee.” Such matters were not submitted to the Council; but, by the Act of 1858, they were limited to the levying of war, the making of peace, the entering into engagements with the Native Princes, and other matters of urgent and Imperial concern. He knew that there were persons who carried the authority of the Council higher than that, and held that it had an absolute veto on the whole action of the Secretary of State, and they were the principal Members of Her Majesty's present Administration. They had the high authority of the present Lord Derby, in words which he uttered when Lord Stanley, for the opinion that if, in any other matters, the Secretary of State acted solely upon his own authority, he would be guilty of a gross violation of the meaning and intention of the Act. Clause 41 of the Act of 1858 distinctly laid it down, that the Secretary of State for India should not do any act involving expenditure without the concurrence of a majority of his Council. When the question came under discussion in 1869, Lord Salisbury expressed it as his opinion that the Secretary of State had no power to oblige the Government of India to spend a farthing without the sanction of a majority of his Council; and Lord Cairns, who took a similar view, when asked by the Duke of Argyll, as a test question, "Do you mean to say the Secretary of State could not order a war in Afghanistan without the consent of his Council?" replied, "Certainly not." Without going so far as Lord Salisbury or Lord Cairns, he (Sir William Harcourt) contended that the Council ought to have a power of protest, or remonstrance—not a mere legal veto, but a moral influence, on the actions of the Secretary of State, which was not to be easily stifled by that official. It was only in that way they could call the attention of Parliament to what they might regard as a mischievous policy; and he ventured to say, in the words of Lord Stanley, who introduced the Act of 1858, that any Secretary of State or any Viceroy who evaded or defeated the checks established by that Act abused the power intrusted to him and violated the spirit of the Constitution of 1858. That important personage might overrule the Council in ordinary affairs; but if he did, his conduct would have to be judged by Parliament, who had a right to call for the opinions of his Council on those questions, and to the protest of the Council calling the attention of the Parliament to the seriousness of the question. He contended that the Secretary of State could take, in fact, no action in communicating to the Government of India, which was to have a practical effect, unless he first brought the fact to the knowledge of his Council for their opinion. He was aware that Papers had been laid on the Table, which were intended to introduce the tu quoque argument in regard to the Duke of Argyll; but, in the first place, he was not bound by the acts of the noble Duke; and, in the second place, he was very careful that he did not interfere with the final decision. It was perfectly clear, from the words of the statute, that every order should be submitted to the Council, or deposited in the Council Chamber for at least seven days. That check had been disturbed by the Secretary of State for India in England. The power of the Governor General was even more limited, for it had a double check. The English

Colonel Stanley

Parliament constituted him an English statesman, and never intended him to be an Eastern Satrap, surrounded by janisaries and advised by eunuchs. There was, in fact, no such person known to the law as an absolute Governor General; the proper title of the Governor General, so far as he had any authority to do anything in India under the Queen, was the "Governor General in Council." Now, that being so, he wished to know how it came that in the Afghan Papers there were occasional despatches addressed to the "Governor General," as distinct, apparently, from the "Governor General in Council?" With regard to the action of the Governor General in India, in all matters of foreign policy, as well as domestic policy, he acted with his Council; he had no general power to pass over the opinion of his Council. Any Member who dissented might record his dissent; and if the majority dissented, he was obliged, under the Act of 1870, to overrule his Council. Now, the overruling of his Council was a serious act on the part of the Governor General. This power originated in the time of Lord Cornwallis, who desired to exercise it under certain circumstances. There was a later Act, the language of which was more condensed, but the object and intention of which were precisely the same. The 5th clause of the Act of 1870 provided that, when the safety and tranquillity of the British Possessions were essentially affected, the Governor General might overrule his Council. That was a just and necessary power, to be used only in exceptional cases, as everything depended upon the manner in which the power was exercised; and Lord Stanley had pointed out that if it were abused the spirit of the Constitution would be violated. Besides the Executive, there was the Legislative Council, which was a larger body; and it had been carefully provided that a number of non-official Members, more or less representing independent Indian opinion, should be placed on the Legislative Council. It was important to observe that there was one principle admitted by, he believed, every Secretary of State and assented to by Lord Salisbury in 1876, and it was that, as a general and almost unvarying rule, the initiative in Indian measures, and particularly measures of finance, should belong to the Indian Council and the Governors General in Council; that they should not be dictated from the outside, but that they should come from those who were most likely to be informed about the interests of India. This was necessary for two purposes—to maintain the authority of the Government of India in India, and to maintain the confidence of the people in that Government. In 1874, Lord Salisbury modified the rule by requiring the Government of India to communicate its measures to the Government at home before they were passed and completed; and to that he (Sir William Harcourt) made no objection as far as it went; but, in 1875, measures were taken which, rightly or wrongly, in the opinion of both the Legislative and the Executive Councils, assumed the form of dictation as to the course they were to pursue and the measures they were to pass, and the despatch of the 11th of November, 1875, for which he moved, expressed the sentiments of the Governor General in Council on the subject of that interference. The Constitution of India was one which, while it reserved the force of the central authority, provided checks that were to be fairly worked; and if those checks were set aside, nothing was left but the purest and most undiluted despotism. The practical question for the House and the Government was—Had those checks been fairly worked? If the Government, with more complete information than he could have, could establish the affirmative, no one would be more pleased than himself; but he had come to the conclusion that these checks had been set aside, and were being more and more set aside every day. There were three principal examples which affected the whole framework of Indian government in every Department of Government—namely, the Afghan War, the Vernacular Press Act, and the remission of the Cotton Duties. As regarded the first, it was strange that the Afghan War was made without consulting the Council of India at all, or letting them know anything about it, and made by a Government, two principal Members of which were Lord Cairns and Lord Salisbury. If those noble Lords were right in 1869, they did an act in 1877 and 1878 which, in their opinion, was absolutely illegal. He would admit that the Afghan question came within the Secret Committee clause; it was an affair of high foreign policy, and the Secretary of State was justified in removing it from the consideration of the Council of India in England. Why he did so was much more difficult to understand. One would have thought that in embarking upon a policy of that kind he would have desired all the assistance and support he could obtain. There was, however, no right to withdraw the matter from the Governor General in Council in India. The last despatch preceding the adoption of the new policy was a despatch from the Government of India under Lord Northbrook, dated January, 1876, objecting to that policy. When Lord Lytton went out he received instructions from the Government as to the policy he was to pursue in a despatch of the 28th of February, 1876, which was addressed, not to the Governor General in Council, but to the Governor General. There was no answer to the despatch from Lord Northbrook. The despatch to Lord Lytton was not laid before the Council. He recommended the new policy and they opposed it; and it was not until direct authority from the Secretary of State at home was laid before them that they would entertain it at all. Ultimately, as he was informed, after considerable delay, the instructions of the Secretary of State were produced to the Council. The Secretary of State never had any right to instruct the Governor General of India, apart from his Council, and to do so was contrary to the Constitution of India. How was the Council dealt with afterwards? It was now perfectly well known that three Members of the Council dissented from the new policy; and under the Indian Constitution had a right to record their dissents, and their recorded dissents ought to have been sent home to the Secretary of State. But these dissents were never recorded. Although the instructions as to the new policy were dated the 28th of February, 1876, no Report—of which Parliament had any cognizance—of these protracted discussions came home until the 10th of May, 1877. Did anybody believe that was the first intimation conveyed to the Secretary of State? Did not everybody know that communications were taking place by every mail, but that they were private communications? An important stage in the Afghanistan affairs was when the Instructions were given to Sir Lewis Pelly for the Conference at Peshawur and for the Treaty he was to submit, as an ultimatum to Shere Ali. The Council ought, of course, to have been consulted on that Treaty, and on those Instructions; a despatch should have come to the Secretary of State containing a Minute of the dissent of the three Members of the Council; and such despatch would have been available to Parliament. It was utterly impossible now to look at those Instructions without identifying the date at which the first formal and official Report as to the adoption by the Indian Council of the new policy with the circumstances of the three dissenting Members of the Council having by that time ceased to be Members. With regard to the next point, the Vernacular Press Act, the objection was to the manner in which the Council in England was dealt with. A telegram was sent by the Viceroy on the 13th of March submitting a proposal to introduce the Act. The usual course would have been to have waited until the Act was passed, and then to have considered it in England, and to have approved or rejected it. The Secretary of State, without consulting his Council or allowing them to express any opinion on the subject, telegraphed back the same day his assent substantially to the principle of the Act. This was to defeat altogether the operation of the Council in England as a check upon the action of the Secretary of State, by depriving it of all opportunity of criticism and remonstrance. Under all the circumstances of the case, the House would, he thought, be of opinion that, as far as the Indian Vernacular Press Act was concerned, the practices of the Constitution had not been fairly complied with. He came next to the third and last point with which he had to deal, and that was the repeal of the cotton duties. He did not now propose to raise in any way the question of the policy of that repeal, but he would refer to the way in which it was done. He would even assume that it was a right policy; but if it was sought to break through the checks which the Constitution imposed, there was no more insidious or dangerous way of doing so than by adopting a course which happened to be popular for the moment. The repeal of the cotton duties was, he believed, inaugurated by a speech which had been made by the Secretary of State for India at the time in Manchester in 1875, admitting that when the Revenue exhibited a small surplus the thing could not be done. The matter, therefore, was abandoned for some considerable time, and the necessity for doing the thing, per fas aut per nefas, did not arise until there was a deficit, when the Governor General in Council used the exceptional powers to which he had already referred, not in any great case of sudden emergency, but in a case of ordinary finance, to overrule the Council of India. He should like to know whether any other example could be furnished of the overruling power of the Governor General having been exercised in such circumstances? The Customs duties on cotton had been imposed by a Legislative Act, and one would suppose that the natural and legitimate way to get rid of them would have been by the passing of a Legislative Act. The Governor General, however, knew that he could not pass such an Act, because the opinion of his Council was almost unanimously against him; and he, consequently, ferreted out a section in the Customs Act under which, apparently, there was power to suspend Customs' duties. If such things as this were done, he ventured to say that their Indian Constitution would break down. The legal Member of the Council felt himself obliged to state that if such things went on the Government of India would be impossible, for it was a fraud, as to which there was no Court of Equity in India which could relieve them; and he strongly objected to the way in which the proposed change in the law was to be effected. In his (Sir William Harcourt's) opinion the only one point in which Mr. Stokes was mistaken was in saying that there was no Court of Equity to relieve the people of India. There was such a Court, and that was the Court which he had now the honour to address. The Parliament of England had the power and authority to vindicate the people of India against such outrages on the Constitution. Sir Alexander Arbuthnot, a Member of the Council of India, in dealing with the question, said there could be no doubt that the people of that country attributed the action which had been taken by the Government with respect to it to the influence of persons who were interested in the cotton trade—in other words, to the influence of the manufacturers of Lancashire; and expressed it to be his conviction that he was not overstating the case, when he declared it to be his belief that there were no officials in India who did not regard the step which had been taken as having been adopted not in the interests of India, or, even, of England, but in the supposed interests of a political Party. Sir Alexander Arbuthnot went on to say that nothing would have induced him to be a party to the imposition of restrictions on the Native Press, had he known that within a year the Government of India would have embarked on a course which, in his opinion, was so unwise and so destructive of that reputation for justice on which the rule of England in India so greatly depended. If the language of Sir Alexander Arbuthnot with reference to the operation of the Vernacular Press Act was not justifiable, he wanted to know why Her Majesty's Government did not prosecute him for using language which was injurious to the Government of India? That was what had been done in India in the matter. What had been done in England? Under a clause of the Act, if the Governor General overruled his Council, he was obliged immediately to communicate with the Secretary of State. He (Sir William Harcourt) wanted to know if the Secretary of State had received such a communication, and what he had done with regard to it? Two months ago he received a communication from the Governor General. Had he answered it? Had he approved it? Did he suggest it? In any of those cases had he submitted those communications, as he was bound to do under the Act, to the Council of India? Now happened one of the gravest things that could occur—the overruling of the Council of India by the Governor General. A communication on the subject was sent home to the Secretary of State. It was on a matter of finance, which we were told by Lord Derby must always come before the Council of India. He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, some weeks ago, whether a communication on this subject had been submitted to the Council in India; but the right hon. Gentleman, in a light and airy way, said “Oh, no, they received no communication because their responsibility is not engaged in the matter.” But Parliament meant that their responsibility should be engaged. These were not interlocutory communications, but final and conclusive. He might be misinformed on this matter. If the statements he had made were not accurate, the Under Secretary would set him right; but if those statements were well founded, it seemed to him that some explanation was due from the Government to the House. If, by the conduct of the Indian Government, a bitter impression had been produced upon the minds of men who, by their position and their habits, were naturally addicted to our government, what would be the impression upon the minds of men who were not naturally addicted to our government? What would be the effect produced by the manner in which the Council of India had been treated? If on such matters as the Afghan War, the Vernacular Press, and the finance of India, the Secretary of State did not think it worth while to communicate with the Council of India, the Government had better begin by saving the salaries of both Councils. He thought he had, at any rate, made out a case for inquiry. In this case, every check had been set aside. They had set aside, in this case, the legislative check, and the Executive check in India, and the English check. He had brought forward this subject, not for the purpose of taking a Party division, but of raising a discussion on the question of the Indian Constitution, and how far that Constitution had, or had not, been observed. He thought the facts which he had stated would show that the subject was not of a frivolous description; that his misgivings were natural; and that his apprehensions were well-founded. For his own part, he had been brought up in Whig principles—principles which, he hoped, he would always maintain. He had a great respect for the Limited Monarchy of England; and he should always desire to protect its privileges; but he was equally anxious to maintain the principle of the limitation of the Imperialism of England. No policy, however excellent its objects, could ever be successful which sought to evade or to defeat the right of legitimate discussion, or of Constitutional control. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Address of which he had given Notice.

Sir William Harcourt

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Minute by Members of the Council of the Governor General of India on the Despatch of the Secretary of State, dated the 11th day of November 1875, and referred to in the Despatch of the Government of India, dated the 17th day of March 1876 :

And, of all Communications which have passed between the Secretary of State for India and the Government of India, or the Governor General, relating to the repeal of the Cotton Duties (in continuation of the Papers presented to Parliament in 1876.)"—(Sir William Harcourt.)

MR. E. STANHOPE desired, in the first place, to offer his thanks to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford for the courtesy with which he had communicated to him personally the subjects to which he desired to call the attention of the House. It was no more than he should expect from the hon. and learned Gentleman. He confessed, when he first observed the Notice of Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he was filled with some little apprehension ; but it was some satisfaction to find, after some weeks of preparation, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had produced no more than a Motion for Papers. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he hoped he (Mr. E. Stanhope) would not make use of any tu quoque arguments. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman showed some caution in that observation, because if he had investigated the matter a little more than he had done, he would have seen that his remarks could not be limited to the last few years only. The hon. and learned Gentleman had called the attention of the House to a great number of technical points which had arisen in the course of the very difficult matters which had engaged the attention of the Government during the past few years ; and although the hon. and learned Member did not venture to say that any one act connected with those negotiations was illegal, or that he could visit it with the censure of the House, yet he asked the House, looking at all these isolated matters with a sort of kaleidoscopic effect, to come to the conclusion that there was a deliberate attempt on the part of Her Majesty's Government to set aside the checks instituted by Parliament and establish a sort of despotism. He ventured to say there was not the least foundation for such a charge. He denied that there had been any change whatever ; and he maintained that the procedure in England and India, in reference to the Councils in England and in India, was precisely the same under the present Government as it was under their Predecessors. That was a statement he made with the utmost possible confidence, and one which he did not think anyone would venture to deny. Both the Secretary of State and the Viceroy might have committed errors of policy ; but he was perfectly satisfied that his noble Friends had adopted the old procedure both in England and India, and had not departed from that procedure in the smallest possible degree. Then the hon. and learned Member suggested that there ought to be great dissatisfaction in the Council of the Secretary of State at the manner in which they had been treated. He had the advantage of living on terms of the greatest intimacy with the Members of that Council, and he thought if there had been grave dissatisfaction he should have heard of it. He fully believed that the Members of that Council, taken as a whole, were satisfied that the Secretary of State had acted with respect to them in as fair a manner as any previous Secretary of State had acted. In fact, in some respects he might say that Lord Salisbury and Lord Cranbrook presented a marked contrast, in their communications to the Council, to the Duke of Argyll, who communicated as little as possible to his Council. He should now deal with the cases mentioned by the hon. and learned Member separately. As he understood the hon. and learned Member, he referred, first, to the relations between the Secretary of State for India and his Council in England ; next to the relations between the Governor General of India and his Council in India ; and, thirdly, the hon. and learned Member dealt with the relations between the Secretary of State, as being a Member of the Government, and the Governor General of India and the Council. For the first three-quarters of an hour of the speech of the hon. and learned Member, he fancied that they were all to be a happy family, and that he would be able to say he agreed with the propositions which he laid before the House. But the hon. and learned Member proceeded, and he pointed out, under the clauses of the Act for the better government of India, that every order or communication to be sent to India had to be signed by the Secretary of State and submitted to the Council before it was sent to India, except in certain cases. The hon. and learned Member gave the House one of those cases—when the communication related to a question of peace or war, or negotiations with a Native State or Province; but to the second of the exceptions the hon. and learned Member made no reference. The hon. and learned Member made no allusion to the case of urgency. In the case of urgency the Secretary of State might send an order to India; but he was bound to put before the Council the reasons why he had sent the order.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had mentioned the exception in the case of urgency.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he begged the hon. and learned Member's pardon; in that case, he had nothing more to say on that point. There was one thing most essential for the proper government of India, and that was a complete understanding between the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. If they were to be confined to communications which passed through a great many hands, it would be very difficult for the Governor General and the Secretary of State, at such a distance and under difficult circumstances, to understand each other. Therefore, from the earliest establishment of the Government of India by Her Majesty, the system had been adopted of communication by means of private letters and telegrams between the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. The question as to the legality of personal telegrams had been settled by Papers the production of which had been moved for by the Duke of Argyll; and he did not think it necessary to say a word more in defence of them. The first question which they had to consider was, had the provisions of the Government of India Act been evaded? The first instance which the hon. and learned Gentleman had brought forward in favour of the assertion was the Vernacular Press Act; but the way in which that matter was dealt with might still be in the recollection of the House.

A telegram, setting forth the reasons for desiring to pass the Act, was sent by the Viceroy to the Secretary of State, who replied giving his sanction to the passing of the Act, but reserving his opinion as to the details which, in compliance with the statute, he would discuss with the Council; and in accordance with the Act of Parliament he had laid before his Council the reasons why he had treated that matter as "urgent." But, then, the hon. and learned Gentleman said the matter was not urgent; but upon that part of the subject he would prefer to take the opinion of Lord Lytton. The hon. and learned Gentleman was good enough to say that in regard to the Afghan War he thought that all the Secretary of State had done was perfectly legal. [An hon Member: Legal or venal?] He only wished that some of the hon. and learned Member's Colleagues had found that out sooner, for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) had insinuated a doubt, during the discussions in December last, whether there was a legal justification for the course that was pursued. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford had made great capital out of the course which had been taken by the Government of India in reference to the cotton duties, and had, in support of the case which he set up, urged that no telegraphic communications should have passed between the Home and Indian Governments; but he would ask how the government of India could be carried on unless the Home Government were able from time to time to give, by means of the telegraph, opinions and advice in difficult circumstances? The Indian Executive had occasionally to meet the criticisms of the Home Parliament, and how could they possibly do this effectually, unless they had the means of communicating easily and swiftly with Her Majesty's Ministers in London by means of the telegraph? But if it was said that to address an inquiry to the Secretary of State was an evasion of the Act, suppose he addressed it to the Prime Minister, could it be said that that was an evasion of the Act?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It would be an evasion of the grossest kind.

MR. E. STANHOPE, continuing, asked whether it could for a moment be supposed that the government of India had been carried on for the years which it had without some points being submitted to the Cabinet, and their opinion obtained, without its having first been submitted to the Council? And it would be remembered that even if such points were submitted to the Council, it was very likely that they would be unable to answer them. It had been done over and over again without being called an evasion of the Act; in fact, it would be utterly impossible to carry on the government of India unless some such system was adopted. And he should like to ask how the Indian Council was the worse off for what had taken place in the case of the cotton duties? Suppose it had not been submitted to the Cabinet, it would have been done by the Viceroy on his own responsibility, and would have been only reported home in the next Budget Statement, which would have to be submitted to the Secretary of State in Council. Coming next to the second part of the question—the relations between the Viceroy of India and his own Council—the hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out that letters had been addressed, not to the Governor General in Council, but to the Governor General himself. So far as he had been able to discover, that practice was instituted by the late Mr. Kay in the Political Department of the India Office; but it had been now abandoned, and all despatches were addressed to the Governor General in Council. Then they heard that certain dissents of members of the Viceroy's Council, in regard to his Afghan policy, were not sent home. He would not go at length into that question, because, in the first place, it was not necessary for the purposes of the debate to do so; and because, in the second, it would involve a personal and painful question; but he would simply say that at the outset of the negotiations with the Ameer certain instructions were sent to Sir Richard Pollock at Peshawur. Notes upon these instructions were written by several members of Council; but the Viceroy pointed out that that was not the proper time to record them, but that they should be reserved until the result of the negotiations was reported home. A meeting eventually took place between the Representative of Her Majesty's Government and the Minister of the Ameer of Cabul in January, 1877, and the result of the meeting was communicated to the Government of India on the 26th of March. In the opinion of the Government of India, there existed no reason for sending any Report until the conclusion of the negotiations. Some people might say that to omit to report proceedings of that kind, from time to time, would not be in conformity with the usual practice in England. Well, the Government of India thought it necessary to do so, and so in such cases had the Secretary of State frequently acted. Anyone who had studied the Blue Books would have seen that during the whole time of the Afghan negotiations in 1873 not a single despatch was written by the Duke of Argyll, the then Secretary of State. Lord Northbrook wrote one or two despatches of a meagre character; but the Duke of Argyll had not even sent any answer to the despatch of Lord Northbrook reporting the result of the negotiations which were held with the Ameer in 1873—negotiations which were, at least, of equal importance with the negotiations of 1877. After the communications received on the 26th of March, Lord Lytton and his Council immediately set to work to prepare a despatch. The documents that had reached them were excessively voluminous. A despatch was drafted, but was not ready for signature until May 10, the date on which it was sent over to England. At that time the three dissentient members had left India, so that it was impossible for their dissents to be appended to the despatch. If there had been on record any demand by those gentlemen that their notes should be turned into formal minutes, Lord Lytton would undoubtedly have given his consent to that proceeding. As it had been suggested last December that Lord Lytton kept back that despatch with the object of preventing those three gentlemen from recording their dissents, he would ask leave to read the opinion of one whose authority would be readily bowed to. He referred to Lord Northbrook, who said in the House of Lords—

“I do not blame Lord Lytton for detaining the despatch, for I do not know his reasons; and I must add that I do not think it was done for the purpose of preventing the dissents from being recorded.” — [3 Hansard, ccxliii. 494.]

Returning for a moment to the subject of the cotton duties, and to the mode in which their partial remission had been accomplished in India, he thought he was right in assuming that the hon. and learned Member opposite, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, was strongly of opinion that those duties ought not to have been repealed. Lord Lytton on the question of the cotton duties had, undoubtedly, overruled the majority of the members of his Council. He did not, however, understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman was of opinion that Lord Lytton had not the legal power to do so.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT explained, that he believed that in a financial question like that of the cotton duties Lord Lytton's action was an abuse of the overruling power.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he did not think it could be denied, at any rate, that under the terms of the Act of 1870 the Viceroy had the power of overruling the majority of his Council, and it had not been shown that he had exercised that power in any undue manner. It was not only a valuable power, but it was essential to the proper government of India. The Council, knowing that the Viceroy had the power of overruling them, acted accordingly, and, owing to the existence of that power, minorities often withdrew their opposition to propositions which had the support of the Viceroy and a strong section of the Council. That opinion was borne out by Lord Macaulay, who was himself the legal member of the Viceroy's Council, and who said in his essay upon Warren Hastings—

"The English Council which represented the Company at Calcutta was constituted on a very different plan from that which has since been adopted. At present the Governor is, as to all executive measures, absolute. He can declare war, conclude peace, appoint public functionaries or remove them in opposition to the unanimous sense of those who sit with him in Council. They are, indeed, entitled to know all that is done, to discuss all that is done, to advise, to remonstrate, to send protests to England; but it is with the Governor the supreme power resides, and on him that the whole responsibility rests. This system they believed to be, on the whole, the best that was ever devised for the government of a country where no materials could be found for a representative Constitution. In the time of Hastings, the Governor had only one vote in Council, and, in case of an equal division, a casting vote. It therefore happened, not unfrequently, that he was overruled on the gravest questions, and it was possible that he might be wholly excluded for years together from the real direction of public affairs."

Well, if the House looked to the history of the period when Lord Lawrence was Governor General, they would find that that Governor General, as he had a perfect right to do, overruled the decision of his Council. On that occasion the question involved was of much less importance than the present. It related only to the reserve fund which ought to be maintained for the purposes of the opium revenue. The Governor General was supported only by the opinion of the Finance Minister, and the rest of his Council was against him. It was a very strong Council, including Sir Henry Maine, Sir Henry Durand, Sir William Mansfield, and Mr. J. Strachey. But Lord Lawrence, under the power now complained of, overruled this majority, and passed the measure in question. Then it had been said that discretion ought to have been left to the Government of India, and that the Secretary of State had no right in any case to prescribe the form of any particular measure. Well, that had been done over and over again. There was a very interesting passage in a despatch by the Duke of Argyll bearing on this point. The Duke of Argyll said—

"You will receive the measure from me in the shape in which I think it desirable it should be passed into law."

No discretion whatever was left to the Government of India. If, on the other hand, the contention of the hon. and learned Gentleman was correct, no power would be left to the Secretary of State in England except a power of veto, and it was easy to conceive that much mischief might thus arise. For instance, supposing the Secretary of State had before him a Bill, the general principle of which he approved, but to certain clauses of which he objected, he would be obliged to veto the Bill as a whole. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he referred to the initiation of certain measures.] Well, the Secretary of State in Council undoubtedly possessed the right of sending out instructions to the Governor General in Council for the passing of certain measures. There formerly existed in England a body called the Indian Law Commission, whose business it was to suggest certain measures for India. On these being transmitted by the Secretary of State to India, the Governor General had no option but to pass them; and the statute by virtue of which measures were so sent to India to be passed was still unrepealed. So, again, Sir Charles Wood directed the Government of India to pass the Bill for the abolition of the Grand Juries of Presidency towns, and they had to do it. Of course, such a power ought to be recklessly exercised, but that it should exist was only in accordance with common sense. It was not conceivable that the Governor General should have the power of passing Acts of his own free will, in opposition, it might be, to the feeling of Parliament and of the Government of this country, and subject to no controlling influence except that of his recall. With regard to the hon. and learned Gentleman's request for Papers in connection with the cotton duties, he could only say he had already undertaken to produce them at the request of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour). The Minute of the 11th of November, 1875, was a somewhat different matter. It was objectionable both in form and in substance, and no notice whatever was taken of it by either the Secretary of State or his Council. But the Government would have no objection to produce it, on condition that a Memorandum written upon it by Sir Henry Maine, a gentleman of the highest authority on questions of the kind, should be produced also. He hoped he had now dealt sufficiently with the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman. If he had passed over any point, he could assure the House he had done so inadvertently, and not because he was afraid to meet the hon. and learned Gentleman on the ground he had chosen. The Government did not desire to evade the discussion of any one of these questions, and they believed it would be found that what had been done was entirely and completely justified by the letter and spirit of the law.

MR. LAING pointed out that the question involved in the Motion they were discussing was one of danger to the magnificent Empire founded by so many soldiers and statesmen. He regretted that, in spite of the appeal made by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, the answer made on behalf of the Government had been almost entirely an appeal to the tu quoque argument. But if the interests of India were imperilled, it was no consolation to quote precedents by the Duke of Argyll and Lord Lawrence. But there was no analogy between what had been done now, and what was done by Lord Lawrence in a matter of account which nobody in India cared about. It was singularly unfortunate to quote as a precedent the former Afghan War, which we were involved in by a Governor General away from his Council, and unduly led by military officers eager for action. As regarded the remission of the cotton duties, a case in point would have been the reduction of the import duties, in the time of the Viceroyalty of Lord Canning, from 10 to 5 per cent, which it was his (Mr. Laing's) duty as Finance Minister to propose to the Council of which Sir Bartle Frere was then a Member, which was most exhaustively debated, and as to which Lord Canning's judgment was, up to the last moment, in suspense. If it had not been proved in the course of the debate that the measure was acceptable, it would have been withdrawn. The reduction was made because there was a bond fide surplus. But now, as had been shown by the Under Secretary, the public Debt of India had been increased within the last few years by £51,000,000, and, making allowance for re-payments and assets, a deficit of £40,000,000 had been incurred. At that moment, there was a deficiency of £7,500,000 on the Budget of the year. Even now there was a deficit of between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000; and yet, in the face of this, it was proposed to take £200,000 a-year of certain revenue. Was ever such a thing as reduction of taxation in such circumstances heard of in any other country? The reason why it had been done was known to everybody. A General Election was impending, and the Government was afraid it might lose some seats in Lancashire. But were these things to be done without any opportunity to the experienced Indian Councillors, who surrounded the Viceroy in India, and the Secretary of State here, to express and publish their opinions? Such conduct endangered the stability of our Indian Empire. They had to deal with a fast-growing public opinion in India, and if they shook confidence in the truth, justice, and sincerity of the Government, they would find increasing difficulty in reconciling India to English rule. Unfortunately, that was the result of many of the proceedings taken by the Government during the last few years.

Mr. E. Stanhope

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, there was nothing to show that in the course which had been taken by the Duke of Argyll he had done anything which was at all parallel to that which had been done by the present Government, whom he charged with having acted illegally in having communicated with the Viceroy of India without the knowledge of the Council at home in the case of the repeal of the cotton duties, and having thus overridden the authority which was given them by Act of Parliament. It seemed to him that the Under Secretary of State for India had not met with his usual explicitness the case submitted by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. The answer of the Under Secretary of State for India, in fact, was somewhat contradictory. First, he told the House there were matters which were not sufficiently important to be brought under the Act before the Council, and then he used an infinitely more dangerous argument—namely, that some matters might be so important that it would be necessary to exclude the Council and refer them to the Cabinet. He even suggested that both Councils, and even the Secretary of State for India, might be excluded by the Viceroy, and communications be made by him to the Prime Minister. No answer had been given, nor could be given, to the plain law of the case; the conduct of Her Majesty's Government could not be justified. As to the Viceroy and his Council, he had no doubt the Under Secretary of State for India was correct in saying the Governor General had the power of deciding whether a question was essential to the interests of the British possessions in India; but the Governor General was bound, under the Act, to decide a question of that kind, as it were judicially, and honestly to deal with the question of essential interests, which no one could say to be really involved in a reduction of the cotton duties. If Parliament thought right to abolish the Councils at home and in India appointed to aid in the government of that Dependency, let it be so. Parliament and the country would know who were responsible for the government of India; but Parliament ought not to allow them to continue to exist merely as shams.

MR. E. STANHOPE hoped the hon. and learned Member (Sir William Harcourt) would withdraw his Question, and put it in another form. He had already explained what the Government could give, and what it could not give; and the hon. and learned Gentleman could scarcely expect the Motion to be accepted in its present form.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT did not quite understand the hon. Gentleman. He thought he expressed himself willing to grant the Papers.

MR. E. STANHOPE replied that he only accepted the first part.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the hon. Gentleman only desired to add something to the Motion.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he objected to the last paragraph of the Motion, as the Papers there asked for were already granted in another form on the Motion of the hon. and gallant General opposite (Sir George Balfour). He had no objection to the first part of the Motion, if the hon. and learned Member would add a copy of the Memorandum of Sir Henry Maine.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT could not see the object of the refusal. If the Under Secretary of State for India was going to give exactly the same Papers in another form, he did not understand why they should not be given on this Motion.

MR. E. STANHOPE pointed out that, as a result, they would be given twice over.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked if there was a Motion for the Papers already on the Order Book? If there was not, he did not see why the Motion should not be accepted.

MR. FAWCETT thought they were getting into quite an unnecessary difficulty, and that there really was no reason why the Motion should not be amended as suggested.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was not the least objection to lay before the House the whole of the Correspondence with reference to the cotton duties; but the Under Secretary of State for India did not think it convenient to give those Papers as a separate Return. His hon. Friend had already undertaken to lay these communications, with others, before the House on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour), in order to afford a complete review of what had taken place with regard to the tariff. At the same time, his hon. Friend would give all the Papers asked for in the first part of the Motion, with the addition of the Memorandum of Sir Henry Maine. He would, therefore, propose that the Motion be amended in that sense.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "of all Communications," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "of the Memorandum of Sir Henry Sumner Maine, dated the 25th day of April 1876,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, at present, there was no Motion on the Order Book for Papers, or if there was one, he should be glad if the hon. Gentleman would refer to it. He had made a distinct request for Papers, and it was refused, because it was said they were to be given at some future time. Did the Under Secretary of State for India refuse to give these Papers because he (Sir William Harcourt) had moved for them? If that was so, why were they to be given at some future time to somebody else? He did not understand the proceeding, for the Papers might never be moved for at all, and, of course, they were important to the consideration of the subject.

MR. E. STANHOPE replied, that he simply wanted to keep all the Papers relating to one thing together. The hon. and gallant Member (Sir George Balfour) had conferred with him as to these Papers—he had seen them—and, as soon as the hon. and gallant Gentleman had sufficiently recovered from the illness of which he was, unfortunately, suffering, he would move for them, and they would be at once produced. His object was that the Papers should be given as a whole, and if there was any delay in the hon. and gallant Gentleman moving for them, he would himself move for them at once.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT pointed out that an entirely different course was taken in 1876. A question, exactly similar in character, was then raised, and a Return was made of Papers, showing the particular action of the Government on that subject. It would be almost impossible to unbury the particular documents he wanted from a great mass of Correspondence.

MR. FAWCETT observed, that the Papers with regard to the cotton duties were very important, and when they had read them, it was very possible that someone holding a responsible position might consider it his duty to propose a very different Motion from that now before the House. He did not think the Under Secretary had answered the very serious and grave charges brought forward by the hon. and learned Member (Sir William Harcourt); but he had not himself intervened in the debate because he wanted to see these Papers. If they did not give a better answer than that of the Under Secretary to the charge that all Parliamentary checks had been removed, and that the Government of India was now a pure despotism, it was obvious that a very different Motion from that now before them must be proposed. If these Papers were lumped together instead of being published in two lots, would that cause any delay?

MR. ONSLOW believed that the Government would produce the Papers with as little delay as possible, as they clearly had no objection to give them; and he thought the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer a very satisfactory settlement of the question.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he would undertake, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman was not in his place within a very short period, to move for these Papers himself. There should be no delay in presenting them.

MR. FAWCETT repeated his question, whether any delay would be caused by following the course suggested by the Government?

MR. E. STANHOPE thought not; or, at any rate, not more than a day or two.

MR. COURTNEY asked, if it would not be rather inconvenient if the two sets of Papers were mixed together? They wanted Papers on the Constitutional question, while those his hon.

and gallant Friend (Sir George Balfour) was to move for referred to the financial question. Of course, totally different opinions might be formed on the two subjects, and it would be inconvenient if they got a bundle of Papers dealing with one question, and referring incidentally to the other.

MR. E. STANHOPE undertook that the Papers should be furnished without any delay.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Minute by Members of the Council of the Governor General of India on the Despatch of the Secretary of State, dated the 11th day of November 1875, and referred to in the Despatch of the Government of India, dated the 17th day of March 1876 :

And, of the Memorandum of Sir Henry Sumner Maine, dated the 25th day of April 1876.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 18th June, 1879.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading — Warranty of Animals * [208]. Ulster Tenant Right (No. 2) * [209]; New Forest Act (1877) Amendment * [210].

Second Reading—Money Laws (Ireland) [12], put off; Gun Licence Act (1870) Amendment [57], debate adjourned.

Select Committee—Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) * [121], Mr. O'Leary and Mr. John Maitland added.

Committee—Report—Sale of Food and Drugs Act (1875) Amendment (re-comm.) * [139]; Public Health Act (1875) Amendment (Interments) * [61].

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MONEY LAWS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Delahunty, Mr. Richard Power.)

[BILL 12.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DELAHUNTY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he wished, at the outset, to state that the House, on the 18th of March last, affirmed the principle on which this Bill was founded—namely, that a free circulation of specie currency, together with a full and adequate circulation of paper currency, convertible into specie on demand, was essential for the promotion of the development of manufactures, commerce, and trade. The object of this Bill was to extend in a modified form to Ireland the principle of a free circulation of specie currency. At present, a specie circulation did not exist in Ireland; and, therefore, there could be no free circulation of specie there. In England, France, and Germany, where there were no small notes, the specie circulation amounted, on an average, to £5 per head of the population. In Ireland, on the other hand, owing to the circulation of £1 notes, which amounted to £2,000,000 for a population of 5,500,000, the average circulation per head was only 8s. And as for every sovereign in circulation they had about 10 £1 notes, it was clear that in Ireland the amount of specie currency was only 10d. per head of the population. That was a very small sum, and he thought that they ought to have equality in this respect in Ireland. Up to the year 1826 the circulation, both of large and small notes, in Ireland, was the same in proportion as in England, and his country kept pace with England until the law was made different. Now, he only asked the House to agree to the withdrawal of notes under £2 from circulation, and he hoped it would extend the principle of the Resolution which it had unanimously affirmed in a modified form for the benefit of Ireland. Now, the Bank of France, with a capital of £8,000,000, had power to issue £120,000,000 in notes, while the Bank of England, with a capital of £17,000,000, had power to issue only £15,000,000 of notes, which, considering the reserve that had to be made, was, in fact, only £5,000,000; therefore, he believed that England required an alteration in her paper currency laws. That question, however, he did not touch by his Bill, though he had the opinion at the same time that the paper currency, both in England and Ireland, required extension and alteration from what it was at the present time to meet the requirements of trade. The point he wished to enforce was the necessity of making an alteration in specie currency; and he thought that when the specie currency of Ireland was not more than 10*l.* per head of the population, the time had arrived when something ought to be done in the direction he had indicated, and that Ireland ought, at least, to be allowed to have as high an average circulation as that of the world—namely, £2 per head. His opinion was, that there was sufficient energy and power of development in Ireland to bring the circulation of specie of that country up to the proportions of England, France, and Germany. He had looked into the question, and he could safely say that if Ireland was depressed, and if her manufactures did not exist, it was not for the want of energy and determination and means in the people of Ireland. If they looked back to the history of that country for the last 100 years, they would see that Ireland formerly progressed in industrial development fully as much as England, having regard to her circumstances and the state of her laws. Arthur Young showed that up to the time when he wrote the development of Ireland had been as great as, if not greater than, that of England; while he asserted that France was nowhere as regarded development and prosperity as compared with Ireland. In his opinion, there would now be 13,000,000 people living in affluence in Ireland, instead of a population of 5,000,000, if there had been the same currency laws in that country as had existed in England since the year 1826. Among the high financial authorities who endorsed the views which he entertained were Adam Smith, M. Necker, John Stuart Mill, Dr. Thomas Cooper, Mr. M'Culloch, and Mr. Huskisson. In 1811, while the wages of house carpenters in Glasgow were 2*s.* 8*d.* a-day, and in Manchester 3*s.* 10*d.*, they were 4*s.* in Waterford and other Irish towns, though provisions at that time were cheaper in Ireland than in England or Scotland. It was a fact, which no one could gainsay, that up to 1826 the shipping entering the ports in Ireland was fully equal to that which entered the ports of Great Britain, taking into account the area of the two countries. But what was the case now? Last year, the number of ships which cleared out of English ports was 44,977, with a tonnage of 19,000,000, while the number with cargo that cleared out of Irish ports was only 117. It was quite plain, therefore, there was something "rotten in the state of Denmark." In England the number of passengers carried by rail was over 500,000,000 in the year, and the amount of minerals and merchandize over 180,000,000 tons; in Ireland the number of passengers was only 7,000,000, and the amount of minerals and merchandize not more than 3,000,000 tons. What, then, was to be done? The most essential thing was that there should be free exchange between man and man, and that could only be secured by giving a specie circulation to Ireland. He called upon the House to extend to Ireland the principle of the Resolution which it had adopted three months ago; but if they did not do so, he would only say that they must be certain to hear more about the matter before long. In conclusion, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Delahunty.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, he felt himself under considerable difficulty in following his hon. Friend. He had travelled over an immense extent of ground, and if he touched on all the various topics introduced in his speech, he should occupy not only the remainder of the Sitting, but the rest of the Session. But he complained that what his hon. Friend had advanced had no connection whatever with the measure now before the House. He had failed altogether to bring the logic of his speech to bear on the provisions of the Bill. He had shown by his illustrations that Ireland was extremely prosperous some 100 years ago in spite of the penal laws; but what they had now to deal with was not a historical retrospect, but simply with this Bill. His hon. Friend had enunciated what no one had denied, and refuted what no one had stated. He thought the hon. Gentleman had failed to explain his Bill in the least degree. No doubt Ireland had suffered in past times from one kind of misgovernment or another; but he failed to understand by what process a remedy for that suffering was to be found in the mind of any rational person under what it was proposed to enact in that Bill. If £1 notes were injurious, why would not £2 notes be injurious also? Last year his hon. Friend would extirpate impartially all notes under £5; but now he drew his cordon sanitaire to protect £2 notes. What magic was there in £2 notes? The Bill commenced by stating that—

Mr. Delahunty

“Whereas it is expedient to amend the money laws of Ireland by prohibiting, after a certain period, the issue of promissory notes under the sum of £2.”

He ventured to say that the Preamble was altogether begging the question. Nothing had been produced to show that it was expedient, after a certain period, to prohibit the issue of notes under £2. The hon. Gentleman had devoted two hours to a speech on the Bill, and not two minutes of that speech had been devoted to stating what connection he saw between the historical facts which he quoted and the provisions of the Bill. He thought the best way to deal with the measure was to treat it as private, and hold that the Preamble had not been proved. He admitted that on some of the hon. Gentleman's statements arguments might have been founded 50 years ago; but in 1844 and 1845 Sir Robert Peel made a radical change in the conditions under which bank notes were to be circulated. He did not believe that there was any Member returned from Ireland who had more the interest of his country at heart than his hon. Friend; but whether he was well read in the arguments used in 1826, and from that time to 1844 was not important; for he had, notwithstanding his great astuteness and his historical research, failed to grasp the effect of Sir Robert Peel's legislation. He (Sir Joseph M. Kenna) would shortly state the effect of that legislation. Sir Robert Peel's

Act of 1844 saved the rights of bankers generally in England to issue for the future an amount of notes on the old credit basis, limited for each bank, to the precise amount of its actual circulation for the year ending 1st May, 1844. He abolished all further power of circulation by these banks, whether on a special basis or not. The whole power of expanding the note circulation of England was vested in the bank of England; and beyond the amount of £14,000,000, it was provided that the bank's circulation should rest strictly—that was, henceforth, entirely on specie. In 1845, Sir Robert Peel passed the Irish Note Circulation Act, identical in principle, but varying slightly in details, from the English Act. Sir Robert Peel did not consider that the Bank of Ireland was in an analogous position to that of the Bank of England, because there was not such an association and interchange between the banks of the country and the Bank of Ireland as existed between the country banks and the Bank of England. Sir Robert Peel felt bound to slightly vary the conditions of the legislation in regard to Ireland from that relating to England; but the principle of a specie basis for every pound of expanded issues was equally maintained. He regarded the Act as one passed in a thoroughly benevolent and statesmanlike spirit towards his country. By the Act, the Irish banks were obliged to furnish similar returns after the 1st of May, 1845, such as the banks of issue already furnished in England. Once all expansion of the note circulation was against specie, it was immaterial whether the actual circulation was maintained in large notes or small. Some of the banks might dispense with their £1 notes; but he knew one bank which issued such notes because their customers preferred them, although a full circulation would be equally maintained by circulating £5 notes as £1 notes. It was no advantage, under such circumstances, to the banker to circulate £1 notes, but in some respects a disadvantage, because the banks had to represent them by an equivalent amount of gold, and to bear the expense of their note issue. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman would not press his Bill to a Division, because, being conversant with the matter, he felt that no good purpose would be served if the Bill were passed into law.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." — (Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BRUEN said, he could not agree with the last speaker in the opinion that there was not the slightest disadvantage arising from the circulation of £1 notes. His (Mr. Bruen's) desire was to place Irish commerce and trade in as good a position as they held in England; but he felt that the circulation of small notes was injurious to the progress of the country. They could hardly suppose that a great commercial community like England would forego the advantages to be derived from the circulation of £1 notes, if there were any such advantages. England, having voluntarily deprived herself of the power of issuing £1 notes, the inference was that they were not desirable, and if not desirable for England, he failed to see why they should be forced upon Ireland. The question was one between large and small notes, and the issue of small notes was generally a sign that a country was in difficulties. If the circulation of small notes was a good thing, why were they not adopted in all great commercial countries? He had, on former occasions, felt it his duty to oppose the hon. Member for Waterford; but, on further consideration, he had changed his views, and felt bound to support the second reading of this Bill. In his opinion, the circulation of specie currency should be made identical in both countries.

MR. D. TAYLOR said, they all sympathized with the desire of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Delahunty) to improve the trade of his country; but most of them must differ from him as to the means by which that object was to be secured. The only way to increase the wealth and commerce of Ireland was by the industry and efforts of her people. To hold forth to Ireland that there was any other way of increasing her prosperity would be a mistaken and mischievous course to adopt. The circulation of £1 notes had been a most useful and excellent thing for Ireland, and the best test of that was that throughout Ireland the great bulk of the circulation was in notes of £1.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the people of Ireland had perfect confidence in the £1 note. They preferred them to gold, and for this reason he opposed the Bill. He had, however, a stronger reason, and that was that the Bill would inflict a great blow on the banks. The hon. Member (Mr. Delahunty) had represented to them that Ireland was not so prosperous now as in the time of Arthur Young; but he did not prove that the banks of Ireland were more useful or more flourishing then than now. If the argument of the hon. Gentleman were carried out to its logical conclusion, it would be this—that to restore Ireland to its former prosperity all the laws that existed then should be re-enacted.

MR. BIGGAR said, it had not been shown that there was any connection between £1 notes and the decline from a former condition of prosperity in Ireland, which existed, in fact, along with the circulation of £1 notes. A change ought not to be made unless stronger arguments could be urged. The Bill would lessen the resources of the banks, and would not increase the circulating medium which had hitherto worked for the benefit of the general public. The currency laws, no doubt, required considerable amendment; but, so far as Ireland was concerned, the subject should be approached in a more practical manner, and from a totally different point of view. The House would, in his opinion, do well to refuse its assent to the Bill.

MR. MULHOLLAND said, he had given considerable attention to this subject, and certainly should ask the House not to make any such alteration in the law as the hon. Gentleman proposed. He could bear testimony to the efficient working of the present banking system in Ireland, and to the great accommodation it afforded to the Irish agricultural and commercial classes. When they talked of the depression of industry in Ireland as being the result of the £1 note system, he would point out to them the progress which Scotland had made under the same law. He believed the progress of Scotland during the last 100 years had been greater even than that of England; and if they applied the usual tests, he believed it would be found that the progress of Ireland had been very great during the last half-century. So long as there was no question as to their convertibility—and there was no such question—he trusted nothing would be done to abolish £1 notes in Ireland.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he must bear testimony to the care and consideration which the hon. Member who introduced the Bill had given to the question. In support of the Bill it was urged that there was a certain amount of manufacturing inertness in Ireland; and the question, he thought, they had really to consider was whether, if it were true that there was a want of manufacturing energy in Ireland, the want of manufacturing energy could be traced at all to the fact that the circulation of bank notes in Ireland mainly consisted of these £1 bank notes? Under Sir Robert Peel's Act of 1845, a limitation of notes, issued by any particular bank, was declared, and for any issue beyond the amount, banks had to deposit and keep in reserve a certain amount. As to the kind of note the bank should issue, as long as they retained the amount in reserve, the law imposed in no way any kind of restriction upon the denomination of note. If it suited the banks of Ireland, if they felt it a convenience to their customers to issue these £1 notes, for the issue of which a demand seemed to be made, he was informed, and he believed correctly, that there was no limitation. Whilst the banks retained their proper balances of reserve in proportion to their notes of issue, there was nothing to prevent them, for convenience of their customers, arriving at any decision as to the form in which they should issue their notes. They had heard to-day of the popularity of the system of £1 notes in Ireland; and some years back a Committee on Banks of Issue had investigated the question, and the evidence given before that Committee, by witnesses from Ireland, showed that £1 notes were a practical convenience both in Scotland and Ireland, and that any interference with the issue of them would be unpopular; and the hon. Member would have to answer those objections before he could expect the House to pass the Bill. As a matter of evidence, it was clear that the system had worked well both in Ireland and in Scotland; but, provided the conditions were complied with, the banks could issue other notes.

MR. DELAHUNTY, in reply, said, it was all very well to talk about there being a reserve. They must know very well that there was none. In Ireland the amount was so small that it was not worth talking about. The Bank of Ireland had not £500,000 specie, because gold had fled the country. It was necessary to have gold in England to sustain the country; but Ireland had none at all. What Ireland wanted was manufactures, commerce, and trade; and if there was not a circulation of money, it was simply impossible to have manufactures, commerce, and trade. People said—"Let Ireland be industrious." Ireland was industrious; but, unfortunately, she had not plenty of money to sustain the manufacturing interests of the country. He therefore hoped the House would sustain him in passing the Bill he had introduced, and to give an opportunity he would leave the Bill in its hands; but if the Bill were defeated, he would bring the matter before every constituency in Ireland before they returned to the subject next Session.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 146: Majority 116.—(Div. List, No. 123.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for three months.

GUN LICENCES ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 57.]

(Sir Alexander Gordon, Mr. Clare Read, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Mark Stewart.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it had been prepared to remedy what many persons held to be a serious error made in 1870, when the Gun Licences Act was passed through Parliament. The error then made was, in his opinion, a reversal of the principle which was adopted by Parliament in 1848, and continued for 22 years. The principle laid down by the Act of 1848 was, that the occupier of land had the right to protect the produce of his land from injury by hares and wild animals without paying any tax for so doing. Hon. Members might remember that in 1848 the Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 29 was, according to an extract from the Preamble, passed for the following reasons:—

“And, whereas it has been found that much damage has been and is continually being done by hares to the produce of inclosed lands, and that great losses have thereby accrued and do accrue to the occupiers of such lands, it is expedient that persons in the actual occupation of such inclosed lands should be allowed to take and kill hares thereon, without the payment of assessed taxes, and without obtaining a game certificate.”

The Bill he now asked the House to adopt had been framed on the principle that no tax should be imposed on those who were producers of food to enable them to protect that produce from being destroyed. At that time, in 1848, rabbits were not game, and they could be destroyed by any persons without having a licence or certificate to enable them to do so. But another Act was passed through Parliament in 1860, the object of which was to alter the game certificates into licences to kill game, and to reduce the amount payable for that licence from £3 13s. to £3; but on that occasion Parliament was careful to maintain the principle laid down in 1848, that growers of food should have the right to protect it without being taxed for so doing, and Clause 6 was introduced into the Act of 1860, which specially preserved the rights given by the previous Act of 1848, showing that the principle was considered a just one. In that Act of 1860 rabbits were also exempted from paying the tax. [A laugh.] He meant they were exempted from the class of animals that the tenant had to be taxed for killing. Tenants of land shooting rabbits over these lands were specially exempt from the taxes levied on other persons. There was also this exemption—that in Ireland every person was exempt from taxes for killing rabbits. This liberty was enjoyed until 1870, when the Gun Licences Act was passed. The Act of 1870 had given great dissatisfaction, especially to the agricultural interests. The producers of food were by it unable to protect their property without finding themselves taxed for so doing. In fact, the Act was commonly called by the agriculturists a Game Law in disguise, which it was to a certain extent. Since this Act had come into force in Scotland, in the county of which he was most qualified to speak, wood-pigeons had increased until they had become a serious evil.

Sir Alexander Gordon

In East Lothian alone, the Farmers' Association had paid the premium for 23,000 heads of wood-pigeons in one year, and yet they were unable to keep down the number. Those who suffered from wood-pigeons complained very much against any taxes whatever being imposed for killing them. He was informed that in this House itself, soon after the Gun Licences Act was passed, a vote was recorded against that measure while the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was under consideration; but he had not had time to find out that case in the records of the House, and, therefore, he could only give it on the authority of another hon. Member. He thought it would be well for the House to hear some of the reasons adduced in 1870 for passing this obnoxious Act. The present Secretary to the Treasury had said he did not believe that the Bill would in any way promote the preservation of game, and he had supported it on the sole ground that it would be useful in securing the registering of arms in this country. That was the object of many other hon. Gentlemen in the House at the time besides the hon. Gentleman. So much was this the case that the then Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

“The object of this Bill is to check lawless habits. . . . I think it is a good object to discourage the lower classes from habitually carrying deadly weapons.” — [3 Hansard, cciii. 767-8.]

He (Sir Alexander Gordon) did not want to contest this opinion; but he wanted to show that the Bill brought in with that object had not had the effect intended. It ought to be called more strictly a Police Act in disguise, instead of a Gun Licence Act. Had it effected its purpose? The real object of the Bill was to obtain a registration of arms; but it was quite powerless to attain that object, for this reason—that even under the Gun Licences Act any man had a right to have a gun in his possession, to carry it in the open country, and to use it for firing at birds to frighten them, without being taxed at all. He had also the power of using a gun to shoot vermin, rats, polecats, or whatever he thought proper, and the Excise officer could not touch him, because the law allowed him to do it. Therefore, the whole population might be provided with guns for rebellious purposes, and might escape taxation or registration by avowing that their object was to scare birds or to shoot vermin. Those were the exemptions of the Act of 1870. His Bill was intended to deal with the exemptions. He knew he would be told that the Excise officers would be placed in a difficulty by the passing of this Bill. But he thought it could be shown that the effect of the Bill would just be the reverse of this. The Excise officers at present could never tell whether a man had a gun for the purpose of killing or only scaring birds. An Excise officer might see a man firing at a bird; but unless he saw the bird fall, or knew that there was shot in the gun, he could not insist on his having a licence. It would be a far greater protection to a farmer's crop if they would allow him to kill a bird at once, and so get rid of it, than merely to allow him to frighten it off his fields, to which it might return every half-hour. In short, the Bill was to empower the producers of food to kill as well as to scare birds, and to give occupiers of land the same liberty they had from 1848 to 1870. In the Bill he had included hares, rabbits, wood-pigeons, and rooks. He was, however, quite willing to withdraw the hares from the Bill, if it was thought to be objectionable to include them, or that this would be giving too much liberty to farmers. In this Bill he asked for what he wanted; but he should be delighted to take whatever he could get from the Government. The first Bill which he and his hon. Friends introduced was slightly different from the Bill now introduced. The Bill of two years ago only applied to Scotland; but several Members—the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) amongst them—thought it desirable to have the Bill extended to England. Another alteration had been made. Instead of giving liberty to one person only in each occupation, the liberty was made general to any person, the same as in the Gun Licences Act, which he proposed to amend. But if it was thought better, he was quite ready to limit the liberty to one person, such as the son or servant of the farmer. The Bill of 1848, which originated the principle he wanted to restore, was supported by a very large number of persons on both sides of the House. Sir George Grey, who was then Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), the late Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Adderley, the Earl of March, the Duke of Richmond, and even Colonel Sibthorp, supported the Bill. The Duke of Richmond said that after all this Bill would only allow a man to do what he liked with his own, for hares, when on the farmer's land, were his own property. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) thought the legislation of that day was more liberal than it had been since. He hoped Her Majesty's Government and the House would accept this Bill in some form or other. By doing so they would only act upon the principle they professed to act upon every day they met here. They professed to legislate with the view of enabling the earth to bring forth the fruits of its increase; and as weekly they prayed that the kindly fruits of the earth would be preserved to their use, so that in due time they might enjoy them, if these words were not mere perfunctory expressions, they ought to legislate for that end. In conclusion, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. M'LAGAN, in seconding the Motion, remarked that the object of the Bill was to restore to the tenant the right he possessed before 1870. The Act of 1848 was of little use to the tenant farmers of Scotland. The terms of that Act were that the persons having the right to kill hares should be exempt from the game tax. It was well known that in Scotland the tenant had not the right to kill hares, unless it was granted by the landlord, and it was rarely that that right was granted. Therefore, he said, the Act was of little use to the Scotch tenants. To the English tenant the Act was of great use, for he had the right to kill hares, and so it exempted him. The real value of that Act of 1848 was that the Legislature recognized the fact that hares did a great deal of damage to the crops of the tenant farmer, and it was necessary that some remedy should be introduced to prevent it. This was recognized by the Acts which succeeded that of 1848. The right before 1870 was to scare or kill all rabbits and vermin. As had been forcibly put by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon), the occupier of a farm, who was the producer of valuable food for the people, should still retain that right. He thought, however, his hon. and gallant Friend would do well to strike out the word "hares." In amending the Gun Tax Act of 1870, it was never intended that they should be considered vermin, or anything else than game. The Act of 1870 gave the right to scare birds and kill vermin by means of guns; but it did not allow a tenant to delegate that right to any other person unless he took out a gun licence. Before 1870 he had that right. When they considered how the property of the tenant was destroyed by vermin and by birds—how, in some places, rooks and wood-pigeons destroyed the seed when sown, and the crops when ready to be cut, how the green crops of the tenant were destroyed by rabbits, and how wood-pigeons destroyed the wheat and other cereals, they would recognize the fact that these ravages could not be prevented by one person on a farm. They were not committed on one isolated part of a farm; and it was, therefore, important that the farmer should have more than one person armed in some way to frighten away those pests. More was necessary than that rooks and wood-pigeons should be frightened by the cry of a boy or the firing of a gun. It was absolutely necessary that the tenant should have not only the power to scare but to kill. There was, no doubt, a very great increase in the number of wood-pigeons, and it was, no doubt, to be attributed very much to this Gun Licence Act; but the Game Laws, as they existed at the present time, had a great deal to do with the enormous increase. He heartily supported the Bill, as he considered a gun a necessity to a farm to be used for these purposes, and as much an agricultural implement as any other on the farm. He hoped the Government would give their support to the measure, and thus enable the tenant to have the power he had before. The hon. and gallant Member had made concessions that should commend it to the House. He (Mr. M'Lagan) did not think it would be wise that the power to kill rabbits and vermin should be delegated to more than one person on the farm or in the parish, as it was necessary, if the gun licence was to be maintained, that a proper tax should be put upon it. Of course, he would rather see the tax wholly abolished; but so long as it was considered necessary to retain it, there should be sufficient checks to prevent its being entirely evaded.

Mr. M'Lagan

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

MR. MARK STEWART thought the Bill would be very useful to the country generally if it became law. Farmers, no doubt, suffered greatly from the damage caused by hares and other wild animals; but he was very glad to see that his hon. and gallant Friend was willing to remove the word "hares" from the Bill, for the presence of that word in the measure had led to the impression that there was an intention to tinker with the Game Laws, which had been, in the meantime, settled in a satisfactory manner by his hon. Friend who had just sat down; and it was desirable to undeceive these persons, and to assure them that the measure was purely fiscal in its operation. The right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) introduced and passed the measure, which the present Bill sought to amend, in 1870, and it had caused great complaint in different parts of the country. It was hard that small farmers, with but 20 or 30 acres, should require a licence to scare rooks and other vermin from their fields. The main object of the Bill was to enable persons to secure their own farms from molestation from vermin which did such an immense amount of mischief; and that being the case, he accepted the principle of the measure, while, at the same time, he was glad to find the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon) willing to modify its provisions. He hoped the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the Bill had been properly described as a Bill to amend the Gun Licence Act of 1870. He himself would have preferred that it had been a Bill to abolish the Gun Licence Act altogether; but he gladly accepted the measure as an instalment of reform in the law. There was no doubt that the licence was regarded as a sore grievance by farmers generally throughout the country. It was one of those petty annoying grievances constantly recurring to the farmer's mind, as he went out into the fields and saw his crops being destroyed by birds or vermin, and in the winter-time his ricks covered with rooks, and his turnips destroyed by wood-pigeons. He was aware that certain Justices of the Peace had decided that the farmer did not bring himself under the penalty of the law if he himself shot birds. In the South of Scotland, an appeal had been pending from such decision; but, evidently on the advice of some authority at headquarters in London, the appeal was withdrawn. This was of the nature of a public scandal. It was generally recognized that the Act was violated, and that the Justices had strained the law in not convicting on the evidence. In the present depressed state of agriculture, it would be a gracious concession to the farmers to pass this Bill. There was no great difficulty in recurring to the state of matters before 1870. There never was any reason for the introduction of the gun licence. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced it (Mr. Lowe) had about the same time another aberration on the subject of lucifer matches. That was a matter which affected the constituents in the large boroughs, and the proposal in consequence quickly died; but although it was pointed out that the gun licence would be an unfair imposition on tenant farmers, the House supported the Government, and passed it. He hoped, however, that the House would now do what was possible to redress the injury then done, and pass the measure by a large majority.

MR. GREGORY said, that rabbits in his county were the common enemy of the landlord and tenant, as they were as destructive of underwood upon which the landed proprietor relied as they were of the crops of his tenant. He did not, however, think that tenants would avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill to any great extent for the shooting of rabbits, because they had an objection to employ their servants in that way when the latter had other work to do on the farm. He would suggest to the House the necessity of taking care that the Bill was so worded in Committee that its operation should not extend beyond its legitimate purposes, for the indiscriminate use of guns had led, and would lead, to serious accidents. The measure thus guarded might be useful and desirable to the agricultural population.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, he quite agreed with the previous speaker that the Bill should be limited strictly to the purposes for which it was asked for by its supporters, and he had thought the words now in the Bill would have that effect. If, however, on consideration these words were found to be insufficient, the supporters of the Bill would be very willing to insert other words which would leave no doubt upon the point. From his experience of the feeling among agricultural tenants on this question, he could assure the House that the passing of the Bill would give great satisfaction. The amount involved was small, and might excite a sneer; but it was the sense of injustice, rather than the amount of the tax, that caused the strong feeling among those who paid it. When the Gun Licence Act was passed it was thought to be a Game Law in disguise, and also a Police Bill in disguise; and he believed that of the two the latter supposition was nearer the truth than the former, for one object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in passing it was to guard against the danger arising from the carrying about of arms, the right hon. Gentleman himself, it was said, having been nearly shot on one occasion by a man who was shooting small birds. He remembered, also, that when the Act was discussed it was supposed to have some relation to the case of Ireland, where the Government were anxious to find out who were in possession of guns; but, as the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon) had pointed out, it could not operate very much in that direction as against keeping fire-arms, because it gave power to deal only with those who carried guns, and not with those who kept them in their houses. The thing forbidden was not having a gun, but carrying it. But the remark which he rose chiefly to make was this—that he thought the promoters of the Bill had been almost too ready to propose modifications in the Bill in Committee before they were asked to do so. He regretted very much that the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) was unable to be present to speak for English tenant farmers. He feared that if hares were taken out of the Bill it would not give satisfaction in Scotland. He did not understand on what principle they should be taken out. It might, no doubt, help to show that there was no intention of meddling with the Game Laws generally. But the House might remember that even if hares remained in the Bill, that fact would not in the least empower the tenant to touch the hares, if he had not the right to do so, at any rate; and, therefore, that part of the Bill could do no possible harm. It merely affected the question of Revenue. As a matter of principle, the exemption was asked for the purpose of defending the growing crops, and he thought nobody connected with agriculture was likely to deny that the hare was a very mischievous animal. There was no animal which was more partial to swedes, or would travel farther to get at them; and, although the number of hares was but small as compared with the number of rabbits, it was generally admitted that one hare did a great deal more damage than one rabbit, because the hare travelled so much further, and was in the habit of tasting so many different roots. He, therefore, hoped the Government would grant the second reading of the Bill, and that when they got into Committee they might have the advantage of the presence of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), whose name was on the back of the Bill, and then a fair discussion might be had of all the details of the measure.

MR. BRUEN objected that, under this Bill, two guns might be used on one farm—one by the farmer himself, and the other by his delegate. In his opinion, the grievance complained of was of the most unsubstantial character; 10s. was little to pay for the privilege for which the tax was imposed. No cases had been cited sufficient to justify the proposed alteration of the law; and, therefore, he moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

SIR ANDREW LUSK seconded the Amendment, declaring that if people always went about with guns they would be apt to get shot. He maintained that if rabbits, hares, and wood-pigeons did so much damage, it would surely pay a farmer to take out a gun licence for 10s., which would enable him to keep his holding clear; but if a farmer found that it was not worth 10s. a-year to stop the destruction of his crops, that destruction could be hardly worth talking about.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Bruen.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. J. LOWTHER said, there was one matter which had not been mentioned hitherto—namely, that it was proposed to apply the Act to Ireland. Whatever point of view his Colleagues of the Revenue Department might choose in approaching the Bill, he must say that, looking at it from the point of view of the Irish Executive, he did not feel himself justified in supporting it. He was sorry to say that, at the present time, the state of Ireland was not such that the Government could look with equanimity upon any enactment tending to the multiplication of fire-arms in the country. He did not share the view that the possession of fire-arms was one of the inherent rights of man. Looking at the matter in another light, he pointed out that every now and then it had been stated to be desirable to prevent the wholesale slaughter of small birds. He remembered that, on one occasion, the House was debating the question of the establishment of a close time for sea fowl, and that he, not being at that time officially connected with Ireland, and being, therefore, able to speak more freely than he should like to do now, made a suggestion, in reply to a proposal by an Irish Member to extend the Act to Ireland. The suggestion he made was, that there should be a close time for landlords and agents. Since then they had had a variety of Bills dealing with these questions; and he had more than once expressed doubts as to the advisability of pandering to sentimental schemes for the preservation of vermin, in which direction he admitted that Parliament had proceeded somewhat far. The present proposal, however, reversed that policy in a manner which he considered altogether uncalled for. With regard to wood-pigeons, he believed the price of these birds was always sufficiently good to enable a tolerable shot to recoup himself the cost of his gun licence. It was only the other day that a Bill was passed establishing the close time for hares in Ireland, and that did not indicate any pressing necessity for their destruction. If vermin were really a pest to the farmer, he might reasonably pay the small impost of 10s. for liberty to use a gun; but, in point of fact, he had the liberty already with regard to vermin. They heard a good deal a few years ago in that House on behalf of the farmer's boy and the cheap gun; but, in his opinion, that was not altogether a desirable thing. He had expressed his opinion that there would be a greater number of fingers upon the hands of the typical farmers' boy, and more eyes in his neighbours' heads, if, instead of the cheap gun, a far more efficacious—while far less dangerous weapon—was placed in his hands—namely, a rattle. He would, moreover, now say that a very small investment in birdlime and traps would get rid of all the difficulties of the farmer. ["Divide!"] He could assure hon. Members that he had no intention to interfere with a Division. He might add, in conclusion, it appeared to him there was no occasion for a Bill of this kind. The Legislature had prescribed a very reasonable impost, and the law authorized a person to make use of a gun upon his own holding. Many hon. Members had overlooked that fact, and had spoken as though the farmer was entirely precluded from making use of a gun. He thought the indiscriminate use of guns should be discouraged by the Legislature, and would repeat that there were many other ways of destroying vermin; but if a man wished to use a gun, he should not object to pay the tax, when even the necessities of life were taxed.

MR. CALLAN was sure the House had thoroughly enjoyed the Chief Secretary's speech; but regretted that he had thought it necessary to repeat his old jest about a close time for landlords and their agents. He supported the Bill, and gave an instance of a farm of 200 acres, on which damage had been done by rats, in two years, to the extent of £590. He thought 10s. was a large sum for such purpose; but what he particularly wished to call attention to was the peculiar objection of the Chief Secretary to the Bill. Did the Chief Secretary mean to say that Ireland was in such a disturbed state that the farmers were not to be trusted with guns?

MR. MACARTNEY said, that the law at present gave power to an occupier of land to carry a gun and destroy vermin on his own land. He might also depute that power to his own son; but he could not give written permission or authority to another person to use a gun in his behalf. This Bill, on the other hand, would enable an occupier of land to give written permission to any number of persons in the neighbourhood to come upon his land and shoot whenever they liked. Allusion had been made to the shooting of landlords, and, unfortunately, occurrences had recently taken place in Ireland declaring landlords to be vermin; so that, if this Bill passed and authorized the destruction of vermin, he was afraid the destruction of landlords might occur even more frequently than it had hitherto. But, independent of that, there was a reason why an occupier should not be enabled to give this authority to other persons, not even to shoot rabbits. He had considerable acquaintance with rabbits, and his experience was that destroying them by ferrets was the best way.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

WARRANTY OF ANIMALS BILL.

On Motion of Sir EARDLEY WILMOT, Bill to make written documents necessary to support actions for Warranty of Horses and other animals, ordered to be brought in by Sir EARDLEY WILMOT, Mr. FORSYTH, and Mr. Serjeant SIMON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 208.]

ULSTER TENANT RIGHT (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Lord ARTHUR HILL-TREVOR, Bill to make further provision in respect of Tenant Right in Ulster at the expiration of Leases, ordered to be brought in by Lord ARTHUR HILL-TREVOR, Marquess of HAMILTON, Viscount CASTLEREAGH, Colonel LOWRY CORRY, and Mr. MULHOLLAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 209.]

NEW FOREST ACT (1877) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Bill to amend "The New Forest Act, 1877," ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 210.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 19th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—*Bills of Sale (Ireland)  (119).
Second Reading—Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) (76); Metropolitan Public Carriage Act Amendment * (105).
Committee—Prosecution of Offences (74-121); Children's Dangerous Performances (64-122).
Committee—Report—Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.) * [95]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Aysgarth Union, &c.) * [104].
Report—Hares (Ireland) * (89).

LONDON BRIDGE BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON appealed to the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees to postpone the third reading for a week. The Preamble of the Bill set forth that it was desirable to widen London Bridge and its approaches; but it did not state in what way that object was to be carried into effect. The measure had passed through the House of Commons as an unopposed Bill; but he hoped, in the interval, that any Members of their Lordships' House who took an interest in the material condition of the Metropolis would look at a model of the proposed alterations which was now displayed in one of the Committee Rooms, and satisfy himself, before the Bill proceeded further, what was proposed to be done. They would see that it was proposed to carry out on each side of the existing Bridge, to the extent of 11 or 12 feet, a pathway composed of iron cantilevers; the beautiful stonework of the parapet was to be done away with, and iron "filagree work" would be substituted. In fact, the whole character and form of the Bridge, which was one of the chief ornaments of the Metropolis, would be entirely destroyed. The Bill was described as one "for widening London Bridge;" but it would have been better described as one for its disfigurement past all hope of recovery. Unfortunately, they had not many fine monuments in London, and it seemed to him deplorable that any of the few they had should be destroyed simply for commercial speculation, or through the neglect of Parliament. He remembered the passing of the Act which gave power to take a railway over the River, and which was carried by an iron bridge across Ludgate Hill, cutting in two the façade of St. Paul's. There never was a greater calamity to London, from an artistic point of view; and he always looked back with shame and regret to the fact that he did not raise his voice against that Bill when it was before Parliament—a circumstance which weighed upon his conscience ever since. He trusted his noble Friend would not refuse to accede to the appeal which he made in the present case.

EARL GRANVILLE concurred in the request of the noble Earl, and would express his approval of all that he had said. From the description which the noble Earl had given of the proposed alterations, he could not conceive but it would ruin the appearance of the Bridge. He trusted that, under the circumstances, his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees would not object to a postponement of the third reading of the Bill.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, after the appeal that had been made to him, he could but consent to the postponement of the Bill for a week.

Bill to be read 3^d on Thursday next.

THAMES RIVER (PREVENTION OF FLOODS) BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD TRURO said, there were strong objections on the part of many persons to some provisions of the Bill; and if the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees would be good enough to let it stand over till Monday next, some arrangement satisfactory to those interested in the subject might be entered into.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON was understood to support the request of the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) asked whether the noble Lord intended to move an Amendment to the Bill? If so, he would not object to the postponement of the second reading.

LORD TRURO said, he intended to move—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill that they have power to alter the Bill so as to charge to the rates of the Metropolis the costs of all works carried out on public property, and the expense of works of an exceptional character and cost that may be ordered to be executed on private property.”

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) said, that being so, he would not oppose the postponement of the second reading.

Second Reading put off to Monday next.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (OFFICERS) BILL.—(No. 76.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was to amalgamate in one Central Office certain of the offices and officers connected with the various Divisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature, as had been recommended by a Departmental Commission which sat on the subject. The offices which it proposed to amalgamate were the Record and Writ Clerk's Office, the Enrolment Office, the offices of the Masters of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions, including the Bills of Sale Office, the offices of the Associates of the three Common Law Divisions, the Crown Office, the Queen's Remembrancer's Office, the office of the Registrar of Certificates of Acknowledgments of Deeds by Married Women, and the office of Registrar of Judgments, and such other offices of the Supreme Court as might from time to time be amalgamated with the Central Office by Rules of the Court. The existing holders of these offices were to be transferred to the new Central Office. The Central Office would be under the control of officers called Masters of the Supreme Court. The existing Masters would be continued in their offices. Vacancies in the office of Masters were not to be filled up until the number had been reduced to 18. Future appointments to the office of Master were to be made by the Chiefs of the Common Law Divisions and the Master of the Rolls in rotation; that of Queen's Coroner and Master of the Crown Office by the Lord Chief Justice of England. Another section of the Bill made provision in respect of salaries and pensions as the proposed changes required. A third section laid down rules in regard to making Rules of Court; and there was a fourth section, containing certain miscellaneous provisions with which he would not trouble their Lordships.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a.”
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD SELBORNE expressed his approval of the Bill; but said that he should have been glad to have seen some greater facility given for making the Chief Clerks in the Chancery Division, when not employed in their own work, interchangeable in the same manner as were the Judges between the various Divisions. He should also have been glad to see some provision for utilizing the services of the Official Referees. They were certainly not overburdened with work in their own Department, and might very advantageously be employed in discharging other work.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR admitted that the experiment of the Official Referees had not been a successful one, nor had the work been of the magnitude which was expected. He had called attention to the fact, and strongly urged that portion of the business which was found heavy in Chambers should be sent to the Official Referees. The Master of the Rolls had acted upon the suggestion with some success, and had sent some of the business which ordinarily fell to the Chief Clerks to the Official Referees. The other Judges had not yet acted on the suggestion.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 74.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Appointment of Director of Public Prosecutions).

LORD COLERIDGE desired to call his noble and learned Friend's attention to the fact that, under this clause, it was provided that the Public Prosecutor, or Director of Public Prosecutions, as he was to be termed, and his Assistants in the country, should be appointed by the Home Secretary, and not by the Attorney General. He objected to this arrangement, and would move, as an Amendment, that the appointments be made by the Attorney General, who, from his legal knowledge, would be better able than the Home Secretary to make the selections. He disclaimed any hostility to the present Home Secretary; this was not the original proposal of the Bill, but was a piece of patronage forced on that right hon. Gentleman by the House of Commons.

Amendment moved, in line 9, leave out ("A Secretary of State") and insert ("The Attorney General.")—(The Lord Coleridge.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would remind his noble and learned Friend that the House of Commons provided the funds for the institution of this peculiar office of Director of Public Prosecutions, and it had required that the responsibility should be in the hands of the Home Secretary. He thought the House of Commons was quite right in doing that. The positions of the Home Secretary and the Attorney General in the administration of the Criminal Law were essentially different. The Home Secretary was the head of a great Department, and was responsible to Parliament for the general system of the administration of the Criminal Law of the country, and the Attorney General was not. The Attorney General was responsible only for the way in which he discharged the duties of his own Office. He had never heard of patronage of this description being placed in the hands of the Attorney General; and while the Secretary of State could be called to account in Parliament for the manner in which he had exercised it, it would not be so with the Attorney General.

LORD SELBORNE said, that the administration of justice in this country was in a somewhat anomalous position as regarded public officers, the functions which should be vested in a single Minister of Justice being at present distributed over four different Departments. The Lord Advocate of Scotland discharged similar functions to those which his noble and learned Friend proposed to give the Attorney General for England. The proposal of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Coleridge), therefore, was in accordance with that precedent. If English precedents were regarded, the Judges in England were all appointed, not by the Home Secretary, but by the Lord Chancellor or the Prime Minister. The Lord Chancellor—who, if anyone, was the chief Minister of Justice—appointed all the unpaid magistrates, both in boroughs and in counties; and the Treasury, not the Home Office, appointed the Crown Solicitor, by whom all Government prosecutions, and other legal business of a contentious kind, were conducted.

On Question? Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Establishment of office of Director of Public Prosecutions) agreed to.

Clause 4 (Qualifications of Director of Public Prosecutions and of Assistants).

LORD COLERIDGE said, the clause provided that the person appointed to be the Chief Director should be either a barrister-at-law or a solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature. He thought this an office which required the highest legal training; and he should, therefore, move that the appointment should be restricted to members of the Bar. The matter was different as regarded the Assistants, and he did not desire to interfere with them.

Amendment moved, line 22, leave out from ("be") to the end of the clause and insert—

("In the case of the Director a barrister-at-law in actual practice and of not less standing than ten years, and in the case of an assistant a barrister-at-law or a solicitor, of the Supreme Court of Judicature in actual practice and of not less standing than seven years. Neither the Director of Public Prosecution nor any assistant of such Director shall directly or indirectly practice in their profession except in the discharge of their duties under this Act.")—(The Lord Coleridge.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not accept the Amendment. There was no reason why the office should be absolutely restricted to members of the Bar.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 121.)

CHILDREN'S DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BILL.—(No. 64.)

(The Earl De la Warr.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he was ready to accept the Bill so far as it went; but it fell very short of a perfect Bill. In preventing only such performances as were, in the opinion of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, dangerous to life and limb, it failed to reach the case of children trained in what was called in the slang terms, the "back slide trick." This training commenced when the children were very young, and taught them to completely hoop their bodies. This was neither dangerous to life or limb; but yet it inflicted an immense amount of torture upon the unfortunate victims for the amusement of the people, and was a fearful detriment to their health and strength in after years. It was a disgrace to our civilization that such a thing should be allowed to go on with the sanction of the law. The whole thing might be got rid of if the age was extended from 14 to 17 years of age. This, by retarding the period at which the beginning of the public performance could take place, would render the expense of the preliminary training so great that it would put a stop to much of these painful and degrading exhibitions.

EARL DE LA WARR was willing to modify the prohibitory clause in the direction pointed out by the noble Earl.

EARL BEAUCHAMP pointed out that no Notice had been given of this suggestion, and as such an alteration would interfere with a large class of persons who at present obtained their livelihood by these performances, he trusted the House would not agree to it.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, the proceedings upon this Bill had been postponed from time to time, and no bond fide debate had taken place upon it. He would support the Bill as it stood; but he thought that if it had been dealt with in a more business-like manner it might have been a much better one.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

New clause inserted after Clause 1—

(Commencement of Act.)

("This Act shall not come into operation until the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and eighty, which date is herein-after referred to as the commencement of this Act.")

Clause 3 (Employment of child in dangerous performances prohibited).

Amendment made, in line 10, after "any person" the words—

"Being the owner or manager of a circus, or exercising the profession of a gymnast, ropedancer, or athlete, or any similar profession," struck out.

Line 12, strike out "for the purposes of such profession;" line 15, strike out "be dangerous to life and limb," and insert "the life or limb of such child shall be endangered;" line 19, omit "a penalty not exceeding five pounds," and insert "a penalty not exceeding ten pounds;" at end of clause insert—

("And where by reason of such employment any accident causing actual bodily harm occurs to any such child, the employer shall be liable to be indicted as having committed an assault occasioning actual bodily harm, and to be punished in manner provided by section forty-seven of the Act passed in the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter one hundred, intituled 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to offences against the person;' and, moreover, the court before whom such employer is convicted on indictment shall have the power of awarding compensation to be paid by such employer to the child for the bodily harm so occasioned; provided, that no person shall be punished twice for the same offence.")

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 122.)

INDIA (FINANCES, &c.)

PETITION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK rose to call attention to the condition of the finances of British India, and to present a Petition from the Committee of the British Indian Association at Calcutta. In doing so, he thought it right, by way of preface, to state that the views he was about to express were his own individually; that he had not put himself in communication in reference to the subject with any of the noble Lords around him with whom he usually acted; and that nothing was further from his desire than to comment in a hostile spirit upon the general financial action of the Government of India, whose difficulties he was, perhaps, better able to appreciate than most of their Lordships. He would take, for the purposes of comparison, two periods of Indian finance—first, the four years from 1872 to 1875; and, secondly, the four years from 1876 to 1879—omitting, as everyone was bound to do who wished to consider Indian finance fairly, the expenditure on reproductive public works. In selecting those periods, he had not been influenced by any personal considerations. He was not responsible for the finances of 1872—and he was responsible for the Budget of 1876. During the first period the Government had to meet a famine which cost £6,500,000, and in the end there remained a surplus of about £2,000,000; so that if, had there been no famine, the surplus of the four years would have amounted to about £8,500,000, or at the rate of more than £2,000,000 a-year, notwithstanding the modification or abandonment of various taxes, and without taking into account some 30,000 chests of opium of which the Indian Government were in possession, and which might be considered an important asset. During the four years from 1876 to 1879, the Government had to meet a famine which, according to the statement of the Finance Minister, cost £9,500,000, and there was a deficit of £5,750,000; so that, if there had been no famine, the surplus of the four years would have amounted to £3,750,000. Meanwhile, however, taxes had been imposed to the amount of some £3,000,000. Therefore, speaking broadly, if no fresh taxation had been imposed, the revenue of the four years would have been only just sufficient to meet the expenditure, without leaving any surplus to provide for the cost of the famine. The Government of India had always, and very properly, recognized the necessity of providing against the famines which had, unfortunately, become so frequent in India, without increasing the debt—yet, during the last four years, that has not been done. The statement he had now made would, he believed, be sufficient to satisfy their Lordships that the condition of Indian finance was deserving of serious attention. At the same time that taxation, the receipts from which amounted to £3,000,000 during the four years, had been imposed, some remissions of taxation had been made—there had been an alteration of the salt duties, and the Customs import duty on cotton manufactures had been reduced. Into the substantial merits of the latter question he would not enter. No one could suppose he would defend protection to the industry of India, which would be wrong in principle, and he was not complaining of the remissions themselves; but he entertained very strong objection to the time and manner in which these remissions had been made. He had imagined that the policy of the Government had been made sufficiently clear. The noble Marquess the Foreign Secretary, when he was at the India Office, over and over again, in speeches, in despatches, and in Minutes, stated that, however desirous he might be to get rid of anything which savoured of protection in the Indian Customs duties, the reform could be carried out only when the state of the Indian finances enabled it to be done without the imposition of fresh taxes. The same opinion had been publicly expressed by the present Governor General shortly after his arrival in India. The Finance Minister, Sir John Strachey, in introducing the Budget of 1877, said that the financial difficulties were so serious that no source of income could be sacrificed. The Resolution passed by the other House of Parliament in 1877 was to the effect that the duties should be reduced when the Revenues of India would permit of it. When the Budget of 1877 was introduced into the Legislative Council of India, the finances were not in so critical a condition as they were found to be in the winter of that year; for it was at first supposed that the Madras Famine would not cost so much as it ultimately did. In December, 1877, the Government of India found themselves compelled to anticipate the usual Financial Statement of 1878, and to introduce to the Legislative Council proposals, which were adopted, for imposing taxes to the extent of about £1,000,000 a-year, to provide the funds necessary for meeting out of income the expenditure upon famine. No intimation was given at that time that it was intended to remit any taxes or Customs duties; and what Sir John Strachey then said was—

“How soon, and to what extent we shall be able to carry out the important, and, in my own opinion, most necessary reform in regard to the cotton duties which has now been enjoined upon us by Her Majesty’s Government, supported by a unanimous vote of the House of Commons, I am now unable to foresee.”

It was clear that up to that time the policy of the Government was that it would be wrong to undertake the reform of the Customs duties until the state of the finances enabled them to do so without imposing fresh taxation. In dealing with the finances of any country, it had always been recognized as a fundamental rule that, however right in principle Customs or other reforms might be, they ought not to be carried out unless the condition of the finances enabled it to be done without risk. Notwithstanding this, only three months after the discussion in the Legislative Council—namely, in the beginning of March, 1878—notwithstanding the assurances which had previously been given, the Government of India undertook the reform of the Customs duties; and, as part of that reform, a reduction was made in the import duties upon cotton manufactures. That reduction was still further increased in 1879, and the reduction then effected would involve a loss to the Revenue of £200,000 a-year, or more. He deeply regretted the change in the policy of the Government, and their departure from the position that the reduction of the duties ought to be postponed until the finances of India would allow of its being made. An endeavour had been made to separate the remission of these duties from the imposition of the new taxes, which were solemnly pledged to be devoted to the creation of a Famine Insurance Fund; but the taxes were put on in December and the remissions were made in March, and it was impossible to dissociate the one from the other. He was sorry to say that the effect on public opinion in India was to produce the impression that advantage was taken of the new taxes to reduce the Customs duty upon cotton manufacturers, in consequence of the pressure put upon the Government by an important manufacturing interest in this country. Numerous public addresses showed that this was the opinion of the educated Natives of India, and of the European commercial community; and that it was the opinion of the mass of English Civil servant, was shown by Sir Alexander Arbuthnot, the senior Member of the Council of the Viceroy, who said that there were not a dozen officials in India who did not believe that the reduction had been made, not for the interests of the people of India, but in consequence of the pressure put upon the Government by a great interest in this country. What had been done had been done on the responsibility of Her Majesty’s Government, and he (the Earl of Northbrook) did not attribute any improper motive to them; but he asserted the fact that what had been done had produced this deplorable impression. This was no question of Party, and the pressure had come fully as much from Liberal as from Conservative Members of Parliament. While he deeply regretted the time at which, he more deeply regretted the manner in which, this policy had been carried into effect. The Government of India, both at home and in India, was a matter that had often been considered by Parliament; and, while full power over Indian affairs was given to Her Majesty’s Government on the responsibility of the Secretary of State, care was taken to associate with him Indian statesmen, to be consulted on all ordinary matters of Indian policy, and more especially upon matters of finance; but whose opinion, excepting under peculiar circumstances, he could, in the exercise of his responsibility, if necessary, overrule. Now, to the best of his (the Earl of Northbrook’s) knowledge and belief, the last remission of the Customs duties on cotton goods had not been put before the Council of the Secretary of State in such a form as to give them an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it. The responsibility of the act having been admitted to be with Her Majesty’s Government, who originated the measure, he still doubted whether the conditions of the Government of India Act had been fulfilled, and whether the orders given to the Government of India instructing them to carry out the change ought not, as a matter of law, to have been communicated to the Secretary of State's Council, in order that they might have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon them. The Council at Home having been, as he believed, passed by in this matter, he regretted to say that, in his opinion, a considerable strain had been put upon the Constitution of India in the manner in which the measure was carried out in India. The government of India in India was not an absolute government by a Viceroy; it was vested by the wisdom of Parliament in the Governor General in Council, and it was only in certain specified cases that he had the legal power to overrule the majority of that Council. The 5th section of the Act of 1870, which dealt with the point, was as follows:—

“Whenever any measure shall be proposed before the Governor General of India in Council whereby the safety, tranquillity, or interests of the British possessions in India, or any part thereof, are, or may be, in the judgment of the said Governor General, essentially affected, and he shall be of opinion either that the measure proposed ought to be adopted and carried into execution, or that it ought to be suspended or rejected, and the majority in Council then present shall dissent from such opinion, the Governor General may, on his own authority and responsibility, suspend or reject the measure in part or in whole, or adopt and carry it into execution.”

He was far from saying that the Governor General had acted illegally in taking advantage of that clause; but it seemed to him to be exceedingly difficult to understand by what process of reasoning—considering the condition of finances of India, and the feeling on the subject which was entertained by the whole population of India, European and Native—the reduction of the import duties on cotton manufactures could have been construed as a measure “whereby the safety, tranquillity, or interests of the British Possessions in India” were so “essentially affected” as to require so great a strain on the Constitution. He contended that the power which had been given to the Governor General was intended by Parliament to be used only on the most important occasions; and if, upon any ordinary occasion, the opinions of those who were by law the advisers of the Governor General might be set aside, he looked, he confessed, with apprehension to what might occur in the future. A Secretary of State might, like the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook) have not been many months at the head of the India Office—a Viceroy might have arrived in the country on the very day before a question such as that to which he was now calling their Lordship's attention was brought before him—and it was very dangerous indeed, he thought, that the advice of the Council at Home should be passed by, and that a certain line of policy should, by order of the Secretary of State to the Viceroy, be carried into effect, while, at the same time, the opinion of the majority of the Council in India was overruled.

He wished that was all he had to say on the subject; but he regretted to have to add that in carrying out the measure to which he was referring, a strain appeared also to have been put on the law in India. On that subject he could quote the highest authority. Among the Members of the Viceroy's Council was one who had been appointed for his legal qualifications, and who was the Legal Member of the Council (Mr. Whitley Stokes). That gentleman was appointed by the present Government, and had no political opinions of which he was aware. Well, what was the view taken by that gentleman of the matter? The question was of so much importance that he should read to the House his own words. He said—

“Lastly, I object to the way in which the proposed change in the law is to be effected. The Viceroy, as I understand, intends to overrule the majority of his Council, and to make the proposed exemption by Executive order, in the Revenue Department, under Section 23 of the Sea Customs Act. Such an order is, no doubt, authorized by the terms of that section. But the Indian Legislature, in conferring on the Executive power to make such exemptions, never intended that it should be exercised so as to make suddenly a vast change in our law, affecting not only the importers and consumers of the particular class of goods dealt with, but the taxpayers of India in general—a change that will not only seriously diminish our present Revenue, but force the hand of the Legislative Council by compelling them to impose new direct taxation. The power to exempt goods from Customs duties was originally conferred by Act 18 of 1870, and was merely intended to relieve the Executive from the useless and troublesome formality of coming from time to time to the Indian Legislature to make in the tariff petty alterations which that Legislature, if applied to, would have made at once. The change now proposed is of a very different character. I have reason to think it would never be sanctioned by the Legislative Council, unless, indeed, arguments were brought forward in its favour far more cogent than those that I have heard. The proposed exemption of cotton goods, if made by a mere Executive order, will thus resemble what lawyers call a fraud on the power; and there is, unfortunately, no Court of Equity to relieve the people of India against it."

The Earl of Northbrook

That opinion, coming from the Legal Member of his Council, ought, he thought, to have had great weight with the Viceroy, and to have induced him to pause before he took the course which he adopted. Without discussing the merits of the measure, he contended that, from the first moment to the last, though no actual illegality might have been committed, the Constitution of India had been strained, the checks which had been placed by Parliament on the Government of India had been dispensed with, and sufficient attention had not been paid to the strong feeling of the Natives of India on a matter which, to them, appeared to be a departure from the system of government to which they had been accustomed, in accordance with which the interests of the people of India had always been held to be the paramount object with the Government of that country. He wished to add only a very few words more on the subject. He had observed, with very great regret, that the following Resolution had been passed by the other House of Parliament, at the suggestion, he believed, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer:—

"That this House accepts the recent reduction in these duties as an important step towards their total abolition, to which Her Majesty's Government are pledged."

With the utmost earnestness, and with the strongest sense of responsibility, he must warn the Government against the danger of encouraging the passing of Resolutions like that, which prospectively affected Indian finance, and on the representations, too, of those who happened to be interested in a particular tax. If the interests of the people of India were to be considered, there were many taxes that pressed heavily on the people which ought to be remitted before the remission of the remainder of the cotton duty. There were export duties upon important articles of Indian produce which remained only because, up to the present time, the Government of India had, in consequence of the condition of finance, been unable to remove them. During the last few years heavy taxation had been introduced into India. There was a licence tax, to which even a man who earned but 4s. a-week was liable. If such Resolutions as that recently passed by the House of Commons were encouraged by Her Majesty's Government, a responsibility would be adopted by Parliament with respect to Indian finance which must be serious, and which might be disastrous to the Indian Empire.

He now turned, with pleasure, to another part of his task, in which he could cordially approve of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. There had been, as he had shown before, for some years past, a deterioration of the finances of India. One of the causes was the depreciation of silver, which had cost the Indian finances £7,000,000 more in the four years from 1876 to 1879 than in the preceding four years. That depreciation was beyond the reach of the province of the Government to remedy. The next cause was the military expenditure, which had increased by £6,500,000 in the same period. On the other hand, the Government had gained £1,500,000 by the sale of opium, and £2,000,000 from a great increase in the returns from the guaranteed railways. He thought the Government had adopted the right course in insisting that such a condition of things should be met by a vigorous reduction of expenditure; but it was essential that such reduction should include the military expenditure. The net expenditure upon the Army was estimated at £17,500,000 for the year 1879. The average net expenditure upon the Army in 1872-3-4-5 was £14,250,000. The increase of expenditure in that respect was, therefore, £3,250,000. Of that sum of £3,250,000, £2,000,000 represented the expenses of the Afghan War; so that, besides the war in Afghanistan, the military expenses had increased by £1,250,000. He saw no reason why, if the military expenditure were seriously taken up, the cost of the Army in India should not be reduced to the average expenditure of the years 1872-5. If such a reduction could be carried out—and he believed it could be—it would go a very long way towards placing the finances of India upon a sound and satisfactory basis, and, instead of there being a deficit, as there was expected to be this year, there would be a surplus. As to military expenditure, he adhered to what he had stated upon other occasions, that the British Forces could not be wisely reduced, and he did not see that any considerable reduction could be made in the Native Forces. It had been proposed to compel the Native Princes to reduce their Armies, and it was supposed that that reduction might enable the Government to reduce the Native Army of India. He should be glad to see the Armies of some of the Native States of India reduced—not that he entertained the slightest suspicion of the loyalty of the Native Princes of India, but because he objected to a waste of money upon military establishments. The maintenance, however, of those Forces, in almost every case, depended upon Treaty engagements; and the Government of India ought to adhere faithfully, under all circumstances, to the Treaty engagements they had entered into with the Native Princes. He was sure the noble Viscount the Secretary of State would find in the India Office suggestions that considerable reductions could be effected without impairing the efficiency of the Army in certain Departments—for example, in the Medical Service and the Ordnance establishments. He thought, moreover, that the expenses of the Head-quarter Staff of the Madras and Bombay Armies might be revised with advantage, without, however, amalgamating those Armies with that of Bengal. He approved of the proposal to reduce the expenditure on reproductive public works. But it was a mistake to suppose that the expenditure on those works had greatly increased in recent years, because the fact was that it had been less than before. A reduction in the expenditure on reproductive works might be effected with perfect safety, provided it were not done too quickly. He was not sanguine as to the possibility of making any large saving in ordinary public works, and he hoped the noble Viscount the Secretary of State would take care that reduction was not carried out too hastily, otherwise, for the purpose of securing a saving in the year, considerable loss might be incurred. He knew cases in which this had happened, and even compensation had to be paid to contractors in respect of postponement of works. Some reduction might be effected in the civil expenditure; but already there had been great economy in the civil expenditure. Between 1869 and 1876, the civil expenditure had been reduced, as Sir John Strachey had shown, by no less than £1,500,000. It was, therefore, a mistake to suppose that the Government of India had been extravagant with regard to civil expenditure, and that it required the control of the opinion of Parliament at home. The present Governor General had taken up, with great warmth and energy, the question of employing Natives more extensively in the administration. In 1870, the restrictions on the employment of Natives were removed by Parliament; and he (the Earl of Northbrook) had framed rules, which were approved by the Secretary of State, for carrying the intentions of Parliament into effect. He hoped to see the policy he had inaugurated carried further, and that many Natives would be employed, with the contingent advantage of some reduction of expenditure. He was one of those who thought there was nothing wrong in Natives of India being employed at lower rates of salary than English officials. They were not subject to the same expenses as officers coming from a distant country; and, therefore, their salaries might fairly be calculated upon a lower scale. If reductions were made in civil expenditure, it was desirable that they should not be confined to the lower branches of the Service, by cutting off a clerk here and a clerk there; but that the Government would look at the high officers, with large salaries, and see whether some reduction could not be made there. With the view of assisting the Government, as he was anxious to do in all matters relating to reduction of expenditure, he would suggest that the Government might begin so high as the Constitution of the Government of India. When he was Viceroy, the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) added a Member to the Governor General's Council. The duties of the new Member were connected with public works. He (the Earl of Northbrook) did not consider that addition necessary, or, indeed, advisable. The able officer who had been appointed to the charge of the Department had now nearly served his five years; and it might be suggested now whether, at the end of the term, it was necessary to continue the appointment. If it was not, then there would be a saving of £8,000 a-year. There were other positions high up which might be well considered, and as to which advantage might be taken of the present pressure to get over local difficulties and jealousies which very often stood in the way of administrative reforms of the kind. He considered that it might be desirable to examine whether the expenses of the Governments of Madras and Bombay might not be reduced. The Governments of Madras and Bombay were maintained on a much more expensive scale than the Governments of Bengal, the North-West Provinces, and the Punjab, which were not inferior in responsibility and importance at the present time, when communication was much more rapid than formerly. He, therefore, invited the Government to consider whether a large reduction might not be made in the higher appointments connected with those Presidencies. But, while he considered that those reductions might be made, he did not consider that any reduction ought to be made in the pay and allowances of the officers of the Civil Service of India, who were doing the real work of the country. He meant the collectors and magistrates, upon whom the proper administration of India mainly depended. Their salaries were not too high, and their numbers were by no means too great. Looking at the reductions proposed by Her Majesty's Government, he believed, if they were firmly carried out, especially in the Military expenditure, both here and in India, Indian finance would be placed in a satisfactory position. He hoped the depreciation in the value of silver might before long be removed; and a slight alteration in the exchanges would make a considerable difference to the finances of India. Upon this subject he desired to express his entire and hearty approval of the conduct of the Government in respect to certain proposals which he understood were made for an alteration of the standard of value in India, for the purpose of giving an artificial value to the rupee in India. Knowing, as he did, the pressure put on Her Majesty's Government, and the great difficulties they had to contend with in this matter, he desired to express, not only his warm approval of the decision arrived at not to interfere with the standard of value in India, but his conviction that the Government deserved great credit for their firm action in this matter. It was probable that the result of that decision would be to have a favourable effect on the exchanges. He was, however, surprised that the Government had not taken off the duty now imposed upon the importation of manufactured silver into this country, which produced a paltry sum to the Revenue, but the removal of which might have increased the demand for silver, and have done something to keep up its price. He was not one of those who partook of the gloomy anticipations of some, for whose opinions he had great respect, with respect to the future of the finances of India. For himself, he believed that, with economy and care, if it should not be considered necessary to engage in any new wars, the finances of India would soon recover comparative prosperity. He based that view on reasons similar to those which induced Mr. Wilson to entertain sanguine anticipations with regard to the finances of India when he went to India as Finance Minister after the Mutiny—namely, the steady progress of the trade of India.

Before sitting down, he desired to present a Petition from the Committee of the British Indian Association of Calcutta, which consisted of noblemen and gentlemen resident in Bengal. These noblemen and gentlemen included some of the most distinguished among the Native population. Several of them were Members of the Legislative Council of the Viceroy, or occupied positions of the highest importance. They prayed that the expenses of the Afghan War should be borne by this country, and not by India, and they dwelt at length on the circumstances connected with the subject. Under other circumstances, he might have felt it necessary to move that the Petition which he presented, together with other Papers, might be printed and placed in the hands of Members of their Lordships' House; but as the question was one which more particularly concerned the other House of Parliament, and for some further reasons, he would be content with moving that the Petition which he presented do lie upon the Table.

Moved, "That the Petition do lie upon the Table."—(The Earl of Northbrook.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, he had little to complain of in the address their Lordships had just listened to from the noble Earl, with whom he agreed very much in thinking that the finances of India were by no means in so desperate a condition as was represented by some persons both in and out of Parliament. He believed that both the wealth of the country and the circumstances that had led to the present depression were of a character that would ultimately and inevitably lead not merely to the establishment of equilibrium of Revenue and Expenditure, but also to the creation of the financial surplus necessary to provide against a recurrence of Famine. In regard to the Petition which the noble Earl had presented, he did not propose to go at length into a discussion of the questions with which it dealt. He might, however, say that it would, in his view, have been prejudicial alike to the interests of this country and of India if the cost of the war in which we had recently engaged with Afghanistan had been thrown exclusively upon England; it was, indeed, a war which affected India materially, though he would not say exclusively. If an account were taken of English outlay which arose from connection with India it would be found very large. He thought that, except in circumstances of the most extraordinary character, it would be desirable to keep the Revenues of this country and of India entirely separate; and he was bound to say, for his own part, that he considered that the English Government had done all that could be expected of them in making the large loan of £2,000,000 to India on the most favourable terms possible. This was a course which he believed, in the long run, would prove more advantageous to India than any other which could have been adopted. As to the question of silver, any discussion on that subject would scarcely be apposite to the Petition which the noble Earl had presented, inasmuch as he could not admit the intimacy of the relations which were supposed to exist between manufactured silver and that which was used in currency; and, therefore, he could not conceive that the small amount of silver plate imported into this country could have any appreciable effect upon the immense mass of silver in currency in India. He had strong doubts whether the difficulty which undoubtedly existed in reference to this matter of the exchanges could be effectually cured by means of the subtle, artificial, and empirical remedies which had been suggested in some quarters. If artificial means were adopted in a case of the kind, and the Government gained, the inevitable result must be to saddle some persons who ought not to bear it with the loss involved; and, therefore, for this, if for no other reason, a resort to such means ought to be avoided. He now came to a part of the case as to which there was hardly any difference of opinion between himself and the noble Earl. The noble Earl had gone into the wide question of retrenchment. He had suggested measures in regard to the Governments of Madras and Bombay. As to Bombay, it was one of the most important cities of India, and might be said to be connected with the beginning of our rule in India, and was, besides, the headquarters of a rapidly developing trade. Then, whether there might not be reductions in the Council and other official Departments, that was a proper subject for inquiry, and one which, no doubt, would be inquired into. Then, as to the Departments under the Governor General, he had anticipated the noble Earl's suggestion as to the Department of Public Works by expressing his opinion that the office should not be renewed when the tenure of the present holder expired, and that the Department should not be placed under the charge of a professional engineer. It was, undoubtedly, a proper consideration whether other economies could not be effected in the cost of the official Service and Departments in India; and he had himself suggested several ways in which such savings could be accomplished, so that he thought the House might make its mind easy that this branch of the question would not be overlooked by Her Majesty's Government. Their Lordships might also accept his assurance that the employment of Natives in the Public Departments, and also the question of productive works and works of an ordinary character, would not be lost sight of. It was, no doubt, essential that some reduction should be made; but that reduction must not be made too hastily, or as a mere question of present saving of money, without careful regard to future expenditure, lest that result might be brought about against which the noble Earl had warned them, and which would be injurious rather than beneficial. The Government of India was perfectly alive to the importance of that fact. He was very glad to hear the noble Earl say that he was opposed to an amalgamation of the three Armies. He (Viscount Cranbrook) believed there could not be a more disastrous thing for India than to make the three Armies into one. It would, indeed, be a fatal measure, the consequences of which at this moment they could not foresee. It was their imperative duty, however, to take care that each Army had a fair share of employment, and that it was placed in a position where honour and credit could be won whenever the occasion might arise. In regard to the other portions of the military question, the Committee had been already appointed, and would, he had no doubt, give them careful consideration. Though he did not expect there could be any reduction in the British Forces, as the noble Earl said, nor any great reduction in the Native Armies, there were still a great many subjects connected with military expenditure which might well be considered. As far as the Indian Army was concerned, he agreed in thinking that the troops employed in the different Presidencies should be kept apart as far as matters of management and otherwise were concerned. He now came to what was really the main part of the noble Earl's speech. The noble Earl commenced by saying that he was not going to make an attack on the conduct of the Governor General, or to impugn his action. He (Viscount Cranbrook) was perfectly aware that the observation must be taken cum grano salis, and his impression received an immediate justification when the noble Earl proceeded to animadvert strongly upon the course of policy which had been pursued by the Government in reference to the cotton duties. Now, in respect to the comparison of the four years with which the noble Earl commenced his speech, there was very little to be said. The main difference between this year and those is a greater Famine expenditure, and a larger amount of loss by exchange. A great deal had been done in recent years with respect to alterations in finance. Now, in the Financial Statement of the present year would be found a quotation from the Financial Statement of last, which showed that at that time the Indian Government had already determined that there should be no protective duties wherever they could remove them. Instructions were given by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), as early as 1874, that the cotton duties should be taken into consideration; and in a despatch, dated May 31, 1876, his noble Friend said—

“With regard to the question as it affects consumers or producers, I am of opinion that the interests of India imperatively require the timely removal of a tax wrong in principle, injurious in practical effect, and self-destructive in its operation.”

The tendency of the tax was to give an absolute monopoly to India, and it was because there was growing up an artificial protective system that it became necessary there should be some interference. If, as seemed probable, that protection excluded certain classes of goods, the duties would fall off and abolish themselves. The sugar duties had already been abolished—a step to which no one had taken exception. With respect to the salt duties, to which reference had been made, he hoped the period would soon arrive when we should be able more thoroughly to equalize them, and to reduce them to that amount which all Indian financiers had looked forward to as the final result. At present the changes worked well, and there was an increasing demand where for the vast majority they had been lowered, and no falling off where for the minority they had been increased; and he hoped that the time was not distant when all would be fully and cheaply supplied. The noble Earl had objected to the time and manner in which the protective duties upon cotton of which he spoke had been reduced. He must recall to his noble Friend's recollection what had been done. In 1876 it was impressed upon the Government of India, in language quite as strong as that he had already quoted, that they should take the earliest opportunity of removing by degrees the taxes upon the import of cotton; and in 1878 a tentative step was taken in that direction, as regarded certain of the coarser goods, by reducing the duties on those articles. This was done with the full consent of the Council and of the Secretary of State, and was in conformity with the opinion of his noble Friend, which he had already quoted. The tentative measure to which he alluded was, no doubt, a very small one; but it would, it was thought, have reduced the duties by some £40,000 a-year, and it was supposed to meet the most oppressive part of the case. But what was the result? It satisfied nobody; it gave offence in India, and it did not meet, to any extent, the complaint in England. In the beginning of the present year a deputation came to him (Viscount Cranbrook) from Lancashire on this subject. It was a very large deputation, and, as indicating its character, he might mention that its spokesman was an advanced Liberal. The deputation expressed, in very forcible terms, their opinion of the protective duties of which they were speaking. He (Viscount Cranbrook) gave the members of that deputation no further encouragement than had been given by his Predecessor; but promised, as had been done before, to urge the same policy, leaving India to take the initiative. Not long after that he received a telegram from India, asking whether, if the Viceroy overruled his Council on this point—as regarded a reduction of the duties—the Government at home would support him? He consulted with his Colleagues, and telegraphed back that they would support him. Their Lordships must remember that the policy which was thus sanctioned was no new policy, but a policy which had been adopted by the Council; it was a policy enforced by his noble Predecessor (the Marquess of Salisbury), and the Government of India had practically taken the initiative with respect to it. What had been done last year, however, resulted in failure; and as protective duties continued to exist, tending more and more to exclude English manufactures from India, it might be with some the policy of this country to allow India to set up a protective system to the detriment of the manufactures of England; but he could not describe it as a wise policy. If we had Free Trade in England, he thought we had a right to ask for Free Trade in India. We took into consideration the state of manufactures in this country, and we could not disguise from ourselves that masters and workmen felt irritated at the fact that mills were closed or working short time, believing that it was wholly or partly an effect of the protective system in India—and when we were asked whether the Government would support the Viceroy in carrying on a policy, long ago decided upon, we at once said that we should do so; and he believed that course to be in harmony alike in the interests of England and of India. It had been said that the remission of these duties was an injudicious measure in the present financial condition of India. But in regard to the financial condition of that country we must look, not only to the present state of India as regarded finance, but to her past and future. The past, as he had already said, had been most materially affected by the condition of exchange—which, in its turn, very injuriously affected the trade of importation into India. That condition got worse and worse; and it was only on account of that fact that a surplus was prevented this year. That being so, the Viceroy in Council came to the conclusion that the time had come when these protective duties, which were pressing against imports, and coddling, as he might say, an industry which ought, and he believed could, support itself without artificial aid in India, ought to be got rid of—or, at all events, that the most strongly protective part of the duties ought to be removed. They created in that country a fictitious value on cotton goods, and it was distinctly in the interests of the vast consuming populations of India that the duties should be reduced. When he was told to look at the protests of Members of the Governor General's Council which had been presented to Parliament, he could not help reading between the lines, and fancying that these gentlemen—or, at all events, some of them—were Protectionists. The manufacturers of Lancashire asked only for fair play, and that was the principle upon which we had acted. Mr. Stokes, who opposed the step taken by the Viceroy, said what was equivalent to this—that by the remission of the cotton duties the Manchester manufacturers would, in the absence of competition, be able practically to compel the people of India to buy cotton goods adulterated more shamefully than at the present time. He went on to say that it was an imaginary protection; but he added that if it was taken away the result would be the destruction of a local industry. Such language was hardly calculated to decrease the irritation in Lancashire, which was charged with desiring monopoly. Well, but was a monopoly in Manchester worse than a monopoly in Bombay? What was asked for England was nothing more than fair play. Bombay might send goods to England without paying duty; and yet England, which legislated for India, was not to have the right to say that India should not use protective duties, and that to the detriment of her own consumers, who were, for the most part, poor people. But he was told that all the people of India were against what had been done. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Northbrook) would not deny that there was a time when the people of England were opposed to Free Trade. For his own part, no one more heartily wished and prayed that India might increase and prosper in all her industries—as she deserved to do—by means of the earnestness of purpose and the ability shown by many of her children. They ought not, however, to favour her unduly in her competition with England. The Government, he contended, were perfectly justified in the course they had adopted, because the loss in the matter of exchange was really the impediment to a surplus, and was itself working so as to be almost prohibitory of the export of our manufactures. But it was said that the change was made, if not in an illegal, in an unconstitutional manner. Such was not the opinion of Mr. Stokes, who said that the change was authorized by the Act, although he added that it could not have been within the intention of the Legislature. It was a step which was by no means new, for it had been commenced last year by the Governor General in Council, and, in carrying it further, the Viceroy had acted within his power. With respect to the Council at Home, he (Viscount Cranbrook) did not commit them in any way by the answer he had telegraphed to the Viceroy. The noble Earl would find that the Budgets were almost without exception always made in India. They were sent to this country for the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council; and the question now raised would come before the Council, who would have a full opportunity of expressing their opinion in reference to it. Then the noble Earl referred to the Resolutions of the House of Commons.

But the noble Earl must know that that House, by an almost unanimous vote, supported the course taken by the Government. What they had done had been practically condoned by the House of Commons. They had not only said that the Government commenced well, but they urged them to go further in the same direction. Then, as to another point which had been referred to—his own conduct in communicating with the Viceroy without the advice of his Council—there was a Return on the Table of the House, moved for by the Duke of Argyll, who was not then present, and which showed the view the noble Duke had taken as Secretary of State. It would be absolutely impossible to carry on the government of India if the Secretary of State was not to be at liberty to communicate privately, by telegram or otherwise, with the Viceroy of India. What were his Council? They were not a Cabinet selected by the Secretary of State; and was the Secretary of State to reveal to them the secrets of the Cabinet at Home? It would be impossible to carry on business in that way. He thought he had met all the objections put forward by the noble Earl. It was admitted by the noble Duke that the Viceroy was within his right in the step he had taken. He would have been within his right even if he had made no communication to the Government at Home; but it was only reasonable that he should ask the Government at Home whether they would support him in a measure which he felt to be one of high policy, and which was necessary in the interests of India. Her Majesty's Government told him that he might rely on their support; and in sending the telegram to the Viceroy, he (Viscount Cranbrook) had acted in conformity with a usual and necessary practice, and he had the authority of the most eminent Legal Member of the Council (Sir Henry Maine) to that effect. He would not go into the question as to taxes, which might, as was said, with greater advantage have been repealed. He quite agreed that export duties were very objectionable. That observation applied, of course, to the export duty on rice; but the effect of that particular duty on the trade of India might be said to be nothing whatever. India had a monopoly so far as the trade in household or table rice with this country was concerned. To have abolished that duty would not really have affected the trade in any way. He was much indebted to their Lordships for the patience with which they had heard him while he endeavoured to deal with a dry, though very important, subject; but he thought they would say that the course adopted by the Government was one which was taken in the interests of our great Indian Empire, and not only for the advantage of the manufacturing interests of this country.

LORD LAWRENCE, who was very imperfectly heard, was understood to say, that the deficit in the Indian Revenue for the last three years had been upwards of £3,000,000, and, adding to this the expenditure on reproductive works, the deficit was brought up to about £7,000,000. When the extreme poverty of the people of India, and the fact that a large portion of the country was liable to severe Famines, were taken into account, it could not be doubted that the burden of taxation was very great. It was of the greatest importance that they should endeavour to make the two ends meet; and, therefore, he thought the reduction of the cotton duties was an imprudent step, having regard to the financial straits of India, and the difficulty of meeting new emergencies by new taxation. It would be easier to raise £20,000,000 in England than £2,000,000 in India. Considering how much India was dependent on agriculture, and how small her trade compared with her population, it seemed to him that the financial perils of India were great, and that the most careful and economical administration was required to obviate them. With regard to the reduction of the cotton duties, the promise held out to those who clamoured for the remission was that it should be made when the finances of India were in a condition to bear it; but that time had certainly not come, and he thought the Governor General ought not to have gone out of his way to anticipate the decision of Parliament on the subject. It was a vital question whether the Secretary of State should have the power of carrying on the business of the government of India without consulting his Council. His opinion was that, by the Act of 1858, the Secretary of State for India was bound to consult his Council on all questions concerning India, save those which were expressly excepted by the Act; and compliance with this principle was of vital importance for the government of India. After the considerable experience he had had, having served under no less than five Secretaries of State, he regarded this as a vital question; and he deprecated the course taken by the noble Lord (Viscount Cranbrook) in concealing from his Council the decision arrived at with respect to the reduction of the cotton duties. Referring to the Afghan War, he (Lord Lawrence) must express his opinion that as it had been undertaken as much to maintain the honour and prestige of England as in the interest of India, this country was bound to bear her due share of the expenses of the war. A precedent was to be found in the Persian War for what ought to be done in respect of the Afghan War. He approved of the changes which had been made in the salt duties, which still amounted to thirteen times the cost of the article, and pressed heavily upon the millions of India. But the import duties on cotton goods fell mainly on the richer classes, who were the chief buyers of the finer goods made in England, so that the remission was no relief to the great mass of the people, who wore the coarser goods made in India. He was glad the Government had not attempted to interfere with the currency. Any step in that direction might be attended with serious, not to say disastrous, consequences. He could not but approve the determination of the Government to introduce a strict economy into the Administration of India—but that policy required to be carried out very prudently. He did not think, for instance, it would be wise to reduce the Army in India by a single man; but the greatest care should be taken in the selection of the men who were to serve them.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India had very ingeniously devoted a great portion of his speech, not to answering the arguments of his noble Friend the late Viceroy (the Earl of Northbrook), but to replying to those who advocated protectionist theories. Now, he had not a word to say in favour of those theories; and his noble Friend, he was sure, shared his views in that respect. But as to the question before the House, he thought it might be summed up by a reference to the Resolution which was passed by the House of Commons in 1877, in accordance with what then appeared to be the policy of the Government. That Resolution, as amended at the suggestion of Lord George Hamilton, who was then Under Secretary of State for India, was to the effect that the changes with respect to the cotton duties should be made "so soon as the financial condition of India will permit."

It was then admitted, on the part of the Government, that it was desirable the cotton duties should be abolished as speedily as might be; but it was pointed out that they were not prepared to impose new taxes for the purpose, or to run the risk of creating a deficit. Now, that being so, the question between his noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook) and the Government was whether the state of Indian finance at the present time was such as to justify the remission of the cotton duties? He found, in the Budget Resolution of the Government, the position of affairs in India described as being such that it was extremely difficult to follow any settled financial policy, for that the Government could not even approximately say what income would be required to meet the necessary expenditure of the State. Now, for some reason or another, no explanation had been given by the noble Viscount, or, as far as he knew, by any other Member of the Government, as to why they had made so material a change in their policy between 1877 and 1879, as to abandon the wise and statesman-like course of making the remission of the duties when the finances of India would warrant them in doing so, instead of making it at a very inopportune time and in the very hasty manner which had characterized their action in the matter. He could not, he might add, concur with the noble Viscount in thinking that it was a proper course for the Secretary of State to take to commit himself beyond the power of withdrawal to a particular policy before consulting his Council with respect to it. The noble Viscount appeared to forget that they had distinct and definite functions as regarded expenditure to discharge, and that they were in that respect, at all events, not merely his advisers. The Government of India was, of necessity, in the nature of a despotic Government; but it was highly desirable that its rule should be as little arbitrary as possible. He was convinced that nothing could be more dangerous or more fraught with mischief to the good government of India, than the adoption of any course which would tend to weaken and remove those checks which had been imposed upon arbitrary action on the part of the Secretary of State or the Governor General by the provisions of the Acts of Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that he certainly did not want to prolong the discussion in the present deserted state of the House; but he had one consolation—that he believed that this was an overflowing audience compared to that which had listened in "another place" to the discussion on the same subject on Tuesday night. He must be permitted to say that throughout the discussions on this subject, both there and in that "other place," the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) and his Friends had appeared in a very curious light. After having been all their lives, and during a long period of history, vigorous supporters of Free Trade, they no sooner found that the doctrines of Free Trade were being applied by their political opponents to our great Indian Dependency than that they became vigorous Protectionists. The results of this action on their part might not be so small as usually attended the freaks of political Parties in this country. It might be all very well for a Party to take up a decided opinion to-day and drop it to-morrow—people in this country knew the value and meaning of doctrines taken up for the moment by Parties, and dropped when they had served their purpose; but how would foreign nations and our great Dependency, who were not versed in the usages of our Constitutional Law, interpret the phenomenon? Much of the discontent of which they had heard had been raised by the language of those very persons when, three years ago, he had endeavoured to introduce Free Trade into India. He deprecated these violent evolutions in policy—these changes of opinions on the part of the noble Marquess and his Friends when they were in Opposition, as contrasted with those they held when they were in Office. In this case the Governor General overruled his Council. Nobody doubted that he had a strict legal right so to do; but it had been disputed whether he had a Constitutional right to overrule his Council, and whether it was one of those occasions contemplated by Parliament when it invested him with that power. What would naturally be the object of Parliament in placing such a power in the hands of the Governor General upon all subjects where the Councillors were to be trusted? There would be no need to give the Governor General such a power upon all matters where their intelligence had fair play, and when they were unbiassed by any Party passion or any theoretical prepossession. On such questions the Councillors might be safely trusted, and there would be no reason for giving the Governor General power to overrule them. But if there should arise a case where they were hopelessly wrong, or where they were affected by some heresy, or biassed by some prejudice, which this country had earnestly repudiated, the special Representative of English statemanship, as opposed to the Indian statesmanship, ought to be armed with power to overrule their error; and such a case had arisen in the present instance. The Governor General, who represented Indian, and not English, statesmanship, wisely thought that the time had come when this weapon, placed in his hands by the prevision of Parliament, ought to be used and exercised—and he exercised a legal power which he undoubtedly possessed. The noble Lord who spoke last but one (Lord Lawrence) had discussed the question of how far the Indian consumer was interested in the reduction of these duties, and had said he could have no interest whatever, because he did not use English cloth, but Indian cloth. A rudimentary knowledge of the controversy which raged 30 or 40 years ago would be sufficient to dislocate that argument. The price of Native cloth used by the Indian peasant depended upon the amount of competition to which it was exposed; and the amount of that competition depended upon the freedom of the ports through which that competition could enter; and in proportion as that competition was withdrawn from the markets, the Native manufacturer was enabled to charge a higher price. He thought they had all agreed upon this subject 20 or 30 years ago. He supposed there was no doubt whatever that the interests of enormous numbers who consumed cotton goods in India would out-weigh any other interest that could be brought into competition with it. The Indian peasant had two main wants—food and clothing. The Indian peasant's clothing was, he believed, entirely of cotton. Those who desired to cheapen the price of clothing to the Indian peasant were not wholly unworthy of the sympathy of those who, 20 or 25 years ago, desired to cheapen the food of the English peasant. The two cases seemed to him very similar in their operation. It was said that the duty of 5 per cent was not a large one; but that would not appear as a very strong argument to those who remembered how bitterly the project of the shilling duty on corn was opposed in the controversies at the beginning of this generation. Discussing the question from the producer's point of view, he would observe that there was one consideration to which sufficient attention had not been paid. If England and India were two foreign countries dealing with each other, he supposed that, according to the philosophy of the present day, they would make Treaties of Commerce; and if, 30 years ago, England had made such a Treaty with India, she would have proposed to remove her corn duty on condition that India removed her cotton duty. The corn duty, which limited the access of Indian corn to our markets, had been removed. In every part of England the effect of that removal was felt. Every market in this country and every farmer felt, in some degree or other, the effect of the cheapness of corn at the present time. If the question were regarded from a producer's point of view, instead of looking at it, as we generally did, from the consumer's point of view, he had a right to pit the interest of the English farmer, in excluding Indian corn, against the interest of the Bombay millowner in excluding English cloth. As appeared plainly from the despatches laid on the Table of the House, it was not economical considerations which weighed chiefly in his mind when he urged this matter upon the Government of India. The condition of India and England, working well together in that alliance which Providence had destined for them, depended much more upon the agreement of the peoples than upon the policy which the Government might pursue. It was a matter of capital importance that no subject of bitter antagonism should exist between large sections of two communities. He asked any man, who doubted as to removing these duties, these two questions — was it not of vital importance that this cause of quarrel should be removed; and, if it was of vital importance, how was it to be removed? Nobody would dream that it could be removed by maintaining a permanent duty. In the long run, the line contended for by the Lancashire manufacturers was founded on sound policy; and, therefore, the only durable and safe solution of the controversy was to act upon their view. He felt that this was not an occasion to enter largely upon other matters discussed in this debate, and he should not speak on the question whether India ought or ought not to bear the burden of the Afghan War. He would only say this — that if England was to share with India everything in which Indian interests were mainly concerned, the converse, at least, must be true, and India must share every warlike undertaking in which English interests were a foremost and essential consideration. If they were to carry this out and go back to the Crimean War, they would find that England had paid far more than her share in the costs that ought to be borne in the common partnership. It appeared a sound principle, that where the war was waged for the interests of India alone—where the object of the war was to keep the Frontier of India clear—India should pay the cost. Any other doctrine would introduce a system of perpetual application to the English Treasury, disastrous not only to English solvency but fatal to Indian thrift.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK rose to say a few words in reply, when—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was no Motion before the House, and, therefore, the noble Earl could not reply.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, though he had been a long time in that House, he did not remember a case in which a noble Lord who had introduced a subject raising an important discussion had not been allowed the privilege of making a few observations in reply.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Rule of both Houses was that only a noble Lord or hon. Member who moved a substantive Motion had the privilege referred to.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK reminded the noble and learned Lord that he had concluded with a Motion; but he would not further engage the attention of their Lordships.

LORD SELBORNE said, he would not take upon himself to say what reply his noble Friend might have made, if he had been permitted to reply at all. But he would himself venture to make one remark on the speeches of the Secretary of State for India and the Foreign Secretary, which he was sure his noble Friend would not have omitted. Both those noble Lords had justified the action of the Governor General in overruling his Council, not on the ground of any special Indian interests, but altogether on grounds of general British policy; that was, on the policy of Free Trade, and the policy of avoiding causes of difference between British industry and the Government of India. He would put it to the common sense of any man, whether this was not distinctly to set aside the spirit and substance, if not the letter, of the Act of Parliament, which gave the Governor General the power of overruling his Council only on grounds specifically and expressly Indian? If the general policy of Free Trade could be pretended to be such a ground, he did not see what other reason of European policy might not, with equal plausibility, be alleged to be so.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the remarks made by his noble and learned Friend showed the great inconvenience of the course taken by the noble Earl who introduced this discussion. The noble Earl placed this Notice on the Paper—

“To call attention to the condition of the Finances of British India, and to present a Petition from the Committee of the British Indian Association of Calcutta.”

If the noble Earl believed, or if the noble and learned Lord believed, that the Viceroy had not conformed to the Act of Parliament, and if they considered that in acting in opposition to his Council the Viceroy had violated the Act of Parliament—and a greater violation of an Act of Parliament than that suggested by his noble and learned Friend he could not conceive—it was the duty of the noble Earl or the noble and learned Lord to introduce the subject and challenge the action of the Viceroy. If they had done that, they would have raised a clear issue; but it was not in a meagre House that such a question should be raised, and thrown out as a statement which could not be controverted. He was prepared to controvert it. If the noble and learned Lord was prepared to maintain the opposite, let a Motion be placed on the Paper of their Lordships' House, and it should be met.

Petition ordered to lie on the Table.

MR. LEONARD EDMUNDS—"THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. EDMUNDS."

QUESTIONS.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) asked—

"1. Whether the original award of Messrs. Denman and Pollock, the arbitrators in the case of the Attorney General v. Edmunds in the year 1868-69, is now preserved in the Treasury; and whether all the proceedings and evidence in the said arbitration were presented to and recorded in the Treasury:

"2. To move that there be laid on the Table of the House a copy of the said award as deposited and recorded in the Treasury, and also a copy of the detailed evidence and proceedings before the said arbitrators, including the surcharges and allowances made by them:

"3. To ask whether the award of the arbitrators and the accompanying account of surcharges and allowances was returned to the Court of Chancery or to any other Court of Record; and whether it was made part of the record in the information suit of the Attorney General v. Edmunds, or any other suit?"

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he would endeavour to give his noble Friend as clear answers to the Questions he had put as he was able. In regard to the first part of his Question, he might say that the original award had not been preserved. Judgment having been signed, the original was of no further use; if, however, the noble Earl wished it, a copy could be supplied to him. In regard to the other Papers, the shorthand writers' notes and proceedings being Treasury Papers, they could not be given; but if the noble Earl wished for the evidence, and he applied to the shorthand writers, no doubt they would be able to furnish it. The amount of the award and the surcharges and allowances was recorded in the Court of Queen's Bench.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) asked when was it recorded?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he did not know.

The Lord Chancellor

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he should like to say one word on this matter. His noble Friend took the course, year after year, of placing on the Paper, in various forms, a Motion of Inquiry into this unfortunate subject, which he (the Lord Chancellor) had looked upon as dead and buried years and years ago. Such a course could only do harm at the present time, when it was utterly impossible to revive the matter. He should like to direct his noble Friend's attention to the fact that his Question was founded on a misapprehension as to the nature of an award. An award was never recorded in the Court of Chancery, or in any other Court; but when it was made, either party could take it up; the award was made a Rule of Court—which was a very different thing to recording it—and on that Rule judgment was given. As regarded the Question which his noble Friend asked as to the evidence taken in the proceedings before the arbitrators, it was a mistake to suppose that the arbitrator put the evidence in his award; such a thing was never heard of. If either of the parties chose, for his own information, to employ a shorthand writer, it was perfectly open to him to do so, and it might be possible for his noble Friend to obtain a copy of the evidence from the shorthand writers. His Question, however, was founded on an entire misapprehension.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Ten o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 19th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—£500,000, Exchequer Bonds*.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—£6,567,023, Consolidated Fund.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Poor Law Amendment (No. 2) [212]; Mungret Agricultural School, &c.* [213]; Petroleum Act (1871) Amendment* [214].

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [88]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Wormwood Scrubs Regulation (re-comm.)* [205]; Indian Marine [182-211]; Salmon Fishery Law Amendment (No. 2)* [188].

Third Reading—Public Health Act (1875) Amendment (Interments) [61], and passed.

Withdrawn—Rating of Towns (Ireland)* [14].

QUESTIONS.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS 1854 AND 1876—THE BRIGANTINE "CALENICK."

QUESTION.

Mr. MAC IVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the case of the brigantine "Calenick," which the Board of Trade caused to be surveyed at Hamburg in 1877; and if it is true that such survey was illegal, and that serious injury was done to the vessel, and that the owner claimed damages against the Board of Trade, but is practically without redress unless by an expensive process at law?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The case of the Calenick took place before I was connected with the Board of Trade. It has been repeatedly under the consideration of the Board, and has been previously mentioned in this House. In February, 1878, a Question, substantially to the same effect as that which is now put by my hon. Friend, was asked of Sir Charles Adderley. The Calenick was abandoned at sea, and the examination of the vessel took place with the sanction and approval of the Wreck Commissioner, for the purposes of the official inquiry then being held before him, and without protest on the part of the owner, who was made cognizant of, and virtually acquiesced in, the action taken by the Board of Trade. As far as I can ascertain, no serious or, indeed, any injury was done to the vessel, which the Court found to be unseaworthy. With regard to the recovery of damages, we have fully considered the matter; and being satisfied that, to the best of our judgment, there is no ground whatever for compensating the owner, are, of course, unable to make him any grant out of the public funds at our disposal for such purposes. I need hardly add that it is competent for him to avail himself of the usual remedies to enforce his claim, if so advised.

THE CAPE COLONY—MR. JUSTICE FITZPATRICK.—QUESTION.

Mr. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If his attention has been called to the remarks made by Mr. Justice Fitzpatrick, after a lengthened Circuit in the northern and western parts of Cape Colony, to the Grand Jury at the Criminal Sessions at Cape Town, reported in the "Cape Argus" of May 6th, when, after congratulating them upon the lightness of the calendar, the learned Judge is reported to have observed—

"There appeared to be indications through the country of mutual bad feeling, and uncomfortable sensations between the coloured races by whom we are surrounded and the white population. The magistrates have reported to me that the tone of the natives has become uncomfortably morose, half insolent, and defiant, and certainly the tone of the white population has altered not, in my opinion, for the better. There appeared to me to be a sense of antagonism, a feeling that, right or wrong, the time has come for putting down the blacks. . . . I felt this all through the Circuit, that, from a sense of danger, or from a sense of wrong, or some other causes, there is a feeling amongst the white population which is not in accordance with the principles which have guided them heretofore. . . . It is anything but agreeable to find such a state of things prevailing—in fact the white population seem to have found their dark-coloured neighbours guilty of a skin not a colour like their own."

and, whether these observations are correctly reported; and, if so, will he take steps to obtain from the magistrates the reports of the matters to which the learned Judge referred, and other information to corroborate his statements?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have seen the newspaper report referred to by the hon. Member. I do not know whether it is a correct report of the learned Judge's charge; but there are other parts of it which, to some extent, modify the effect of the quotation which the hon. Member has made. The Judge does not say that the reports in question were received from the magistrates in all parts of his Circuit, but only in various places; he distinctly states the feeling referred to not to be one of declared hostility. He says that he is sure the principles which have guided heretofore the white cultivated people of the country will guide them in future; and that he thinks it his duty to notice the matter because he believes its being noticed will tend to correct it. I share that hope so far as my own feeling is concerned; and with regard to the particular Question which the hon. Member has asked me, I scarcely think there would be much good in obtaining these particular reports of the magistrates, as full information on the state of feeling between the White and Native population in the Cape Colony, sent to me in the ordinary way, has been, and will continue to be, included in the Papers presented to Parliament.

THE GOVERNMENT OF HAYTI—MR. MAUNDER.—QUESTION.

LORD ARTHUR RUSSELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to obtain from the Government of Hayti a settlement of the long-pending claims of the widow and children of the late Mr. Maunder, of Liverpool; and, whether it be true that the Government of Hayti have recently endeavoured to evade the settlement of these claims by means of evidence which has since been discovered by Her Majesty's Government to be forged; and, if so, whether there is any objection to the publication of the Correspondence which has passed?

MR. BOURKE: Her Majesty's Government have frequently urged upon the Haytian Government, in the strongest diplomatic manner, the justice of Mrs. Maunder's claims; but that Government now denies the rights of Mrs. Maunder, on the ground that her husband was a Haytian. In support of this contention, evidence has been put forward which there is ground for suspecting has been fabricated. The Papers are now again before the Law Officers, and Her Majesty's Government are considering the course which it will be proper to pursue.

JAMAICA—COOLIE IMMIGRATION. QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table Copy of any Correspondence which may have passed during 1878 and 1879 between the Colonial Office and the Governor of Jamaica relative to the financial conditions under which, as laid down by Lord Carnarvon, when Secretary of State, any further Coolie immigration was to be conducted?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he would have no objection to lay on the Table the Correspondence referred to by the hon. Member when it was concluded, so far as it had been presented to the Legislative Council in Jamaica.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

FLOODING OF RIVERS—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. HARCOURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering the vast and increasing damage done to agricultural produce by the preventible flooding of rivers, and which is at this moment in many parts adding considerably to the prevalent agricultural distress, it is the intention of the Government to use their utmost endeavours to pass a measure, during the present Session of Parliament, for the purpose of giving the necessary powers to owners and occupiers of land, and to others, to deal immediately with these important matters?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Government have introduced a Bill, which has passed the other House of Parliament, and has come down to this House, on this subject; and they hope it may be in their power to proceed with it in the course of the present Session.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE WAR—AMBULANCE ARRANGEMENTS. QUESTION.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Committee that has been appointed to inquire into the organization of the Army, will receive instructions from the Government to consider what ambulance arrangements it will be desirable to make, so that the sick and wounded soldiers of the British Army should not in the future be left in any way dependent for nursing and surgical assistance on the necessarily precarious and inadequate aid of charitable and voluntary associations, as in some measure seems to be the case at present in South Africa?

COLONEL STANLEY: It is matter for regret that the hon. Gentleman was, perhaps, not present in the House on Monday evening when it was my duty to state that, so far as I am aware, the arrangements for the care of the sick and wounded soldiers now serving in South Africa have been properly attended to. I stated, at the same time, that, so far as I was informed, every arrangement had been made for their proper comfort. I have not thought that it would be wise, however, to make that a ground for discouraging the charitable feeling which has appeared to prevail amongst many classes of people, who have been anxious to contribute from their private means assistance to those who were invalided or sick.

DOMINION OF CANADA—LOAN FOR THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

QUESTION.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is true that a deputation consisting of Members of the Canadian Government is coming to this country to ask Her Majesty's Government for a loan, or the guarantee of a loan, for the purpose of constructing the Pacific Railroad; and, if so, whether it is coming in consequence of communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Canada; and, if so, whether the Correspondence that has taken place can be at once laid upon the Table?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Last week I received from Lord Lorne a copy of 14 resolutions which had been adopted in the Dominion House of Commons with reference to the Pacific Railway. One of them is as follows:—

"That, in view of the importance of keeping good faith with British Columbia and completing the consolidation of the Confederation of Provinces in British North America, and for the purpose of extending relief to the unemployed working classes of Great Britain and affording them permanent homes on British soil, and in view of the national character of the undertaking, the Government of Canada is authorized and directed to use its best efforts to secure the co-operation of the Imperial Government in this great undertaking and obtain further aid, by guarantee or otherwise, in the construction of this great national work."

That is all I know of the matter. The deputation is not coming in consequence of communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Canada, and there has been no correspondence on the subject.

LAW AND JUSTICE—PRISONERS AT THE YORKSHIRE ASSIZES.

QUESTION.

MR. BARRAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will state what number of prisoners from each of the three ridings were indicted at the last Yorkshire Assizes held in the city of York; and, whether, if he finds that by far the largest number of prisoners comes from the west riding, he will direct that in future the Assizes for the county of York shall be held at Leeds?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he found that the number at the last Yorkshire Assizes was as follows:—West Riding, 27; East Riding, 2; North Riding, 9. As to holding the Assizes in future at Leeds, he would consult the learned Judges upon the matter before the next Circuit.

ARMY—DISCIPLINE OF THE MILITARY SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, If he proposes to take any action on the report of General Fitzmayer, concurred in by General Lord Airey, regarding the discipline of our Military Schools; or, whether the education of Cadets will be one of the subjects referred to the Military Committee about to sit, especially the shortness of the present course at Sandhurst and the entire absence of modern languages?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the action he had taken on the Report referred to by the hon. Gentleman, or rather upon the Report of the other visitors of the Royal Military Academy, from which General Fitzmayer dissented, was that he had requested the Commander-in-Chief to direct his attention to the subject of that Report, which had since been referred to the Governors of the Royal Military Academy and the Royal Military College for their consideration. He had not yet received their reply, but he had called for it; and he had no reason to doubt that it would be of such a character as would enable him to lay it upon the Table of the House in continuation of the other Papers on the subject. As regarded the Military Commission, it was no part of their duty to inquire into the education of officers.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—OUTBREAK OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE AT DERBY.

QUESTION.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is the case that thirty-three fat cattle from Canada landed at Liverpool were brought by rail to Derby on the 9th June, and removed to a field within the borough; whether on the 10th instant the sanitary inspector of the borough and the veterinary inspector under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act certified to three cattle of the lot being infected with foot and mouth disease, which three were slaughtered by their orders; whether thirteen of the remainder were subsequently slaughtered for food with the sanction of the local authority; whether it is true that on the 11th instant the same authority permitted the remaining seventeen head of cattle to be removed by rail to Nottingham; whether this is not contrary to the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act; whether inquiry will be made as to the state of the cattle when landed at Liverpool; and, whether they were passed by the Government inspector and allowed by him to be removed to Derby?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease at Derby was reported to us on June 12 as having occurred among American cattle, and an inquiry was immediately instituted. It appears that cattle from Canada were landed from the steamship Dominion at Liverpool on June 6. They were examined twice by the Inspector of the Privy Council on that day, and by the Inspector of the Local Authority on June 8 and 9, and found free from disease. Fourteen of these animals were purchased by a salesman in Liverpool and sent to Derby, where three were found by the Inspector of the Local Authority to be affected with foot-and-mouth disease on June 10. These animals were slaughtered, together with 24 others said to be of the same lot. If the animals were affected with foot-and-mouth disease, it must have been contracted between June 6 (the day of landing) and June 10; or if they had been infected in Canada, the disease would have been so far advanced during the voyage that it could not have escaped detection on landing. I am informed that certain animals of the same cargo were sent from Liverpool to Nottingham and also to London; but from the reports of the Inspectors it does not appear that any of them were affected by disease.

Colonel Kingscote

ARMY—ORDNANCE STORE DEPARTMENT RE-ORGANIZATION.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Warrant for the re-organisation of the Ordnance Store Department will be likely to be published; and, whether the officers of this department will receive the same advantages as the officers of the Commissariat Department in their Warrant?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the delay in the issuing of the Warrant was partly owing to the illness of one of the principal officers concerned. It was impossible to say how far the principle of the Commissariat Department Warrant would be applicable to the Store Department.

INDIA—COMMISSION ON MILITARY EXPENDITURE.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the list of names of the officers reported in the "Times" of Monday to inquire into the Military Expenditure of India is correct; whether the terms of reference from the Viceroy in Council to the Commission will be submitted to this House before the meeting of the Commission; and, whether it could not be arranged that the expenditure on the Indian Marine should also be inquired into by the same Commission?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, that the list of names was correct. The terms of the Reference had not yet been received; but when they were there would be no objection to lay them upon the Table of the House. The expenditure on the Indian Marine had been thoroughly considered, and a considerable reduction of expenditure had been recommended.

FRANCE—THE NEW TARIFF LAW.

QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, At or about what date it is expected that the promulgation will be made in France of the expected new French General Tariff Law?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that inasmuch as the Committee appointed by the Chamber of Deputies had not yet made their Report on the subject, it was impossible to say when the new French Tariff Law would be promulgated.

IRELAND—IRISH BUTTER—DEPRECIATION OF VALUE.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the falling off which has been taking place in the quality of Irish butter, and the consequent alarming depreciation in English and Foreign Markets of the value of that important staple of Irish production; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will introduce or support a Bill to establish a Government brand for Irish butter, similar to that which has proved so effective in raising and keeping up the character of Scotch herrings?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I have seen statements to the effect that there has been a depreciation, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, in the quality of Irish butter; but it appears to me that the real remedy lies in the hands of the persons who ask redress. If they would improve the quality of the butter they would attain their object in the shortest manner. But I will see whether anything can be done in the direction the hon. Member suggests, and will communicate with the Agricultural Society and other persons, on whose opinion it might be useful to form a judgment.

MR. ERRINGTON: Sir, I beg to give Notice that on Monday I shall ask leave to introduce a Bill to establish Government brands on Irish butter.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—LONDON SCHOOL BOARD EXPENDITURE.

QUESTIONS.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to give effect by Minute to the suggestion made by him in the debate on the Motion of the honourable Member for East Gloucestershire; whether there is any intention of passing such a Minute this Session; and, if so, whether it will be laid upon the Table immediately; and, whether an early opportunity will be afforded for the discussion of so important and novel a change in the principles hitherto governing the grants to schools?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: In speaking upon the debate on the London School Board expenditure I stated that for some time past proposals had been under consideration which, while in no way impairing the efficiency of the public elementary education, would tend to limit the excessive expenditure now incurred by managers of certain schools purporting to be elementary. I did not, and cannot, however, in any way pledge myself to details. I simply indicated the way in which School Boards, if possible, should go. Since then the matter has been under the consideration of the English and Scotch Committees on Education, so that I hope we may be able to mature something in the direction indicated before the close of the Session. Of course, no Minute tending to limit the expenditure of schools can come into effect until the managers of schools have had plenty of time to conform to the conditions contained in it; therefore, in the event of any such Minute being published, there will be ample opportunity afforded for its discussion before it comes into practical operation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Is it intended to introduce the Minute before the Education Estimates are brought on? It is very desirable that we should have the Minute before us when we are considering the Estimates.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Of course, as soon as Her Majesty's Government have come to a final decision the Minute will be laid upon the Table of the House; but I cannot absolutely undertake to lay it on the Table before the Estimates are taken.

INDIA—THE FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that four covenanted Indian civilians have been appointed with special rates of pay, sanctioned by the Secretary of State for India, to the Financial Department since January 1877, over the heads of several European and Native uncovenanted civilians who have for many years been in the Department, and thus retarding the promotion of these latter officers; and, whether these appointments have been made on account of the inefficiency of the uncovenanted servants in the Department, or for what other reason?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Three, and I believe four, such covenanted civilians have been appointed; but, under the orders of the Secretary of State, any such appointments since April, 1877, are provisional only and subject to review when the scheme for the re-organization of the Financial Department is sent home. That scheme is expected shortly.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. VANS AGNEW asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering the Second Reading of the Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Bill was carried by a majority of 127, and that the Scottish Members voted in the proportion of forty-seven to two in favour of the measure, and that it was supported by the Lord Advocate, he will give facilities for the further progress of the Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is quite impossible for me to give any facilities.

CRIMINAL LAW — VACCINATION ACT, 1871.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mary Emma Cryan, described as a domestic servant, heard before justices at Leeds on the 23rd of May last, on a summons for an order to vaccinate her child; whether it be the fact that it was stated in her defence that the child was not in her custody, but was with her husband, its father, in Ireland; whether, notwithstanding, the justices made the order with costs, or three days imprisonment, saying, as reported in the "Leeds Express" of May 24th, "If you cannot obey it, that will be a good defence;" whether she had not been already prosecuted in respect of the same child, and made the same defence, to the knowledge of the vaccination officer prosecuting in both instances; and, whether such an order can legally be made without evidence that the defendant has the custody of the child required to be vaccinated?

M. Onslow

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: My attention was first called to the case by the hon. and learned Gentleman's Notice of the Question, and I have since made inquiry on the subject. It appears to have been stated at the hearing of the case that the child was not in the custody of Mary Cryan, the person summoned, but was with its father in Ireland. I find, however, that the Guardians have reason to believe that this statement is untrue, and there were also suspicious circumstances with regard to the registration of the child's birth which, by means of these proceedings, they seemed to have desired to elucidate. It is the fact that the Justices made the order that the child should be vaccinated, and that one of them said "that if the defendant could not obey it that would be a good defence." I understand that the defendant has been prosecuted on two former occasions, and do not doubt that the same defence was made on those occasions. Upon the facts, so far as I have been able to ascertain them, I cannot say that the Justices were not empowered to make the order; because section 11 of the Vaccination Act, 1871, clearly contemplates that proceedings may be taken against a parent, although the child may not be in the Union at the time. I should add, however, that the defendant did not herself appear before the Justices, and no evidence was given or tendered on her part to show that the child was not within her custody or power.

CUSTOMS—RE-ORGANISATION OF THE CLERICAL SERVICE.—QUESTIONS.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether all the schemes for the re-organisation of the Customs Clerical Service in London and the out-ports are yet ready for promulgation, and also from what date they will take effect?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that all the schemes for the re-organisation of the Customs Clerical Service, with the exception of that for the Statistical Department, had been approved by the Treasury, subject to the revision of certain details, and when the revision had been effected they would be ready for promulgation. The schemes for the re-organisation of the Statistical Department in London and in the out-ports were still under the consideration of the Treasury. It was intended that all these schemes should eventually take effect from the 1st of April last.

MR. RITCHIE asked when the revision would take place?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Immediately on the Papers being returned with the answers from the Customs.

NEW PALACE AT BAGSHOT PARK.

QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the stonework at the Duke of Connaught's new palace at Bagshot Park has been or is performed by convict labour?

MR. GERARD NOEL: The building now being erected by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught at Bagshot Park has nothing whatever to do with the Office of Works, and I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member any information with regard to the subject of his Question.

NAVY—ADMIRALTY CHARTS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. STEWART asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will direct inquiries to be made into the present arrangements of the Hydrographic Department, with a view to secure for the Merchant Service a more speedy and certain supply of Admiralty Charts?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that the arrangements for the supply of charts for the Merchant Service were fully reconsidered between 1870 and 1873, and were then settled on a principle which was deemed the best that could be adopted. The charts were 3,000 in number, and they were constantly under revision. It was, therefore, exceedingly difficult to keep at every port a supply of charts which should be always available for service if required; but they could be sent for by telegraph and forwarded by post. If the hon. Member had any suggestion to make for the improvement of the present system, they would be exceedingly glad to consider it.

INDIA—PETITION OF MR. WILLIAM TAYLER—SIR FREDERICK HALLIDAY.

QUESTION.

MR. STAVELEY HILL asked the Under Secretary of State for India,

Whether the Government would reconsider the answer which was given on Monday to the Question he then put affecting this gentleman?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The answer which I made to the Question of my hon. Friend on Monday last was given after much consideration, but with great hesitation. Since that time very strong representations have been made to my noble Friend of the injustice that may be done to Sir Frederick Halliday if he should be precluded from explaining the course which he adopted in 1857. The Secretary of State has, therefore, reconsidered the matter, and has decided to give to that gentleman the opportunity of placing his justification upon record, and I have accordingly presented his statement to-day.

COLONY OF VICTORIA—THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION—POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.—QUESTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I beg to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter, Whether it is his intention to proceed to-morrow with the Notice of Motion which stands in his name with regard to the affairs of the Colony of Victoria? My hon. Friend is aware of the reason for the delay in the publication of the last portion of the Correspondence on the subject, and will, I think, agree with me that it would be very inconvenient that the discussion should take place until these Papers are in the hands of hon. Members.

MR. A. MILLS said, it was not his intention to proceed with his Motion at present; but he trusted he would have an opportunity of bringing it forward after the whole of the Correspondence was in the hands of hon. Members. The Resolution which he intended to move was as follows:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, Imperial intervention in the constitution of Colonies possessing representative government is undesirable and inconsistent with the rights of self-government granted to those Colonies, unless such intervention is officially solicited by both branches of the Colonial Legislature.”

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY (IRELAND)—ASSUMPTION OF A UNIVERSITY DEGREE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can state to the House if any action has been taken by the Senate of the Queen's University in Ireland upon the charge of unauthorised assumption of a University degree recently brought by a Professor and Member of the Council of Queen's College, Galway, against one of his colleagues in the Council and Professoriate?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I understand that the case referred to in the hon. Gentleman's Question is that of a Professor of Queen's College, Galway, who assumed, without authority, a degree of the University of Dublin. The assumption of unauthorized degrees and titles is, I am afraid, by no means an exceptional instance. The assumption of foreign titles, and even of titles of British nobility, have been frequently brought under public notice within the past few years; and with respect to the dignity of Baronet, it has been suggested that the introduction of an Act of Parliament was necessary for the restriction of it. I am not prepared to say how far the unauthorized assumption of any title of dignity is, in itself, an indictable offence; but in this particular instance the object, I understand, of the assumption of the degree was rather of a social than of a pecuniary nature. It, therefore, appears to me that it is rather a matter between the person himself and the University authorities; and, as at present advised, the Government are not prepared to take any action on the subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 17th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Punishments.

Clause 44 (Scale of punishments by courts martial).

MR. J. HOLMS moved, after "lashes," to insert—

"And shall not be inflicted upon a non-commissioned officer or on a reduced non-commissioned officer for any offence committed while holding the rank of non-commissioned officer."

Mr. O'Donnell

He understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was prepared to accept the Amendment; therefore, he should not trouble the Committee further.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. OTWAY said, he had no desire to intrude unnecessarily upon the time and patience of the Committee; but it did seem to him that the question of corporal punishment and the proceedings of the Committee having taken a somewhat unexpected turn, that an opportunity was afforded for making a suggestion by which much valuable time would be secured to the Government for the prosecution of Public Business, and by the acceptance of which many hon. Members sitting on the Opposition side of the House felt that satisfaction would be given to the soldiers of the Army and to the people of the country. It was not too late to make that suggestion even now, and, therefore, he should presently make it. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War should think fit to interrupt him by expressing his assent, he would willingly spare the Committee the observations he should otherwise think it his duty to make. He hoped the Committee would acquit him of any presumption, if he said that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had shown, in the spirit in which he entered upon this discussion yesterday, a fairness and conciliation which deserved all their praise. But it was obvious that his heart was not in the cause which he defended; and probably he (Mr. Otway) might say the same of all the hon. Gentlemen who sat on that side of the House. He would never cast upon those hon. Gentlemen the imputation that they could desire to maintain a punishment which must be in itself odious, as odious to them as to those hon. Gentlemen who sat with him. No doubt they, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, were actuated in the part they took in this matter by a sense of right, believing it to be necessary for the maintenance of discipline in the Army that corporal punishment should be continued. He had no doubt, indeed, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was supported in his opinion by the authority of those who had guided him in this matter. It was the value of that authority which he should have to examine presently; but what he wished to point out to the Committee was this—that, guided by that authority, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman informed them, at an early period of the discussion of this clause, that he was unable to assent to any abatement of the punishment which it was proposed to be put upon the soldiers. Well, what took place? At the onset, his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) pointed out that the inconveniences and irregularities—he might say the mischief—arising from this punishment being inflicted for crimes which were not determined, would be so great that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was obliged to make a great concession, and agree to put in a Schedule, to be hereafter appended to the Bill, all the offences for which corporal punishment should be inflicted. Again, an hon. Gentleman on that side of the House rose, notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that he could not, under any circumstances, assent to a diminution of the punishment as fixed in the Bill—an hon. Member moved a further and considerable diminution of the punishment, to reduce it, in fact, by one-half; and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, yielding to better influences, yielding to the strong expression of opinion which came from the Opposition side of the House, gave way on that point, on which he had formerly declared it would be impossible for him to make any concession. Therefore, what was the state of things? Fifty per cent of the punishment the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had abandoned; and by the fact that all the offences for which corporal punishment would be given had to be hereafter scheduled, 49-50ths of the remaining punishment would not be inflicted. The question he wished to put to the Secretary of State for War was this. Having given up 99 per cent of this barbarous and odious treatment—treatment applied to the British Army alone, for there was not a soldier of any other civilized State in the world who was subjected to this punishment—having abandoned 99 per cent of this treatment, was it worth his while to contend with the House for the maintenance of the fragment that remained? It occurred to him to make this suggestion to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in the hope that it would meet with his assent. The suggestion was that he should consent that they should now report Progress on this Bill ["Oh, oh!"], and that he should confer—[Interruption]. He regretted to see hon. Gentlemen treat a proposition on a matter so serious as this with levity, for it was not a laughing matter to the British Army, neither was it a laughing matter to the British people. The proposition which he had to make to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was that he should assent to report Progress on the Bill now, and that he should consult with those military authorities by whom he had been guided hitherto as to whether it was really worth the while of the Department over which he presided to retain the fragment of the punishment which they originally considered necessary? If so, then the other clauses of the Bill might be proceeded with with expedition, and they would not have those complaints which were continually being made about the stagnation of Business, and of the impossibility of carrying the Bill through the House. He regretted to see that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman made no sign of approbation of that course. If he had done so, he should, as he had previously said, most willingly have abstained from making any further observations. Inasmuch as the Secretary of State for War had not signified his approval, it was required of him to ask the attention of the Committee to the nature of the punishment. Corporal punishment could only be inflicted by cat-o'-nine-tails; and it was to this barbarous, and degrading, and exceptional treatment of the soldier that he desired to call their attention. What was the scene that was presented in that House on Tuesday last? He asked hon. Gentlemen to recall for one moment the statement that was made by an hon. Member of that House. He did not wish to harrow the hon. Member's feelings unnecessarily by referring to the subject; but it was indispensable that he should notice one part of his statement. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) stated on the floor of this House that his father had been subjected to corporal punishment by the cat-o'-nine-tails for a breach of discipline which was never proved against him; that the punishment by that instrument was, in its nature, of that severity that when he followed him to the grave, between 30 and 40 years after it was inflicted, the marks were almost as plain on his back as at the time they were made; and the hon. Gentleman further added that his father suffered to the day of his death, not only from the stigma and degradation, but from the pain that was caused by the wounds 30 years after the punishment. On the ground of cruelty alone, if there were no other reasons, it was time that this country should abolish for its soldiers treatment such as that. Let him for a moment inquire whether it was really impossible to carry on the discipline of the Army without the infliction of this punishment. He would never speak lightly of any matter which affected the discipline of the Army, for he knew that in military quarters it was absolutely necessary to enforce certain rules, and equally necessary to maintain discipline. But it had never been proved that the enforcement of these rules, and the maintenance of discipline, could alone be secured by the infliction of the lash. It had been stated; but it had never been proved. Those arguments had been used a hundred times previously. They were used 10 years ago, when he submitted a Motion to the notice of the House—a Motion which was eventually carried by a narrow majority, but which abolished for ever this degrading punishment in times of peace. They heard all these arguments then. The right hon. Gentleman the then Secretary of State for War came down and read a letter from the highest military authority in the country, stating that the discipline of the Army could not be maintained if flogging were done away with in times of peace. But had the discipline of the Army suffered in consequence? Had not the discipline of the Army been maintained? Notwithstanding the adoption of the Motion he then submitted discipline had been preserved, and that should cause them somewhat to distrust those statements when they were made concerning the Army when engaged in war. But he would also examine that question; and he thought he should show them that this punishment was not only degrading and barbarous, but that it absolutely failed as a deterrent, and that it was absolutely unequal for carrying out what was expected of it. When he submitted his Resolution on this subject in the House of Commons, in 1867, he thought it better that they should deal with the question as it related to times of peace. Now they were, unhappily, engaged in a state of war. If he was wrong in what he was now about to say he wished that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would contradict him. He was informed—in fact, he knew it to be so—that the punishment of flogging was being carried on in South Africa to an enormous extent. A shallow-minded man would answer—“You will see that is a proof that flogging must be kept up.” His answer to that was complete, for it was this—that as they were obliged to flog every day it was a proof that the punishment was of no value whatever. It would be unfair, when discussing the question, not to meet the statement which was often made, that if they abolished flogging they would be obliged to institute some severer punishment. He was prepared to meet them on that ground; and he would say at once that a state of war was a thing so exceptional—unfortunately, under the auspices of Her Majesty's present Government, it had been less exceptional than hitherto—that they must meet the circumstances which arose in an exceptional manner. If a soldier deserted to the enemy in time of war, if a soldier betrayed his post, if a soldier imperilled, by firing his musket or by some other signal, the lives and safety of his comrades, what treatment would they mete out to him? He (Mr. Otway) would not flog him; but he would put him exactly in the same position as a civilian, who had merited punishment in his country by crimes equally serious. He said, treat military offences in times of war as military offences were treated in times of war by all nations; but he would not subject men in times of war to a treatment which was not efficacious, but which was degrading. Take the cases of the commission of these offences by the soldiers in South Africa. It was said—

Mr. Otway

“We do not wish to shoot a man committing the offence; we cannot imprison him; and, therefore, we must inflict this punishment of flogging.”

But he took exception to the statement that the soldier could not be imprisoned. He could be secured under guard, and what would happen? He would be treated in this way—on the first occasion when Zulu prisoners were to be transported to the nearest station—for it was not to be supposed that they could be kept hanging about the Army—then the man could be sent to the station with the other prisoners under guard. What was more easy than to send this soldier handcuffed, if necessary, in this manner to the station, there to be tried and punished for his offence? [Laughter.] It was surprising that hon. Gentlemen should scoff at this proposal, as if they alone had any knowledge of this subject. He had been in the position of having command of small bodies of men in the penal Colonies; and there never was the slightest difficulty in so managing the punishment of a soldier who misconducted himself, without flogging, although the punishment of flogging might then have been enforced. What was proposed to be done? The Secretary of State for War, contrary to his own opinion, had reduced the quantum of punishment proposed to be inflicted; but he stood out for the maintenance of the remaining 25 lashes, and these to be inflicted by the “cat-of-nine-tails.” But if he could offer the right hon. and gallant Gentleman one word of advice, it was to consent to the Amendment proposed, as one more step in the path of concession, and which would gain the good opinion of the people of the country. For it was a great mistake to think that the opinions held by many hon. Members opposite were shared by the country. This Parliament had not much longer to exist; he did not know they would decide this question; but he hoped, for the credit of the Parliament, it would be decided that this barbarism, so exceptionally degrading to our soldiers, should be abolished. But whether or not that should be the case, he was certain that in the Parliament to come—public opinion being aroused on the subject, and seeing the weakness of the arguments in its favour, and the concessions that were made to retain a fragment of the punishment as being necessary for the state of things now existing in South Africa, where alone we now had a war—people would be awakened to the truth, and see what it was that prevented respectable men entering the Army—what it was that impeded recruiting. What mother would allow her son to enter the Army while it was known, and maintained by hon. Gentlemen, that the lashing of a soldier with 25 lashes was absolutely indispensable to the maintenance of discipline? Was it thought such a system would bring men into the Army? Look at the change in the sister Service since the rules of discipline had been relaxed. There was a different class of men to those in the Service years ago; there was a better class in the Army than there was years ago; and if this remnant of degradation, now put upon the British soldier, were done away with, there would be in the Army a still better class of men—men who would conduct themselves in a manner that flogging would not be required. Let the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War be guided by good, by wise counsels, and take a course creditable to himself, and which he, in his heart, desired, as did many more on his side of the House—let him away with this fragment of the punishment, and announce to the world that the English Army was fit to be put on an equality with the Russian, at least, if not with the German, the French, and the Austrian Armies: let him announce once and for ever, in peace or in war, that corporal punishment had been abolished by the good-will of a Minister leading the House of Commons to that desirable end. In conclusion, he begged to move, in page 19, line 28, after “lashes,” to insert—

But corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on any soldier by an instrument known as the cat of nine tails, of which a sealed pattern is deposited at the Admiralty.”

Amendment proposed,

After the word “officer,” at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words “but corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on any soldier by an instrument known as the cat of nine tails, of which a sealed pattern is deposited at the Admiralty.”—(Mr. Otway.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY thought the hon. Gentleman could hardly have been present during the last discussion, or he would have then heard what he (Colonel Stanley) distinctly stated—

MR. OTWAY said, he had been present during the whole time.

COLONEL STANLEY then was sorry he should have thought it necessary to put his Amendment on the Paper. Because he had stated on more than one occasion, as distinctly as he could, that it was his intention to seal a pattern of the cat of nine tails—not that he himself thought it necessary to do so—but as the desire had been expressed, he said it was his intention to seal a pattern of the instrument as used at the present moment. He had been asked not to make it so severe as the present pattern—which he had not seen—at the Admiralty. To this he had replied that, without entering into minute definitions of how many thongs, &c., he would seal the existing pattern, leaving matters to stand as they were. He had said he believed it did not differ throughout the Service; but, if there was any doubt, he was willing that a pattern should be sealed, to prevent any deviation from it. That, he thought, was an answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman. ["No, no!"] But he thought it was. At least, he had given a distinct promise; and, while he held the office he did, he did not look to have that promise questioned. What he had said was, that the pattern used should be still used, and that it should be neither more nor less severe, and that was accepted as a fair statement by the Committee. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition went further, and said this was really not a matter for regulation by the House; it was a matter of detail unworthy of the House; it was a matter to be left to the administration of the Department; and, if the House could not trust the administration of the Department, then they had better get rid of them. With that view, thus pithily expressed, he (Colonel Stanley) entirely agreed. He adhered to what he had said on Tuesday—he was willing to seal the existing pattern, used in the British Army from time immemorial; he was not prepared to depart from it, one way or the other, to make it more or less severe. With regard to the larger question, which was debated at length on the Motion of the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown), he must really point to the position in which the Committee stood. On May 20 the question with the Bill first arose. On that day the Committee—and not, by any means, in an empty House—decided that corporal punishment should be inflicted. They affirmed that by a majority of 239 to 56, something like 4 to 1. No doubt there had been a great many speeches made since, and arguments used, some of more and some of less force. The other day he stated his own views, and why he did not consider it desirable to reduce the number of lashes below 50—he did not say that that number should always be inflicted; but he was advised that if that number were lowered it would be necessary, for purposes of discipline, to have recourse to the more severe alternatives of punishment enforced in foreign Armies. Notwithstanding this, there was a general appeal from various quarters of the House; and it was pointed out that, in the majority of cases, the whole punishment of 50 lashes was not inflicted. Twenty-five lashes was the usual sentence of courts martial. ["No!"] Yes; that was an argument used. Well, taking into consideration what he believed to be the general feeling of the Committee, weighing the matter carefully, not willing to take the responsibility of a step weakening the bonds of discipline, and, on the other hand, willing to defer to the feeling expressed in Parliament, under the statutory power of which the Army was regulated, he accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Horsham. There were many Members who spoke against the more severe punishment who were prepared, though reluctantly, to assent to the punishment of 25 lashes. But, unquestionably, if he had known this was to be made a mere stepping-stone to the attempt by a more inconvenient mode to reverse the decision to which the House had come by a majority of 4 to 1, it would have been his duty, at all hazards, to resist the Amendment, and insist upon the clause as it was. He must ask hon. Gentlemen to remember that, after all, the Bill was for the purposes of discipline; it was not for the purpose of regulating the conduct of good soldiers, but of those rough elements of the Army under circumstances requiring to be dealt with in somewhat of a rough manner. He might resort to arguments already used ad nauseam, in reply to those hon. Gentlemen who conscientiously advocated the abolition of the punishment altogether, to show that, as the Army now stood, such a course must lead to a large number of capital sentences. The responsibility of that he was not prepared to assume. For light offences which, under certain circumstances, might become more serious, to deprive a man of life, and possibly the State of a gallant and efficient soldier, was not a course he was prepared to take at the present time. Finally, after this matter had been discussed, under one form or another, for four days, he ventured to make one appeal to the Committee. This clause was considerably less hard against the soldier than the punishment existing under the present Act. He had always, year after year, thought the Mutiny Bill might be improved; and he had left not one hour unoccupied in thinking how to redeem his promise that the Bill should be improved. Now, was there any advantage to be gained for the soldier by those who made themselves his champions, by delaying the passage of this Bill, tending, as it did, to a more certain administration of justice, and more in accordance with the nature and degree of the offence? He would not have been justified in making these remarks, but for what had been said by the hon. Member for Rochester. This he might say—that already he had agreed to limitations proposed. He had thought, in any case, that non-commissioned officers should not be liable to the same punishment as privates. He had also agreed to place two Schedules on the Table, when the time arrived for their consideration, in connection with the 7th section, showing distinctly the offences for which the punishment should be inflicted by courts martial, or by the provost marshal, and also regulating the punishment on board ship. These would include the most serious offences—such as were specified in the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon). There would be also a limitation of the time during which the provost marshal could order punishment. If it was fenced about so securely with these safeguards that he could not agree to abrogate the power altogether. The reasons he had given were simply these—he was not willing to see corporal punishment inflicted wherever it could be avoided; but the maintenance of the discipline of the Army, a matter important to the honour and safety of the country whenever war was carried on, required, as he had said, the power should be retained. These were the reasons why he opposed the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, and he hoped now the Committee would proceed with the Bill.

MR. PARNELL wished to say a few words before a Division was taken. He would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to re-consider the determination he appeared to have arrived at. Frequently they had been told it was necessary to inflict this punishment, because no other punishment than that of death could be substituted; but, surely, in such offences necessitating the punishment of death it would be easy to find a sergeant, with a couple of rank-and-file, to keep the man in custody until he could be imprisoned and punished in a different way. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated that the House, on the 20th of May, sanctioned the principle of flogging, and, consequently, it could not now retrace its steps; but the House, in the same Division, also sanctioned the principle that flogging should be administered for every offence for which imprisonment might be the punishment. Now, on Tuesday, the Secretary of State for War assented to overturn that decision of May 20, by agreeing to the insertion of the Schedule to which he had referred. Having done so, the Secretary of State for War now sought to shelter himself under that concession from the necessity of taking any further step. He (Mr. Parnell) wished to make an explanation, which was, to some extent, personal to himself. When the Bill was taken into Committee he decided, for reasons of his own, to refrain from all interference, except on certain points on which he had at all times taken much interest. One of these points was the question of prison discipline, and another was this very question of flogging. In pursuance of that resolve, lest he should be tempted to enter into discussion, he remained away for a month during the progress of the Bill, until the question of corporal punishment came on. He felt very much pleased at the concession which the Secretary of State for War had made in reducing the punishment to 25 lashes; and he should feel that his own duty had been entirely discharged if they could now, as a result of this day's proceedings, secure the total abandonment of flogging. He should then wash his hands of the Bill, and refrain from any further connection with it during its progress through Committee. But he could not help seeing that if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman persisted in his defence to stand by flogging, it would be necessary to ask the Committee to hedge it round with a variety of provisions and limitations which did not exist in the Bill, in addition to the Schedules. It would also be necessary to ask the Committee to sanction the principle that certain classes of military men should be exempted from the punishment of flogging. He did not think the House was generally aware that Volunteers on service were by the Bill subject to that punishment. In case it was necessary to call them out, every Volunteer would be liable to a sentence of flogging passed by a court martial composed, not of his own officers, but of officers of the Militia and of the Regular Army, or by a provost marshal. These were very serious points which would have to be considered, and which would take considerable time. Undoubtedly, friction would be induced by the desire, on the one hand, of the Government to pass this important measure this Session; and by the desire, on the other hand, on the part of Members to see that these important questions had due consideration, and that due attention was attracted to them, and the real sense and opinion of the House obtained. Complaint had been made of the time which had been devoted to this question of flogging; but if it had not been so devoted, what would have been the result? If these discussions had not been prolonged by a very small minority from the 20th of May to the 20th of June, this clause would have been passed without the limitation as to the crimes for which flogging should be inflicted, which were agreed to amidst the plaudits of the House on Tuesday afternoon. It was because of the action of that small minority, and because the conscience of the House had been pricked, that that concession was made; and that small minority, having called public attention to the question, were amply justified by the result which had been already achieved. He entreated the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to extend the spirit of conciliation and the desire to make concessions, which he had already shown, to the total abolition of flogging in the Army; and to mark his government by a noble deed towards the soldier by agreeing in the strong opinion which had been manifested, in and out of the House, in favour of doing away for ever with that degrading punishment.

Mr. Parnell

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it appeared to him that the reply made by the Secretary of State for War to his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Chamberlain), who obtained this concession, was really of a very serious character; and although he (Sir Robert Peel) had not taken part in the discussion of this question, he felt bound to call attention to that reply. The threat which was held out to the Committee by the Secretary of State for War, when he intimated that if he had known the discussion would have been prolonged to the present date, he would not have sanctioned that concession on Tuesday, was not fair.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he rose to Order. He was not aware that he made use of any threat to the Committee. What he said was this—he accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) on Tuesday, as being practically the decision of the Committee; but if he had been aware that that would be made a stepping-stone—

THE CHAIRMAN said, he understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to rise to Order. In that case, he was entitled to priority; but, otherwise, the right hon. Baronet was in possession of the Committee.

SIR ROBERT PEEL regretted very much if he had misrepresented the Secretary of State, and, if so, he at once withdrew the expression; but, really, he hardly understood the full tenour and aim of the remarks which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had just addressed to the Committee. However, he understood the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Otway) to suggest that they had now arrived at a state of affairs when it would be necessary to move that the Chairman do report Progress. That was a question which had much concerned him (Sir Robert Peel) during the last few days. No one who had listened as he had to these debates for the last month could fail to perceive that there appeared to be a desire on the part of the House that this Bill should not pass. ["No!"] At all events, the Bill had been so modified by the determined and active opposition of hon. Members opposite that it became a very serious question whether, inasmuch as the Bill was admittedly ill-drafted, and had since been so mutilated, it would not be judicious to adopt the suggestion to report Progress. When he said the Bill did not meet the general approval of the House, he was also satisfied that out-of-doors it did not meet with that amount of confidence which it was important that a Bill of that character should receive. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) truly said yesterday, in a manner which must have impressed everyone in the House, that a Bill for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army, brought in at the close of this Parliament, which still maintained punishments of this extravagant character, must affect the character and influence the disposition of young men who might be desirous of entering the Army, and must also affect the willingness of their families to allow them to do so. It would be far better, in his (Sir Robert Peel's) judgment, that they should proceed to the Business which the country wanted to have passed, and which was now delayed. When the Secretary of State for War said he hoped now this Bill would make rapid progress, it should be noted that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down pointed out that there were still matters which would lead to the most serious discussion, and which would occupy a month, perhaps. And what was the state of affairs on the Paper? There were 180 clauses in the Bill, and, exclusive of 13 put down yesterday, there were no less than 196 Amendments, some of them extending over three pages of the Papers. Was it likely that the House of Commons, which was interested in the well-being of the Parliamentary Army of the country—an Army that cost the country some £16,000,000 a-year—was it likely that they should lightly allow the Government to pass a measure which deeply involved the real interests of those who served in the military ranks? Military Members had repeatedly asked questions in this sense. There was to be a Committee for the re-organization of the Army, on which only military men were to be appointed. Would it not be far better to allow the Committee to consist both of military men and of civilians; and, also, that the Committee should report upon the re-organization and regulation of the Army before Parliament embarked on a Bill of this kind—a Bill involving 180 clauses, and which was to be a substitute for the Mutiny Act? He did not like the substitution of this Bill for the admirable opportunities which they had of annually discussing the Mutiny Act; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them the reason why. He told them, at the beginning of the Session, that however much in a business-like manner they might discuss this Bill, one of the chief reasons of the Government for introducing it was in consequence of the factious opposition with which the passage of the Mutiny Act had been met. Now, he (Sir Robert Peel) thought it was very unfair to limit the opportunities of the House for the discussion of provisions affecting an Army which cost the country £16,000,000. He thought the Government had far better adopt the suggestion to report Progress, and take the Committee into their confidence, and proceed with Business which was really pressing, and to which hitherto only little strips of time had been allotted. During the last two or three years their time had been solely occupied with matters affecting foreign interests. There were now on the Paper 21 or 41 Government Bills, and as many others; and before another month all those would have to be set aside in favour of the discussion of a Bill upon which the House looked with a very askant eye. He urged the Government to listen to the opinions expressed both in and out of the House, and to proceed with Business of infinitely greater importance and infinitely greater interest.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Robert Peel.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT hoped the Committee would not adopt the suggestion which had been made. It was plain that the right hon. Baronet had not been a constant attendant at the discussion of this Bill, or he would hardly have given the description of it to which they had recently listened. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman told them that this was a very ill-drafted Bill. That was a matter of opinion,

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had heard the hon. and learned Gentleman say so himself.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT replied, that he was very much astonished at the statement, for it was entirely contrary to the opinion he had always held. He had always thought, considering the difficulty of the subject, that the measure was a marvel of drafting. He had always thought so and said so. What was more, he could prove it, even to the right hon. Gentleman himself. The Bill had been very minutely examined, and he did not think he ever recollected a Bill in the House of Commons which had been so little altered. The Amendments, until they reached the present clause, had been extremely slight, and of the objections raised hardly one had been sustained. If they were to examine the record of the House, they would see that there had been hardly any alterations in the first 43 clauses. Therefore, he entirely demurred to the statement of the right hon. Baronet that the Bill had been mutilated. At the last Sitting, it was true that, after considerable discussion, an Amendment was accepted by the Secretary of State for War; but he did not call that mutilation.

SIR ROBERT PEEL must correct the hon. and learned Member; what he said was that the Bill ran a risk of being mutilated.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought his ears must have deceived him. Apparently, his right hon. Friend and he reciprocally misheard one another. The right hon. Baronet seemed to have heard him say that the Bill was ill-drafted, which he never said; and he appeared to have heard the right hon. Baronet say that the Bill had been mutilated, which he never said. But, then, if the Bill had not been mutilated, he thought he might maintain there had never been a measure of such a character so little changed. They had disposed of the whole of the clauses as to crimes in the British Army—practically speaking, therefore, of almost the whole of the subject-matter which came under the consideration of the Committee last year; and that having been done, they were now told that this Bill was so ill-drafted, and was so likely in the future to be mutilated, that they ought not to go on with it. As practical men, he would ask the Committee whether they were going to throw away all the labour that they had expended upon this Bill up to this time? The right hon. Baronet, at the end of his remarks, suggested that they should go on with other pressing Business; but was not this pressing Business? How came this to be the first Bill pressed on by the Government? Because, at the instance of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) and others, the Ministry gave a pledge last year that before the Mutiny Bill was again brought in, an amending Army Bill should be introduced. Therefore, the most pressing Business with which they had to deal was this very Act, which they must pass this Session. If they did not, they would have the existing law in force, and under that law the 50 lashes would still remain. They would also have this discussion all over again on the Mutiny Bill, and a more unpractical course for a House which professed to be composed of men of business he could not conceive. To take the course recommended by the right hon. Baronet would be simply to stultify the Committee in its own eyes and in the eyes of the world. The Government were now under a pledge to the hon. Member for Meath that the Mutiny Bill should not be proceeded with without amendment. If they failed to pass the present measure, did they think this Government, or any other Government, would undertake such a course again? It would be most unwise to part from this Bill, for if they did they would part for many a long year from any hope of improvement. ["No, no?"] The hon. Member for Meath shook his head. Perhaps he might be the head of the Administration which would introduce the amending measure; but, at any rate, if this Bill failed, it would be a long time before the Government would touch the question again. Would it not, therefore, be far better for the House to introduce such Amendments into the proposed law as they could? He ventured to ask the attention of hon. Members below the Gangway especially to another reason. They had heard a good deal of late about the assertion of the Prerogative, and the decline of Parliamentary powers; but there never was a measure which more enlarged the authority of Parliament than this Bill. It incorporated into the Statute and brought under Parliamentary authority the whole of the Articles of War; and surely, for that reason alone, it ought to be received with eagerness, and supported with heartiness, by the whole of the Liberal Party. This was one reason why he thought this a most valuable Bill. If they rejected it, they re-instated the Articles of War in the position they occupied before. He always thought it an immense concession that those Articles were incorporated in this Bill; and yet if the measure were rejected now an enormous Constitutional advantage would be thrown away, which he did not expect they would ever get again. The right hon. Baronet had said that he had heard considerable objection made to this Bill; but from whom did the objection come? He knew that there were a great many persons connected with the Army who did not like the Bill for the reasons he had stated. There was a strong feeling in the minds of many military men against inserting the Articles of War in a Statute, and that was why there was a strong disposition in some quarters to reject it. Was not that also a reason which should tell with hon. Members on that side of the House? They now had an opportunity of settling this question, and they could do what they liked with it. They could pass all the clauses as to the Articles of War, for all the most important parts were incorporated in the Bill. Was it worth while to throw away all the labour which had been spent in perfecting this Bill? There had certainly been a good deal of discussion; but he had seen nothing like undue obstruction, although the measure had been examined very carefully upon this question of flogging. He had thought that the matter was settled at the last Sitting by agreement. What then happened? The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) urged that the crimes were too extensive which were to be punished by flogging, and that those crimes ought to be scheduled. He supported that contention, and the Government accepted the Amendment. That of itself was an immense concession; because he was quite certain, when they came to the Schedule, it would be the feeling of everybody in the House that the crimes which were inserted in it should be punished, as they were crimes of a very heinous nature. There were offences which it would be impossible to punish in any other way. The hon. Member for Meath said that an officer might be sent to the rear with two or three soldiers to guard the prisoner. But how could that be done, for instance, when on the march in South Africa? Unless they had this corporal punishment for heinous crimes, the result must certainly be to largely increase capital punishment. Next, what happened? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) proposed six lashes. The hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown) suggested 25; and he might be mistaken, but he understood the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to say that if the Government would accept the 25, that should be taken as a settlement of the question. Certainly, the hon. and learned Member for Stockport did withdraw his Amendment, in order to make room for the other Amendment, and that was accepted by the Government. That seemed to him to be a reasonable settlement of the question, and he thought the House so accepted it. He did not at all understand that they were to go on discussing whether there was to be any corporal punishment at all. Certainly, he did think that they might now come to a final decision upon this clause, and then they would have done with all the definitions of crimes and punishment; and the remaining parts of the Bill, though matters of importance, were certainly of less moment and of a far less contentious character than those which they had up to the present considered. He could not understand how it could be consistent with any decent common sense, after proceeding as far as they had done in a very satisfactory way, or, at all events, in a way with which Members were not dissatisfied, that they should throw away everything after all. The right hon. Baronet had talked of measures of more importance, but he knew of none which were of so much importance as this, which concerned the discipline of the British Army; and he knew of none more pressing than this, because it was absolutely necessary that they should pass it before the end of the Session. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would not accept the proposal.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. SHAW rose also to express a hope that the Committee would not agree to the proposal. After the time, the care, and attention which had been spent on discussing this Bill, if they took the course suggested by the right hon. Baronet, both sides of the House would look exceedingly foolish. It was very important to pass this Bill. The Government evidently felt it to be so; and, as far as he was concerned, he was inclined to help them through with it, provided fair opportunity were given for discussion. He had watched what took place with great care, and he quite agreed that nothing like obstruction had been offered to the Bill. There certainly was a deep dislike to flogging, not only in the House, but in the country; and hon. Gentlemen who sat near him were doing nothing but their simple duty in attempting to modify and, if possible, entirely to get rid of the corporal punishment of our soldiers. He said that, because there were rumours in the House that the Government intended to press this Bill through by means of something like physical force. It was said that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Judge Advocate General were to take command of the Ministry that night, and that re-inforcements were arranged to follow at various times. He did not believe that for a moment; and he did hope that nothing of that kind would be attempted. The Committee might be quite sure that that could only result in dissatisfaction. Although he had not spoken, he had voted against flogging, because he disliked it exceedingly, and believed in his heart it was one of the greatest injuries to the British Army. The way to make men brutes was to treat them as brutes. Certainly, no one could deny that flogging was a barbarizing punishment; on the other hand, if they abolished it, he believed they would do much to raise the character of the Army, and, for this reason, he would do everything in his power to get rid of it. No doubt, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was placed in an exceedingly difficult position. He tried to put himself in the right hon. Gentleman's place, and to ascertain by that means what he would do. He had listened to every lawyer who had spoken on this subject, and he would not, if he were the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, say a word to any one of them in reply. He had listened to every military man who had spoken, and he would treat all those in the same way. But he would, in spite of all of them, try the effect of abolishing this punishment for three years; and he would introduce a clause to that effect into the Bill, feeling quite certain that flogging afterwards would never again be allowed in the British Army. The troops, he believed, would not be worse, but better than they were at the present time. They would get a better class of men in the Army, and this would be made a real Profession, not a body of men drawn from the very lowest class. He did not know whether it was too late to suggest this alteration to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; but, certainly, if he could see his way to trying it, he would be perfectly safe in doing so. He was asked what could be done with men who were guilty of these abominable offences, as it was said they could not send them to the rear. But what did they do with them now? They made invalids of them, so that they were scarcely able to walk. If a man committed some beastly crime, he would not flog him, but he would put some brand upon him. [An hon. MEMBER: Shoot him.] No; he would not shoot him at once. While with the Army he would make him work by carrying baggage; he would put him amongst the bullocks. He would have the full value out of him whilst he had him; and then, when they got to some town, he would put some brand on him, and send him into the world with that brand upon his forehead. He did hope the Secretary of State for War would think of the possibility of trying the suggestion he had made of abolishing this punishment for three years.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Committee would not assent to the Motion of the right hon. Baronet; and, after the clear manner in which his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir William Harcourt) had stated the question, he did not think it was necessary for him to say anything as to that part of the argument. With regard, however, to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, he might say that he had never himself complained of obstruction, although he might have his own opinions about the discussion, and mentary authority the whole of the Articles of War; and surely, for that reason alone, it ought to be received with eagerness, and supported with heartiness, by the whole of the Liberal Party. This was one reason why he thought this a most valuable Bill. If they rejected it, they re-instated the Articles of War in the position they occupied before. He always thought it an immense concession that those Articles were incorporated in this Bill; and yet if the measure were rejected now an enormous Constitutional advantage would be thrown away, which he did not expect they would ever get again. The right hon. Baronet had said that he had heard considerable objection made to this Bill; but from whom did the objection come? He knew that there were a great many persons connected with the Army who did not like the Bill for the reasons he had stated. There was a strong feeling in the minds of many military men against inserting the Articles of War in a Statute, and that was why there was a strong disposition in some quarters to reject it. Was not that also a reason which should tell with hon. Members on that side of the House? They now had an opportunity of settling this question, and they could do what they liked with it. They could pass all the clauses as to the Articles of War, for all the most important parts were incorporated in the Bill. Was it worth while to throw away all the labour which had been spent in perfecting this Bill? There had certainly been a good deal of discussion; but he had seen nothing like undue obstruction, although the measure had been examined very carefully upon this question of flogging. He had thought that the matter was settled at the last Sitting by agreement. What then happened? The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) urged that the crimes were too extensive which were to be punished by flogging, and that those crimes ought to be scheduled. He supported that contention, and the Government accepted the Amendment. That of itself was an immense concession; because he was quite certain, when they came to the Schedule, it would be the feeling of everybody in the House that the crimes which were inserted in it should be punished, as they were crimes of a very heinous nature. There were offences which it would be impossible to punish in any other way. The hon. Member for Meath said that an officer might be sent to the rear with two or three soldiers to guard the prisoner. But how could that be done, for instance, when on the march in South Africa? Unless they had this corporal punishment for heinous crimes, the result must certainly be to largely increase capital punishment. Next, what happened? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) proposed six lashes. The hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown) suggested 25; and he might be mistaken, but he understood the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to say that if the Government would accept the 25, that should be taken as a settlement of the question. Certainly, the hon. and learned Member for Stockport did withdraw his Amendment, in order to make room for the other Amendment, and that was accepted by the Government. That seemed to him to be a reasonable settlement of the question, and he thought the House so accepted it. He did not at all understand that they were to go on discussing whether there was to be any corporal punishment at all. Certainly, he did think that they might now come to a final decision upon this clause, and then they would have done with all the definitions of crimes and punishment; and the remaining parts of the Bill, though matters of importance, were certainly of less moment and of a far less contentious character than those which they had up to the present considered. He could not understand how it could be consistent with any decent common sense, after proceeding as far as they had done in a very satisfactory way, or, at all events, in a way with which Members were not dissatisfied, that they should throw away everything after all. The right hon. Baronet had talked of measures of more importance, but he knew of none which were of so much importance as this, which concerned the discipline of the British Army; and he knew of none more pressing than this, because it was absolutely necessary that they should pass it before the end of the Session. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would not accept the proposal.

the Government only made reasonable concessions after four days discussion—in fact, they could get nothing from the Ministry except by what was commonly called obstruction; and, therefore, the Ministry had no right to complain if opposition were carried further than previously they had been accustomed to carry it. Well, he accepted with gratitude the concession of the Government; but, at the same time, he intended to continue and persist in his opposition to the practice of flogging. His hon. and learned Friend said they were doing very wrong not to utilize the opportunity given by this Bill, and that if they did not accept what was now offered it would be a good while before they would get another chance. His hon. and learned Friend was mistaken in that assertion. If the present Bill did not pass they would have an opportunity of amending the Mutiny Bill, not once, but every year; and he was quite certain, now that this matter of corporal punishment had once been raised, that it would never be dropped until the experiment of its abolition had been tried. If, then, this present Bill were abandoned, the Mutiny Bill would be opposed year after year by an annually increasing number of Members, backed by an enormous support outside the House; while, if they passed this present Bill, with its regulation for 25 lashes, they would be passing a permanent measure which they would have no opportunity of revising, except by promoting a Private Bill, which, as they all knew, had very little chance of being carried. Under these circumstances, he contended that he and his Friends were justified in offering the kind of opposition which had been already successful, until they had succeeded in dragging fresh concessions from the Government. He had hoped that some consideration would have been given to the suggestion just made by the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), to abolish the punishment for a limited time. He quite understood the feeling of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and he knew that he had a conscientious conviction that the discipline of the Army could not be maintained without the infliction of this punishment; but then the right hon. and gallant Gentleman must give him credit for having an equally conscientious conviction that the condition of the Army would be materially elevated if it were abolished—and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman need not let his convictions stand in the way of such an experiment as had been suggested. Let them try its abolition for a year; and if they then found that the bonds of discipline had become loose because they could not flog the soldiers, they could then come to the House and confess their failure. He would only add, on sitting down, that the friends of humanity and the friends of the British Army owed a great debt of gratitude to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) for standing up alone against this system of flogging, when he himself and other Members had not got the courage of their opinions. The hon. Member had opposed flogging in the Mutiny Bill, but unsuccessfully; he had opposed it unsuccessfully in the Prisons Bill; but now he raised it again, and he hoped that his efforts would be crowned with success.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT wished to say just a word in explanation, for he had been rather misunderstood. If the present Bill were passed, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), or any other Member, would not be debarred next year, or any other year, from raising again this question of flogging. In one sense this Bill might be called a permanent measure, but in another sense it was only an annual Bill; and it would be quite competent for any hon. Member, on the ordinary annual Bill, to move a provision that flogging should be abolished, or to move any other Amendment which he could move on the present Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE complained that for the last two or three years the Business of the House had been obstructed, and he appealed to the right hon. Baronet not to aid in any way the section of the House which had been so acting. The House ought not to give up in this way to a mere section of its Members, who were persisting in the very course which the Committee on Public Business had condemned.

MR. RYLANDS protested against the language of the hon. Member. The Committee had now before it a most important Act of Parliament disturbing Constitutional principles—[“No, no!”]—he said disturbing Constitutional principles, not overriding or overruling them. The Bill disturbed the Constitutional principle that every year the House should have before it a Mutiny Bill, defining from year to year the regulations and discipline of the Army and the control of the Crown. They were now asked to give up that power of control to a very great extent. No doubt, what the hon. and learned Member had stated was exactly true, that some Amendments might be proposed in the Continuation Bill; but it could only be done with great difficulty, according to the Forms of the House, by getting instructions given to the Committee which would enable them to propose some Amendment. But did the hon. and learned Member for a moment believe that any independent Member of that House would have the slightest chance of making any such proposal? Hon. Members must know perfectly well that if they passed this Bill they passed it in a form which would be permanent for many years to come, and that they would have nothing like the opportunity they had hitherto annually enjoyed of dealing with these important matters. Yet, when they were thus dealing with important principles, they were lectured by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire as though they had been guilty of obstruction. He knew what was intended. The object of the hon. Member was to fasten upon the Opposition the charge of obstruction; but what had been already accomplished would show the public that the Opposition were fully justified in the course that they had taken.

Mr. Chamberlain

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that such observations as had just been made by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) came too late, and were altogether out of place at the present moment. The hon. Gentleman raised a question, not with regard to the particular clause now before the Committee, but a question as to whether it was or was not right to proceed with a Bill which would place the military law and the system of Army discipline and regulation upon the footing which it would be placed by the passing of an Act which was to be in one sense permanent, but which would require an annual Act to set it in motion every year. That was, no doubt, an important question; but it was one which the House had already decided. It was not a question of what the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), or his right hon. Friend behind him (Sir Robert Peel), or anybody else, might think upon the matter, because that question had been decided by the House by passing the second reading of the Bill, and by agreeing to go into Committee. There would still remain, in the ordinary course of things, an opportunity to hon. Gentlemen, if they thought it right, again to challenge the principle of the Bill. It was, however, absolutely impossible that any Bill of any kind or sort could be conducted through that House if they were, in the course of the Committee, from time to time to take opportunities of re-opening and challenging the whole principle of the measure. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down said that an attempt had been made to fasten upon him and others a charge of obstruction. Nobody would fasten a charge of obstruction upon any Gentlemen who did not first fasten it upon themselves. There was no objection, and none could be made, to any fair discussion of the principles of each clause as they came to it, or of any Amendment which anyone thought right to propose. There had been a long discussion upon this very important clause, which was still in the hands of the Committee; and the Government desired nothing better than that the Committee should go on and finish the clause, with which it had already made so much progress. They had shown, in the course they had taken, that they were not indisposed to listen carefully and candidly to the arguments brought forward; but the Committee had now come to a point at which it was necessary, and at which it was the duty of the Government, to say distinctly—"We cannot accept any of the suggestions thrown out or proposals made by hon. Gentlemen in the course of this discussion." Hon. Members were within their right in proposing them, and they might take the sense of the Committee upon them. He did protest, however, against their allowing themselves to fall into a practice which would be utterly fatal to the progress of any Business which had to be conducted through the House. The House decided the principle of a Bill when it agreed to go into Committee, and if it was necessary to challenge that principle again, there was a further opportunity of doing it. He did earnestly hope that after this conversation, which might not have been without some use, now that the right hon. Gentleman had asked to withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress, the Committee would, in the interests of all parties, and not least, he thought, in the interests of the House itself, allow the Motion to be withdrawn, and proceed with the consideration of the Bill as it stood before them. No time could be better than the present for going on with that important discussion. The House was thoroughly alive to the points at issue. Hon. Members desired to express their opinions upon it; and he did earnestly impress on the Committee that that would be the sensible and Constitutional course to pursue.

MR. SHERIDAN said, there seemed to be some misconception as to what took place on Tuesday. He suggested to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman on that occasion that an excellent opportunity was afforded for a compromise, by reducing the number of lashes from 50 to 25. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not avail himself of the proposition as he submitted it to him; though, subsequently, when the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) had also expressed himself to that effect, he said that he had been convinced, by what had fallen from his Friends and the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), that the time had come when he could safely make the proposed reduction. Under these circumstances, he thought it was justifiable, after hon. Gentlemen heard this, to consider they were not bound by the proposal for a compromise. He had hoped that a correct view of all the circumstances would induce his hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) to come to the same conclusion. He thought, however, that he himself was bound by the compromise which he offered; and, therefore, he should withdraw when a Division was taken on that point, because he considered himself bound by the suggestion he had made.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER wished to suggest that, instead of losing time in the discussion upon the number of lashes that should be given, or the number of tails to the lash, some hon. Member should propose a distinct Amendment that the punishment should be totally abolished, and let a Division be taken, and let that settlement be final. ["No, no!"] Well, if the decision of an Assembly like that were not to be taken as final, it would be impossible to transact Business.

MR. CALLAN was sorry that the Committee had not disproved the charge made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), instead of by silence giving it a qualified acceptance. He wished, also, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would assure the Committee that the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was correct—namely, that next year they would have the same power of discussing the Mutiny Bill as they now possessed. Such an assurance would greatly facilitate the discussion, and would induce him, for one, not to take the part he otherwise should in opposing this Bill. He must remind the Committee, however, that in the year 1874, on the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, it was ruled by the Chairman that they had no power to introduce any Amendments into the Coercion Act.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. and learned Member for Oxford contradicted himself; for while he told them in one breath if this Bill dropped and the old Mutiny Bill passed they would be unable to restrict the number of lashes, he told them almost immediately afterwards that they would be able every year to direct attention to this question of flogging, and to restrict the number of lashes in the discussion on the annual renewal of the Prisons Act.

MR. OTWAY wished to explain to the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Peel) that he did not move to report Progress, but merely suggested it, in order that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War might consult his military advisers as to whether this fragment of the punishment of flogging was worth preserving. He wished, also, to utter one word of warning; and to ask his hon. Friends, from his own experience, to mistrust counsels that came from the front Bench on each side of the House, especially on questions of this kind. When he first brought this question before the House, the spirit in which he was received by Mr. Disraeli and the late General Peel did them the greatest credit and honour, and was a marked contrast with the reception it met from right hon. Gentlemen on his own side, he being then in the Opposition. He was not surprised at the support the hon. and learned Member for Oxford gave this Bill; for, if he was correctly informed, although he was not then in Parliament, no one was more strenuous than his hon. and learned Friend, when Chairman of the Committee, in preventing this question of corporal punishment from being discussed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT begged pardon—the question was never raised on that Committee.

MR. OTWAY replied, that, of course, he must have been misinformed; but he received his information on authority which was more than abundant. But he wanted to show his hon. and learned Friend how far he had allowed his partiality to exceed his logic. He pressed them to accept a Bill which was such a marvel of drafting as to be almost perfection, and then had next to state that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had made important concessions in a Bill which, they were told, had been well and carefully considered. In this Bill, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in charge had made most important concessions in one of its most important clauses. What he wished to point out was that it was important for them who were earnest in this matter, and were determined to remove from the British Army this disgraceful thing, not to listen to, or be bound by, what were called compromises or agreements. He listened with the greatest regret to the proposition made yesterday by the hon. Member behind him (Mr. J. Brown), not because his motives were not most excellent, but because he desired only to modify a barbarous punishment. He (Mr. Otway) knew that some hon. Gentlemen would immediately endeavour to fix upon them the statement that a large section of the Liberal Party had accepted that compromise as a fit and suitable termination of the discussion. But he would tell the Committee that the Liberal Party in the country would never accept a compromise on this question; and the prospect which his hon. and learned Friend had held out to the Committee, and the constant repetition of these discussions, made it well worth the while of the Committee to consider whether such a thing would be desirable or not. He had seen no obstruction at present on this question. The right hon. and Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley), who was the best judge of the matter, had declared that the opposition offered had been fit and proper, and that he was not one to carry opposition beyond that which he considered fair and right. But up to a certain point, and at every legitimate opportunity, they would force on the notice of the House and the country the consideration of this question. He would, therefore, in the most sincere desire to see this useful measure carried through, advise the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to avoid a discussion which must evidently partake more or less of a Party spirit, and make up his mind to settle this question once and for all.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he rose merely for the purpose of answering the question which had been put by the hon. Member for Dundalk, whether the Government would endorse what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford as to the right of any hon. Gentleman every year to raise this question? What had been stated by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford was true; an opportunity would be afforded every year of raising the question. He regretted very much what had fallen from his hon. Friend (Mr. Otway) on the subject. He appealed to the common sense of the Committee whether anything new had been said on the matter; and he defied anyone to say whether the question had not been pressed on the attention of the House and the country. He trusted that, as common-sense people, they would now take a Division.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think the House would do well to proceed now with the consideration of the Bill in Committee. The question actually before us at the present moment is one raised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth—whether it is desirable that further progress with the Bill should be altogether suspended? I am very far from saying that circumstances may not arise in the course of the consideration of a Bill in Committee which may make it necessary for the House to be invited to take a general view of the situation, and to decide whether the Bill, at the stage which it has reached, ought to be proceeded with or not; but I venture to say that nothing has taken place in the course of this Committee which would warrant the House taking such a view of the situation. My hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) has shown conclusively that no material alteration in the form, scope, or shape of the Bill has been made; and it would be altogether a new and most unfortunate doctrine to lay down that an Amendment—even an important Amendment—of a clause was a reason why a Bill should be dropped. Some reference has been made to a supposed promise given on Tuesday; and I think it is to be regretted that on that subject the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) has not stated what his understanding was. I am not prepared to say that my recollection is accurate of what took place; but I understood that my hon. and learned Friend made a very conciliatory speech, which I thought was of the nature of a proposal for a compromise. I find I have misunderstood the situation, and that a great many Members have no idea there was any compromise at all. I do not intend to trouble the Committee at any further length. The Government have freely expressed their willingness to discuss the clauses of the Bill, and I do not think they can be expected to do more. And I am sure the Committee will be inclined to pay attention to any hon. Members. I acknowledge the importance of the subject, and the good faith with which it has been brought forward; but the importance of any subject must be, in a certain degree, relative, and very few subjects, indeed, are so important that they ought to be allowed to engross the attention of the House to the exclusion of all other questions. I am sure that if hon. Members will endeavour to discuss the subject within reasonable limits, they will find there is no imputation of obstruction; and I hope I shall not appeal in vain when I ask those on this side of the House to restrict their observations to reasonable limits. In that way we shall arrive at the end, which, I am sure, we all have in view—namely, the carrying into effect of a reasonable, mild, and salutary system of punishment.

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. HOPWOOD said, he regretted very much if he had misled his noble Friend in any way with regard to the opposition of Tuesday. But he did not understand it at all in the way that had been stated. He was in the recollection of the Committee as to what took place. The question then was his Motion that the number of lashes should be restricted to six. The hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown) proposed 25; and he, conceiving that if he gave up six and 25 were carried it would be a great gain to the cause, adopted it. He asked his hon. Friends who were acting with him to allow him to withdraw his Amendment, explaining that it bound them to nothing. He also stated that he should go on with his other Amendments, one of which was to make the limit 50 stripes. The Committee would remember, also, that immediately after the 25 lashes were accepted he moved an Amendment as to the number of thongs; and how could he have done that if he had agreed to any compromise? And now he begged to ask the Ministry to remember that this question of flogging was the main difficulty in the way of the Bill. Let them remember, also, that this was a moribund Parliament; that this flogging was regarded with hate and dislike in the country; and that they must soon face the judgment of the electors. He only heard a day or two ago of a friend of his who had to meet a constituency as a candidate, and because he had voted against flogging he lost the seat. They had already fought on this question; but it was not too late for Ministers to repent, even if their repentance did come a little tardily. The Home Secretary stated that nothing new was to be said on the question. That was the case 40 or 50 years ago. It was also the case when they first began to fight this question a month ago. Yet they had succeeded in securing, by their persistence, this wholesome reduction of 50 per cent in the number of lashes. Let them, then, continue to fight, and they must succeed in wiping this law from the Statute Book. It was utterly subversive of humanity; and the feeling in the country against it fully justified the opposition of himself and his Friends.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he understood that the hon. and learned Member for Stockport said he would not withdraw unless the Government accepted the compromise proposed; and when that had been agreed to, he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment. He, for one, was very instrumental in getting that accepted on that side of the House; and he believed that the general belief on both sides was that it was withdrawn on that ground.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped they would not allow themselves to be carried on from one discussion to another, and that they would not enter into what he might term this co-collateral question. They really did not want discussed what took place on Tuesday. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated what he understood was done; and he would now earnestly press the Committee to allow this matter to be treated in the ordinary business way. His right hon. Friend wished to withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress; and, if that were done, they might go on with this Bill, otherwise he was afraid they would never come to a decision at all.

MR. CALLAN thought the conduct of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport had been altogether upright and above-board, and, in his opinion, it was very creditable to him. His Amendment was not withdrawn on any understanding for a compromise, nor had he misled anybody by acting as he had done.

MR. BIGGAR, in reply to the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer) said, that he, for one, could not at all accept the advice that he had just given. That advice was that they should take one Division upon the question whether there should be corporal punishment or not? That would not settle the question at all, for there was an endless number of degrees of corporal punishment. The Home Secretary had said that there was nothing new to be urged on the subject; but that was a very great mistake, for there was an enormous deal to be said on all branches of it. He had not the slightest doubt, if the opponents of the Bill would persevere, that they would finally get rid of this enactment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, with reference to the assertion of the Home Secretary that nothing new could be said on this subject, he thought he could bring as to this precise passage of the clause they were now discussing some evidence taken from a source not very commonly known to the Members of the House. It might be in the recollection of some hon. Members of the Committee that, in the year 1837, a Committee of that House was appointed to consider the whole question of the treatment of convicts in our Australian Colonies. They went most fully into all the details of that subject, and they contributed a most remarkable series of observations with regard to the effect of flogging on the physique of the convicts. He doubted very much whether the whole literature of the world contained so minute, so complete, or so horrifying an analysis of the operation of this practice on the physique of the men. In page after page, and column after column, were the most minute statements of the number of lashes inflicted, the effect upon each man, who bore it well, who suffered much; how many lashes nearly destroyed one man, and how many another could easily bear. At that time, under our convict system, it was in the power of magistrates in penal settlements to order the corporal punishment of convicts for very small offences. On the mere complaint of a master or a mistress, the magistrate might order up to 50 lashes for the smallest disobedience of orders. Originally, this subject had undergone much inquiry, and the Committee went into the matter very fully. The settlers raised as one objection to the system that it was not severe enough; and they said that the cat was not really so severe and so tormenting as the cat used in the Army. One witness gave it as his very distinct and practical opinion that the amount of "torture" was not enough in all cases to deter convicts from breaking the bounds of order. He said, also, that he had seen the punishment of flogging in the Army, and that there it was much more severe and much more torturing. In these pages they had the description of how boys of 10 bore the punishment, and men of 60, and men of 30, and of what the effects were. One result of this evidence was to show that no one could give a certain opinion beforehand as to how any particular man would bear the flogging with a cat-o'-nine-tails. The Committee were told that with a cat of another construction it would be very possible to gauge the amount of suffering; but that for some reason, which he himself was unable to explain, the cat-o'-nine-tails was most capricious in its punishments. Surgeons, doctors, officials of all kinds were called as witnesses, and they all told the same story—that men from whom they would not have expected any great powers of endurance sometimes bore their lashing, and, apparently, did not suffer very much; while other men, who seemed strong, yet from their skins being thin and their muscles weak, were utterly broken down by a smaller amount of punishment. There was a case of a very strong man who broke down at the 25th lash, and then the remainder of the punishment was inflicted while he was in a state of positive insensibility. Other men came up with every desire to show pluck, and yet were taken away insensible. It was stated by many witnesses that they had known cases where men had gone off none the worse for their punishment, and apparently not caring about it; while in other cases they were certain the men who were punished would carry to their graves—and to graves made early by this means—the effects of the torture they had received. All this proved one thing, at all events—the utter uncertainty of the punishment. It was as capricious as it was cruel. They could not count on how it would affect a man, or what prolonged suffering it might cause him, or how it might even shorten his life. At the present time, they might have a man punished by court martial for some grave and serious offence, and they might have another man punished by the provost marshal for some trifling breach of order; and the result might be that whilst the first man would bear his punishment easily and think nothing of it, the other man, punished for a mere trifling breach of discipline, would carry away a suffering which would last him all his life, and might lead him to an untimely grave. Merely, then, on the ground that this punishment was capricious and uncertain, he did strongly urge the Government to try and see their way to meet the strong conscientious feeling among many Members present in favour of abolishing this practice altogether. If they would not do that, he could only offer to them a cry at the Elections, which were now tolerably near. They knew that the Government was charged with making very serious Constitutional changes in the system of the country; and, giving them a free rendering of a certain very famous phrase, let the Government go to the country with the cry of “Our old cat and our new Constitution!”

MR. MACDONALD wished to offer his protest against the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) coming forward as the chief apologist of this Bill—in fact, it seemed as if he held a brief from the Government to plead their case. He told them it had not undergone any change, when, as a fact, merely on the suggestion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), they had shattered 40 clauses of it completely. The reduction of the number from 50 to 25 was also an entire change in the character of the Bill. They had been asked, during the course of that debate, to point out defects by speaking as to the effect of the punishment upon those persons who had been subjected to it. He had heard those who had been subjected to it state once, twice, dozens of times—and that remark he was induced to make because of a statement that fell from the Secretary of State for War, that if they had not that punishment, they must inflict the penalty of death—he had heard those who had undergone that barbarous punishment state again and again, 30 years after the punishment had been inflicted, 10 years after it had been inflicted, 20 years after it had been inflicted—that they would 20 times sooner have gone to the yard-arm than submit to such a punishment. If hon. Gentlemen did not know what going to the yard-arm meant, he would tell them that it meant being hung. Those men would far rather have been hung than suffer the degradation of being flogged. He protested against it, because it was the maintenance of a class over a class. It was the maintenance of a power over those on whom the country depended that was perilous to the State—namely, its soldiers and sailors; and he ventured to say that no class in connection with the defenders of their country should be permitted to mutilate and destroy the bodies of those who were fighting the battles of the country.

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

MR. RYLANDS said, he was sorry the Secretary of State for War did not happen to be present, though he was sure the Committee could not complain of him upon that ground. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman's attention to the Bill had been most marked. Now, he wished to point out that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had seemed to complain of the wording of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway), because he had said that if his hon. Friend had been present in the House on a former occasion he would not have put down an Amendment of that kind. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that he had given the Committee an assurance that the cat which was to be used for military punishment should be a cat to be sealed at the War Office, in order to prevent any abuse of the proper instruments of punishment; and he also went on to say that he would take care to make no changes, but would use for the Army a cat of the same description as that which had been in use from time immemorial. Upon that statement he wished to make an observation or two. In the first place, it would be seen that the Amendment of his hon. Friend was to the effect that corporal punishment should not be inflicted on any soldier by the instrument known as the cat-o'-nine-tails, a sealed pattern of which was deposited at the Admiralty. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not say what instrument was to be used. It might possibly be the case that he intended that the cat-o'-nine-tails used for the purpose of the Army should not be of the same description as that of which there was a sealed pattern at the Admiralty. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would say so, that of course, to some extent, would meet the Amendment of his hon. Friend. He must say, however, that he had heard with regret the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that the cat he intended to adopt in the Army was of the description which had been used from time immemorial, because he knew that in years gone by the instrument used was of a character which endangered human life. He had been trying to refresh his memory as to the date of a celebrated inquest which was held upon a soldier; but he had no doubt that hon. Members would remember the date. He alluded to what was known as the Hounslow case, in which a soldier under the infliction of that cat—the very cat which was intended by the Secretary of State for War to be the sealed pattern which was to be handed down to future generations for future punishments—died, and a Coroner's inquest was held upon him, which Coroner's Jury decided that the man had been murdered by the infliction of flogging. That question was brought before the House of Commons at the time, and created a great sensation. What he wished to point out to the Committee was this. He fancied he had been a little misunderstood by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—he was sure quite unintentionally—who seemed to think that he was anxious to raise a question which would more properly have been raised on the second reading of the Bill. He meant with regard to the substitution of a permanent measure of Army discipline and regulation in place of the annual Mutiny Bill. He did not wish to raise the question of the propriety of that course. That was not his argument at all. His argument went to this extent—that, inasmuch as they were now crystallizing, as it were, the military law by a permanent measure, they were justified in giving a more minute attention to the framing of that Act, and occupying more time in its consideration than they would have been justified in doing in the case of an annual Bill. He saw the right hon. and gallant Gentleman returning to his place, and he dared say that he would answer this question—Whether the cat which it was proposed to seal and deposit at the War Office, as he presumed, was exactly the same as the pattern deposited at the Admiralty; or whether he had in contemplation any alteration or modification of the cat-o'-nine-tails which had been in use in the Army for many years past, and in some cases had had in its application very dangerous and injurious effects?

MR. OTWAY said, he really could not conceive why the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not accept his Amendment. It was of the simplest possible character, unless the right hon. and gallant Gentleman entirely misapprehended it. He had understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to say that he was prepared to use an instrument of torture of a different character, and not so severe as that which was used under the auspices of the Admiralty. Therefore, why would not the right hon. and gallant Gentleman accept an Amendment so innocent as his, which simply said that if torture was to be inflicted upon the soldier it should not be by such an instrument as that at the Admiralty.

COLONEL STANLEY considered that if he were to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, the Committee would be in a worse position than they were before. It was a negative Amendment. What he had said was this—that there would be no difference between the various cats-o'-nine-tails used in the Army, and, in order to prevent any possible difference, he would cause a pattern to be sealed, which should be taken from the existing pattern as he found it in the Army. That seemed to him to be perfectly fair. He had never heard, as a matter of hearsay, that it was more or less severe than in the Admiralty. He believed it was neither one nor the other. He considered that he was fit to undertake the responsibility of seeing that what was right was properly carried out.

MR. PARNELL said, that now they had the three right hon. Gentlemen there—the Home Secretary, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Secretary of State for War—it would be extremely interesting to know what they knew about those cats, for he rather ventured to think that they did not know anything at all about them. They were told that there was a sealed pattern at the Admiralty, and another at the Home Office for flogging thieves; that at the Admiralty being for use on board Her Majesty's ships. Now they were told that they were to have a third sealed pattern for the Army; but if neither of the right hon. Gentlemen knew anything of the nature of the patterns they had adopted, what guarantee would there be to the House that the Secretary of State for War would not also adopt a pattern of which he knew nothing? Now, let him direct the attention of the Committee, for one moment, to the history of that question, and to the reason which induced the Admiralty to adopt a sealed pattern of the cat. In a former discussion on the Marine Mutiny Bill, it was asked by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) that a pattern should be adopted and laid on the Table of the House. The First Lord of the Admiralty—not the present First Lord, but one of his Predecessors—refused that, but offered to have a sealed pattern deposited at the Admiralty. He was induced to do that, because the noble Lord the Member for Clare County (Lord Francis Conyngham) had pointed out that during his service at sea there were two distinct patterns of cat used on board ship—one of them being a thieves' cat, and the other, which was lighter and of a less severe description, was used for other descriptions of offences. But the noble Lord said that he had frequently seen the thieves' cat used for such offences as breaches of discipline; and he had told how, upon a particular occasion, he had seen the boatswain's mate draw his fingers through the strings of the cat in order to remove the flesh which had been cut from the man's back. It was this that induced the then First Lord of the Admiralty—and he was relating this story for the benefit of the present First Lord—to say that he would seal a pattern at the Admiralty. But he wanted to know how this matter had progressed; and he thought they were entitled to learn, at that stage of the discussion, how much the right hon. Gentleman knew of the cat—how many knots there were in it?—because some cats had two knots, and some five or six. He wished to be informed what description of cat it was that had been sealed? Members of the House could not go and see those things for themselves. They could not go inside prisons—they could only glean from report; and they had always heard that the prison flogging was of a very severe character. But if flogging in the Army was to be made as severe as in the prisons, they would find that they had retrograded very considerably, and that the reduction of the number of lashes from 50 to 25 would be of no practical benefit to the men. He could not see why the cat should not be altogether abolished. He thought they were entitled to know the views of the Secretary of State for War upon that matter, as he had never yet expressed them. They had been told, by a variety of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's supporters, that because the punishment was of a degrading character they had retained it. Now, they could disgrace a soldier just as much by flogging him with a rod as with a cat-o'-nine-tails; and he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War what his view was with regard to the punishment? Was its object solely that of disgrace; or was it on account of the torture it inflicted? If he desired to retain it merely on account of the disgrace, he could inflict just as much disgrace by means of a birch rod; and they were right in asking, as was asked by the Amendment, that they should know something about it. He recollected a story that made a great impression upon his mind about flogging. It was in connection with the old Irish Rebellion of 1798, and it happened close to the place of his birth. The method of flogging which was then in vogue was that recommended by the hon. and gallant General the Member for Brighton (General Shute) — namely, tying the sufferer to a cart's tail, drawing him along, and flogging him all the time. A man in that case was tied to the cart's tail, and was flogged with a cat while walking over a space of ground that he knew well, and that was from three to four miles in length. He was flogged until his entrails hung out; and when the poor sufferer perceived he was being cut to pieces in such a way, he called out to the colonel of the regiment, though he was not a soldier, but a poor peasant. He well recollected the name of that colonel. "Colonel Leo," called out the man — "Do you allow your men to flog my guts out?" Well, that man's entrails dropped out on to the road, and he died at the tail of the cart. If he had been flogged with a rod, he could not have been injured in such a manner. They were going to use an instrument by which they might kill a man, or, at least, do him serious injury; and he thought they ought to have the views of the Secretary of State for War upon the subject.

MR. ANDERSON said, it occurred to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had misapprehended the drift of the Amendment. He had taken it up as if it were a sort of allegation that he intended to break the promise he had made to the Committee about sealing the pattern. The Amendment had no such meaning as that. Perhaps the Amendment would be a little clearer if it contained no allusion to a sealed pattern. According to his reading, it simply opened up the whole question of abolishing the "cat" entirely. If the sealed pattern was to remain, there was no objection to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman having one at the War Office, and the closer it was sealed up the better. Perhaps it would make an ancient monument. He had not taken any part in the debate for the last four days; but that was not because he did not feel strongly upon the subject. He had voted, and would continue to do so, in all the divisions which were against the brutal punishment of flogging. He must say that if they wanted to make men brutes, they had only to give them brutal punishment. If they wanted to elevate them, they should abandon punishments of a brutal nature. He believed that nothing would do more to raise the status of their Army than to let them know that there was to be no flogging in future. The Government did not allow officers to be flogged, and they had now exempted non-commissioned officers; and he would ask them just to go a step further, and exempt the men also. It was from that class that they drew their non-commissioned officers; and they could not expect to get self-respecting men to enter the Army if this degradation was to be held over them. If he understood aright, even the Volunteers, if called upon for active service, would immediately come under the Ordinance of War, and be liable to that punishment. He entirely agreed with those who had determined to do all they possibly could, and never to rest until that punishment was put an end to. He had been told that if they neglected that opportunity, they would have the same opportunity afforded them in future years. But that was like what they were told when it was proposed to change a Sessional Order into a Standing Order. They could change a Standing Order; but it cost much more time and trouble than a Sessional Order, and it would be just the same with that Bill. It was especially difficult to alter a permanent Bill; and that was the reason that they ought to do all they could now to induce the Government, having left in the Bill such a wretched rag of this punishment, to do away with it altogether.

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he rose with the intention of moving an Amendment to the Amendment, with the assent of the Mover, which he thought would, perhaps, carry out his views. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman appeared not to have quite understood the scope of the Amendment. He did not know whether he was representing the hon. Member for Rochester correctly in saying that he wished the instrument called the "cat" to be abolished altogether in Her Majesty's Army; and that in order to describe what he meant, he added the qualifying words—"of which a sealed pattern is deposited at the Admiralty." Now, it appeared to him that if they were to leave out those words, then they would know what they were going to divide about. The intention, then, would clearly be to abolish that instrument which was kept for the punishment only of English soldiers, sailors, and malefactors. It appeared to him that those three categories should not be linked together, even by a similarity of punishment. His attention had been called to the question of flogging in the Army long before he had the honour of a seat in the House; and, at the election at which he was returned, the subject was brought up. His opponent was said to have opposed the abolition of corporal punishment in the Army; and it was, perhaps, owing as much to the fact that he had opposed the proposition of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway), when, greatly to his honour, the hon. Member moved that this punishment should not be inflicted in a time of peace, as to any other act he had performed in his Parliamentary life, that he owed the opposition he received. He (Mr. H. Samuelson) constantly heard, in the course of his canvass, and on every platform on which he appeared during the election, that his constituents had a deep-rooted feeling against a punishment which they considered degrading to humanity, and only fit to be awarded to woman-beaters and persons who committed abominable crimes that it was impossible to describe. It was regarded as a disgrace to the legislation of the country that our brave soldiers, who were always spoken of as our gallant defenders, should be awarded this punishment in common with such desperadoes; and the continued existence of flogging in the Army was looked upon as a circumstance which no Englishman could think of without feeling shame. He objected altogether to the use of the cat-o'-nine tails, believing that it was quite possible to inflict adequate punishment by some instrument, at any rate, less degrading; and for this reason, he would move, as an Amendment, that the words "of which a sealed pattern is deposited at the Admiralty" be left out.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "of which a sealed pattern is deposited at the Admiralty."—(Mr. Henry Samuelson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. OTWAY said, he had no objection at all to the Amendment. The hon. Member had correctly described the reasons which had induced him to put down the words "a sealed pattern should be deposited," and he was very glad that the hon. Member had raised the question.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY remarked that, though, according to the Home Secretary, it was impossible to bring forward a new argument he, at any rate, could give his contribution to the debate, by bringing forward a new speaker. He had hitherto taken no part in the discussion of the Bill, although he had sat listening to it with great interest. Nor did he intend to detain the Committee at any length. Indeed, there was one fact which, standing alone, offered matter which was incapable of an answer. The very fact that we were the one nation which resorted to this punishment ought to carry with it the condemnation of the practice. Only the other day, the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) came forward, very ably and very rightly, to defend the status of our soldiers, and to deprecate the manner in which a man was treated who wore the Queen's uniform, in regard to the social relations of life, many persons regarding it as an emblem of social inferiority. He could not help thinking of the retort which might have been made to the hon. and gallant Member, who, with the same breath, was arguing in favour of the retention of flogging, on the ground that there was more than the average of bad characters in the British Army. He certainly failed to understand how the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire's advocacy of the lash could forward his demand that the wearers of Her Majesty's uniform should be placed on a footing of equality with the rest of the community. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) denied that the British soldier was at present on a footing of equality with the rest of the community, although he ought to be, and we ought not to keep him in a degrading position. To one who, like himself, desired to form an impartial opinion on this question of flogging, it was striking to note that every one of the arguments he had heard were used when the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway) brought forward his Motion, some ten years ago, to get rid of the use of the "cat" in time of peace. Many hon. and gallant Members at that time had asserted, both in public and private, that the British soldier could not be managed at all if they got rid of flogging; but they had done very well without it at home, and he saw no reason why it should not be abolished in a time of war as well as in a time of peace, as it inevitably would be before they were 10 years older. He believed that before many years passed by they would look back with astonishment at the fact that such a degrading punishment could ever have been resorted to, or that it should have been considered necessary, in a civilized country, to retain this relic of barbarism.

Mr. Anderson

MR. M'LAREN said, he had been a silent listener to the debate since the Bill was first introduced; and, therefore, he could not be charged with having wasted the time of the House. He did not intend now to detain the Committee for more than a few minutes with what he should feel it necessary to say. He detested flogging in every shape and way, and would take every means in his power of extinguishing such a barbarous punishment. It appeared to him that there was a far better cure for keeping soldiers in good order, and that was to get better men than they got now, and the way to get better men was to increase their pay. If they gave the men 6*d.* a-day more, and allowed them to marry in greater numbers than they were now able to do, they would get excellent men to serve them, and men who would not need the lash. He thought that was the real way of improving the Service, and he recommended it to the notice and consideration of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. A shilling a-day to the soldier was the ordinary wages of labourers and mechanics at the time it was first fixed; but now the case was very different.

MR. O'DONNELL said, they often heard of the frightful state of the soldier even among his own countrymen; and Motions had been made in that House for the interference of Parliament to prevent the stripes on a red coat from being regarded as a badge of inferiority whenever a soldier appeared in church, or at a meeting, or in a music hall, or in any public place. He wondered whether it ever occurred to gallant officers, who appeared to be so bent on the retention of flogging, that there was a singular inconsistency on their part when they professed to feel sore at the contempt with which some persons regarded the position of a soldier and the uniform of a private, while they themselves were doing all in their power to perpetuate the very worst degradation it was possible to inflict upon any man—he would not say soldier, or even slave. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) had, he was certain, truly expressed an opinion which was widely prevalent in this country—namely, that this flogging confined to the lower ranks of the Army—this use of the lash—was a horrible survival of the old theories of caste, which had divided the country into the class which was flogged and the class which flogged. In the British Army the officer who rose from the ranks very seldom obtained anything like that position among officers who had not risen from the ranks which he obtained in the French Army. It could not be but natural that this prejudice among officers who entered the Army from the classes which were not subjected to flogging should exist towards a man who, no matter what his merits were, while carrying a firelock, belonged to that class which could be stripped and tied up to a triangle, and have three or four dozen stripes laid upon his back before all the soldiers of the regiment. One of the earliest recollections of his own life, when a child, was having seen the soldiers drawn up in the barrack-yard for the infliction of punishment upon a comrade. He had seen a man fastened to a black triangle, and had heard the lashes as they were inflicted, and from that day he had never faltered in his resolution to use all his efforts to bring about the total abolition of this horrible and degrading punishment. No doubt, they were beginning a totally new era in the discipline of the Army. Whether it was from the merits or demerits of the Irish Members who chose to criticize the annual Mutiny Bill, the Government had now brought in a permanent Mutiny Bill; and he asked the Committee if they ought not to seize the opportunity of definitely breaking away from the worst traditions of the past? In this country there were men bearing about with them the marks of the lashes they had received. These men exercised a powerful influence among their countrymen when they told their story. Even in cases where they had really deserved the lash—even in such cases, the listener who heard of a man tied up to the triangle and receiving 50 or 100 lashes lost all sympathy with the object for which such a punishment was awarded; their feelings were excited by the horrible nature of the punishment, and they forgot, or disdained to inquire into, the nature of the crime. There was hardly any crime that could be committed, except the very worst, that was deserving of the horrible degradation of inflicting on a grown man the infamy of the lash. If the lash must be still reserved for some brutal offences, let them change the old nomenclature. Let them get rid of the horrible cat-o'-nine-tails, with all its horrible traditions. At any rate, let them abolish the words "lash" and "cat-o'-nine-tails," and administer the flogging with a rod, or a whip, or something that would enable them to break off from all the old traditions. If ever, in any exceptional case, a man was to be so degraded that he was to be lashed by any instrument, from the instant the lash descended upon his shoulders he should cease to be a member of the Army. It was possible that some such excuse might be found, as that a man would court the lash, in order to be free from the Army; but he thought the Army would be well free from any man who would court the lash for such a purpose. They ought to have regard to the fact that they had now to fall back upon a class which furnished deserters to a large extent, because the lash deterred many respectable men from entering the Army. He thought the economical advantages would be decidedly great, even if one or two incorrigible scoundrels preferred two dozen on their bare back as a ready means of escaping an honourable Service. If flogging were abolished, the prominent part the Irish Members had been wont to take in the matter would no longer be required of them. He felt—and the English and Scotch Members also felt—that no more popular speech could be uttered in that House than a speech against the horrors of the lash. If he could believe the Ministerial papers, nobody ought to be condemned more than an incorrigible Home Ruler, like himself; and yet he was every morning receiving thanks for the part he was taking in opposing the lash. He warned Her Majesty's Government to beware, lest their zeal for flogging did not flog them out of Office at the next General Election. It would be a most effective cry at an Election that the present Government had insisted on maintaining the lash for the English soldier. The people were becoming more educated from day to day; the Board and other schools were raising up educated classes among the masses of the nation from day to day; and these people felt, with the pride of intelligence, the infamy to all their order and to all their class—the insult to humanity itself, which consisted in the perpetuation of the brutal and degrading lash.

MR. HOPWOOD thought there was a word or two which might be said with a business-like eye to this Amendment. There were objections, as he dared say right hon. and gallant Gentlemen now saw, to the cat-o'-nine-tails. Assuming it to be a foregone conclusion, although it was one to which he would not submit until he was obliged to do so, that they were to have corporal punishment, he contended that the cat-o'-nine-tails was not a thing to be tolerated. Among all things applied to discipline by history, he did not think there was any authentic record to be found of the cat-o'-nine-tails. It was said that whipping was first adopted in the Middle Ages, so far the Army of England was concerned. When the cat-o'-nine-tails first sprang into existence was a matter of conjecture. It was said to be about the middle of the last century. They knew something of the history of other nations. Scourging was familiar to the Romans. He did not think there were ever stronger men in the world, in a muscular point of view, than the trained drummer or farrier-sergeants of the Foot and Cavalry; and he did not think that the ancient scourging with rods produced the effect which could be produced by a well administered blow, with all the might and muscle of the drummer, delivered on the bare back of a man. It was not on the bare back alone, but it cut and curled round the breast; and sometimes, with hellish torture, when a right-handed man was tired out, a left-handed man was substituted, so as to inflict cross-cuts around a man's back. It appeared to him that the three right hon. Gentlemen representing Prisons, Army, and Navy, were to be appointed to act as semi-executioners, in order to see that the tools were in order; that they were furnished with proper minuteness; that the instruments of torture were of the requisite strength of handle and size of cord, and so on. Right hon. Gentlemen would have to undertake that duty if they were to say what the sealed pattern was to be; because it would be their duty to see that all these things were done. Scourging was the punishment anciently employed. There was, too, another nation from whom they derived great traditions, and to whom they were indebted for much that they believed—the Jews. They practised stripes, but not a stripe that made nine inflictions at a time. A remarkable expression of one who sprang from that nation, and the great Apostle they revered so much, was—"Of the Jews five times received I 40 stripes save one." And why "40 save one?" Because, from scrupulosity in the performance of the law among that nation, they took care not to administer the full amount, which was 40. We had no such scruples, but were dancing with delight because Her Majesty's Government only gave us 225 instead of 450 lashes—25 lashes with the cat-o-nine-tails, instead of 50. This was the way in which the soldier was to be treated. He would just add one more matter of experience. There was a friend of his who was the governor of a gaol, and a man of very strongly-pronounced humanity, of which he had given many proofs. This gentleman told him, in regard to this business of flogging—and he did not altogether go with him (Mr. Hopwood) as to its entire abolition—this gentleman said—"If you want to produce a smart, it may be done as well by a birch rod as it can be by the 'cat.'" He (Mr. Hopwood) did not know whether the gentleman he referred to acted in opposition to the rules and regulations; but he declined to use the "cat." He had almost entirely dispensed with it, even in the case of the ferocious men brought under his charge in the gaol, and the rod had been substituted. He would suggest to the Government that the rod would be quite sufficient; and if anyone doubted that the punishment inflicted by such a weapon in the hands of a drummer would make him feel, let him try the experiment, and he would soon see if it was not enough. At any rate, they would part with a weapon that was likely to do fatal injury, and a barbarous indignity, which was a disgrace to our nationality and to the Army which was supplied with it.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. BIGGAR said, that at the risk of being charged with saying something he had said before, he would take the liberty of saying a few words with regard to the Motion now before the Committee. A great deal had been said against the use of the cat; but he was not aware that anything had been said in favour of it. The present system of punishment in the Army was of a most brutal description. All hon. Members who had given their views upon the subject were unanimous in that opinion; and one-half of the Government, and even the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), had not said a single word in favour of this system of punishment. He put it to the Committee whether a system of punishment which would not be tolerated towards the lower animals should be tolerated towards the Army? Torture directed against an animal—a donkey, a horse, or a cow—in the manner proposed for the British Army, would not for a moment be sanctioned. If anyone tried it, the result would be that he would be at once hauled before the magistrates, and sent to prison without the option of a fine. Even if he punished a horse in a much more modified degree, he would be brought up before the magistrates, and sent to gaol; and, probably, the magistrates would order him to be flogged in gaol for the offence. In all probability, a man of such a brutal nature would be very likely to commit some breach of prison discipline, and he would then find himself dealt with in a manner in which he was not allowed to treat one of the lower animals outside the prison walls. For these reasons, he thought the Committee ought to refuse to allow the present system of flogging the British soldier to continue any longer, and should at once agree to the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it appeared to him very extraordinary that hon. Gentlemen opposite should insist on dwelling on this painful subject. He should like, however, to know what hon. Members thought if the discipline of the French Army were enforced in ours, and every person was shot who was liable to corporal punishment. ["Oh!"] Then, what did hon. Members want? What did they propose? War was not child's play. Soldiers would leave the regiment, and commit the grossest outrages—robbery, rape, and murder. Was it those who committed these offences that hon. Members desired to save from the lash? ["No!"] Well; but was it not the fact? A court martial did not flog any soldier who remained with his regiment. Hon. Members opposite had accused soldiers of every vice. ["Hear, hear!"] "Hear, hear!" and yet these were the men who enlisted their particular sympathies. He could not hear a murmur against that observation. They were the worst criminals who were engaging the sympathies of hon. Members opposite. He did not like flogging any better than they did; but he put it as a matter of economy. A well-trained soldier cost £110. He could not go low enough to reach the depth of sympathy which had been expressed on the other side. When a man's blood was up, he very frequently did things that he would not otherwise commit. But were all crimes committed in the heat of blood to be punished by death? He considered it imperative that there should be some short and sharp punishment for outrageous crimes committed in the field, and the view he held was that it was better to flog than to shoot. He believed that the opponents of flogging would rather shoot than flog.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had addressed so extraordinary an argument to the Committee that he felt bound to answer it. The fallacy that ran through the argument of the hon. Member was that if flogging was abolished they would have to shoot men; not only, as he said, men who were now flogged, but many more than were at present flogged. As to that, there could be no question whatever that the hon. Member was entirely wrong. He could understand that military authorities might say that if flogging were abolished there might be a certain number of cases which were at the present punished by flogging for which the alternative of shooting would have to be employed. He did not deny that something might be said for that view; but the hon. Member seemed to think that in every case for which flogging was now the punishment they would have to shoot. But the hon. Member had not indicated clearly whether he was referring to flogging which took place under the court martial clause, or the flogging which was conducted by the provost marshal. There were many men who were flogged by the provost marshal, whom it could not be contended would be shot if flogging were abolished. The hon. Member had said, with regard to the French Army, that a far greater number of men were shot in that Army than was the case with us. He had, however, laid no figures before the Committee to enable it to deal with the matter. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had seen a great deal of the French Army; he had followed them for three or four months, and he was inclined entirely to dispute the assertion that they shot more men than we did. During the Crimean War discipline was somewhat lax; but during the war in Italy not a single man was shot; and he thought the allegation which had been made altogether fell to the ground. At the time of the Crimean War the French Army had got into a very bad state, and discipline was very poor. That state of things called for very sharp and powerful measures; but he entirely disputed that since that time there had been a much larger number shot in the French Army than had taken place in our own. The French Army was an example to us in the matter of flogging; for not only did no flogging take place now, but it had been altogether abolished since the Great Revolution. It was not the case, as in other countries, that flogging had only been abolished in France for the last 10 or 12 years; but it had been unknown since the Revolution. When the Great Napoleon was asked to re-introduce flogging he declined altogether, as much for military as for political and social reasons. So strongly was Napoleon opposed to flogging that he even declined to hear any discussion with regard to the re-introduction of the punishment in the French Army in the future. In the course of his remarks the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had used two or three words—such as rape, robbery, and murder—as if flogging was only inflicted for those crimes, or for crimes equally serious. Perhaps he was not aware that it was proposed to flog a man for the most trivial offences, such as being drunk. When on board ship, or in the Colonies in a time of war, although at a good distance from the field and under circumstances which, in time of peace, would be entirely passed over, men were to be flogged for offences which were very trivial, and were only grave because, technically, it was time of war. Flogging was to be inflicted not only for rape, robbery, and murder, but for the most trivial offences—in fact, soldiers were to be punished by a penalty which was only inflicted in aggravated cases, or upon the worst criminals of the country. On that side of the House they had a better opinion of soldiers than to think that they required to be treated like the worst criminals. No doubt, there might be criminals in the ranks of the Army, but they were but few; and there was no reason to suppose that this punishment was necessary to restrain those few. The hon. Member had said that he would put it as a matter of policy that, as each soldier cost the country £110, it would be better to flog than to shoot a man. He trusted the Committee would look at the matter in a much more practical way than that. Suggestions which had come from that side of the House had been of a strictly practical character. He was not averse himself to sentiment being brought in; but, still, flogging had been looked upon by hon. Members on that side of the House in a most practical way—they said that the punishment of flogging must necessarily degrade a man and make him a worse soldier. Moreover, they contended that the prevalence of flogging in the Army would become known by the newspapers and prevent the best class of men enlisting, which they would have been disposed to do had this punishment not been inflicted.

Mr. O'DONNELL observed, that, no doubt, the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea would confirm him, when he said that the custom in France was to have disciplinary battalions consisting of disgraced soldiers and those under punishment. All the bad characters were thus put together and kept under severe discipline in the punishment battalion. The country got good service out of those battalions, and the whole of the Army was not disgraced and degraded by the use of the lash. If necessary, the same system might be introduced into the British Army. He thought it would be very much better to have that or any other system, rather than to retain the barbarous and degrading punishment of flogging.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON wished to point out to the Committee that, under the Interpretation Clause of the Act, by which soldiers employed in the occupation of a foreign country were defined to be on active service, the clause in question would apply to the soldiers now serving in the Island of Cyprus. The hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway) had obtained for the British Army the remission of the penalty of flogging in time of peace; but the policy of the Government had placed them in such an anomalous position that the most curious results followed. They were now occupying the Island of Cyprus, which was not English territory, for the Sultan had Sovereign rights over it; it was not an English Colony; it could, in fact, be described as nothing but a foreign country occupied by our troops. He would like to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War whether, in time of peace, soldiers serving in the Island of Cyprus would be liable to the extremely penal clause of this Act? They were holding the country in military occupation; the troops there, therefore, were probably, technically, on active service. That they were occupying Cyprus as a foreign country was clear, for Cyprus was not English territory, and would have to be surrendered back in view of certain contingencies. In his opinion, some provision ought to be made for those troops serving in that country, and also with regard to troops who might be called upon to serve, under similar circumstances, in other parts of the world. It was not right that the fact that the soldiers were technically on active service abroad, though in time of peace, should make them, and them only, liable to this exceptional punishment of flogging.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he must point out to the hon. Member that it did not appear to him that the question he had raised, as to the effect of peace and war upon the position of soldiers, was in Order. Perhaps his observations would be in Order if the clause itself were under consideration; but the Question now before the Committee was as to the use of a particular punishment. His observations appeared to him to have more relation to that clause of the Bill which provided for the use of the punishment only in time of war.

MR. H. SAMUELSON bowed to the decision of the Chair. He would ask, however, whether, as this was the clause of the Bill which dealt with punishments, he was at liberty to discuss the clause generally, or only the sub-section with which they were now dealing? He wanted to know how far soldiers were liable to the punishments they were discussing. The information they might receive upon that matter would probably have a considerable influence upon the votes of hon. Members on this particular question.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it appeared to him that the proper time for the remarks which the hon. Gentleman was making was upon the discussion of the clause which dealt with the infliction of the punishment in time of war, and not in time of peace. He would not be in Order in making the remarks he did in relation to the punishment only, without reference to whether it was inflicted in time of peace or war.

MR. H. SAMUELSON inquired, whether he might draw attention to the next sub-section, which, it would be seen, stated the conditions under which corporal punishment would be inflicted?

Mr. H. Samuelson

MR. OTWAY said, that it was impossible to conceive that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War did not know whether the soldiers in Cyprus were liable to be flogged or not. Perhaps the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would answer the question with regard to that point, which had been put to him in order that they might be better able to go to a Division. He should like to know whether the soldiers in Cyprus were in any exceptional position? He thought it would save much time if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would state the position of the soldiers in Cyprus.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked, that the point made by the hon. Member would be in Order on the sub-section.

Question put, and negatived.

Question put,

“That the words ‘but corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on any soldier by an instrument known as the cat of nine tails,’ be there inserted.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 72: Majority 23.—(Div. List, No. 124.)

MR. PARNELL said, he had to move an Amendment to insert after the word “lashes,” at the end of the last Amendment the words—

“And in every case when more than twelve lashes are inflicted the soldier so punished shall be discharged with ignominy from Her Majesty’s service.”

He hoped that this Amendment would be agreed to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War; for it appeared to him that where a soldier had been degraded by this punishment he ought not to be allowed to wear Her Majesty’s uniform. He did not think that, under any circumstances, a soldier that had been flogged should be considered fit to wear Her Majesty’s uniform.

Amendment proposed,

After the word “officer,” at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words “and in every case when more than twelve lashes are inflicted the soldier so punished shall be discharged with ignominy from Her Majesty’s service.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY did not think it was necessary to take up the time of the Committee by discussing this Amendment. The whole spirit of what he had said on former occasions was opposed to the insertion of such an Amendment as this. He had stated that he considered that this punishment should be short and summary; but it should be subject to the man's continuance in the Service. It was not at all consistent with the infliction of such a punishment as 12 lashes that a man should be dismissed with ignominy from Her Majesty's Service. Nor was it right that dismissal, with ignominy, should invariably be added to the punishment of flogging. He hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the position in which the Government had placed themselves was utterly illogical. The Government had consented to limit the punishment of flogging to certain infamous crimes. The contention was that where a man had been guilty of an infamous crime it was much better to turn him out of the Army altogether. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary could corroborate this view—that there was nothing more conducive to the spread of crime than the continuance of the criminal classes amongst those altogether innocent. There was no more effectual way for increasing crime in the Army than by retaining the bad characters in it, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War proposed to do. When men of the criminal class were retained in the Army their example endangered their comrades; and he was surprised that the Government should decline to embrace the opportunity of getting rid of such men altogether. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had spoken of certain crimes of violence which he considered deserving of flogging. Was it likely that it would increase the respectability, or the efficiency, of the Army that persons who had deserved to receive flogging for such crimes should be turned back into the ranks, and wear the uniform alongside honourable men? It appeared to him that every step taken in connection with this institution of flogging endangered the character of the men. By the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Meath, it was proposed that a sentence of flogging should be equivalent to expulsion from the Service; and he thought that where a man deserved the sentence of flogging he must, also, well deserve the punishment of being expelled from the Army. He did not think that the efficiency of the Army, or, indeed, of any Army, whether civilized or uncivilized, was increased by detaining in its ranks a few score, or hundred, of disreputable characters who deserved to receive flogging for infamous crimes.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had admitted that there were some great crimes for which a man might certainly deserve to be flogged; but there might also be crimes for which flogging was a fit punishment, but which, nevertheless, might not be so infamous as to deserve a sentence of dismissal from the Army with ignominy.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN did not think that the question that had been raised by the Amendment had been treated by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with the consideration that it deserved. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to think that there was no principle in this Amendment; but it appeared to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was still in favour of flogging for trivial offences. He might say that that was not an opinion entertained by hon. Members on that side of the House; and they wished distinctly to know whether it was the intention of the Government to flog only for the worst offences, or for all kinds of trivial offences? If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said that there were many offences for which a man ought to be flogged, but for which he would not wish to see him dismissed with ignominy, then he thought that was not a correct view. He would say again, and he would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to say distinctly before they voted on this subject, whether it was his idea that they were going to flog in the British Army for trivial offences—for offences so trivial that they did not come within the definition of disgraceful offences which would render a man unfit to remain one of Her Majesty's soldiers? If that were the intention of the Government, he could only say that his opposition of the Bill, in its present form, would be intensified. He had understood that the crimes for which flogging was to be administered were such as involved danger to the security of an Army in the field, or were the most disgraceful that a soldier could commit, or were such offences as would be disgraceful either in a soldier or civilian. If flogging was to be administered for such crimes as that only, then every man flogged ought to be dismissed from the British Army, if it were wished to keep up the character of the British Army. He thought they were entitled to ask whether they had deceived themselves as to the reality of the concession made by the Secretary of State?

MR. BIGGAR said, that it might seem, at first sight, to be an injustice to dismiss a man from the Service with ignominy simply because he had been flogged. But if a man were flogged, and received upwards of 12 lashes, he would become worthless, in a military point of view, and would have to be sent to the hospital. The Army would be better without than with a man who had been severely flogged. He looked at the British Army, however, from a different point of view, and considered the value of a British soldier at more than so much sterling. A man who had been submitted to the degrading punishment of flogging, and who had received over 12 lashes, would not only use every effort to be revenged himself, but would encourage his comrades to do the same. He thought it would be well to pass this Amendment. He might say, in passing, that the great bulk of Irish Members were entirely opposed to flogging, and had voted against it. He thought that the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer) was the only Irish Member that voted for flogging in the last Division.

MR. SULLIVAN concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) in the condemnation the hon. Member had pronounced with respect to the conduct of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford in voting in favour of the lash being retained. He could not help thinking that an angry feeling would be aroused in the County of Wexford, which knew something of flogging, when it was known what part the hon. and learned Baronet had taken on this question. They had been nearly two days debating the question whether the use of the lash was to be retained, and the Government had at last taken refuge in this—that if the lash was to be retained, it was only to be inflicted for grave offences. The Government said that it was only to be inflicted for crimes so heinous that otherwise the man must be shot. And the alternative had been presented to the Committee of whether it was better to shoot or to flog the men? But if a man was of a character so vile that he would be shot for the crime he had committed, then he thought that such a man should not be retained in the ranks after he had been flogged. If a man was so brutal that flogging had to be inflicted upon him, then he thought that such a man was of no use in the Army. What they desired was to preserve the status of the British soldier, and if he were worthy of stripes he ought not to be permitted to wear the uniform; but if his offence was not very serious, he did not deserve to be flogged. The ground now taken up by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was that an offence might be so trivial that flogging would be sufficient punishment for it, and such men did not deserve to be discharged. The principle for which they would go into the Lobby was that flogging should only be inflicted for very detestable and heinous crimes; and that if a man were flogged for these crimes he ought not to be retained in the Army.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER expressed his surprise that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down should have thought fit to attack him for a vote which he had honestly given in the discharge of his duty as a Member of Parliament. He could tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that his constituents knew him too well not to be aware that he never gave a vote in that House which was not given from a conscientious conviction that he was doing what was right. That any Member of the House, then, should rise in his place and make an attack upon him for the way in which he happened to have voted on a particular occasion was a mode of proceeding, in his opinion, so un-Parliamentary that he could not too strongly protest against it. If hon. Members generally were to indulge in such a practice, and to make similar attacks upon one another, there would be an end of that liberty which every hon.

Mr. Chamberlain

Member ought to have of recording his vote as he deemed to be right. For his own part, knowing that he had been actuated by purely conscientious motives in voting as he did, he could afford to treat the attack of the hon. and learned Gentleman with contempt. He was sorry he could not more emphatically express the opinion which he entertained of the hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks, without using words which would not probably be regarded by the Committee as Parliamentary. The hon. and learned Gentleman, he would add, and those who supported his view, seemed to labour under an entire misapprehension as to the nature of military law. They assumed that no offence should be punished under that law by the infliction of the lash which was not of an infamous nature; and that when that punishment was inflicted it was inflicted for the commission of either an infamous or a trivial crime. They were, however, entirely wrong upon that point. In the case, for instance, in which a private soldier was guilty of striking his officer, that was an offence which in all the Armies of the world was punishable with death. A French soldier who happened to strike his officer would be punished in that way, though it was, of course, possible that, under extenuating circumstances, there might be some mitigation of the punishment. But, under ordinary circumstances, the man who had so offended would be put to death, and very properly so; because if soldiers were allowed to strike their officers without being adequately punished, there would be an end to all discipline, and an Army would soon become a mob. Again, let him take the case of a soldier who was appointed to do outpost duty, and to act as a vidette. The safety of a whole Army might depend on the watchfulness of that man. If he did not keep awake and discharge his duty, as he ought, the Army might be surprised, and the lives of thousands of men might be sacrificed through his fault. Now, such a neglect of duty could scarcely be characterized as an infamous crime; but it was one which was rightly punished with death, because it was an offence against the very essence of military discipline, and of the precautions which were necessary to secure safety. As to the offence of marauding in time of war, it was one which was not, of course, so disgraceful as stealing in time of peace; but, nevertheless, it was an offence for which a number of soldiers had been tried, when under the command of the Duke of Wellington, and shot. Those were not trivial offences; but neither could they be said to come under the head. So that it was ridiculous to contend, as hon. Gentlemen who supported the Amendment did, that all offences punishable by the lash must come under either one or the other of those two heads; and that if a man were once flogged he ought, as a matter of course, to be dismissed from the Army; for it was clear that if he only received one lash, he would be as much disgraced as if he got 12. No one, he might add, regretted more than he did that it should be necessary to have recourse to the punishment of flogging; and it was a punishment which, in his opinion, ought to be inflicted as rarely as possible. Hon. Members must, however, be very well aware that there were bad characters in our Army, as there were in every Army, who could be kept in order only by the fear of corporal punishment, which they dreaded more than any other mode of punishment short of death. Without the power of being able to inflict corporal punishment, it would, he believed, be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to manage an Army in the field, and to keep the troops under proper control. No doubt, flogging was a degrading punishment; but so were all punishments. Penal servitude was degrading. It was degrading to a man to have his hair cut off, to be put into a convict's dress, and to be obliged to pick oakum. But there was another thing which was more degrading still, and that was the commission of the crimes for which such punishments were inflicted; and if a man was guilty of some degrading offence, he could not fairly complain of being subjected to a degrading punishment. That was an observation which applied to all those offences which were of a degrading character. With regard to purely military offences which were not of that character, he would say that flogging was justifiable in such cases only where it was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of discipline and the preservation of the Army. But so long as soldiers were not to be controlled except by the fear of corporal punishment, the power of inflicting it ought, in his opinion, to be retained for degrading offences, or offences against military discipline of a vital character. He had only to say, in conclusion, that he was not to be deterred from giving what might by some be regarded as an unpopular vote, in the discharge of his duty as a Member of that House, by any attacks which might be made upon him by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, or those who supported his views.

MAJOR NOLAN thought his Friends near him were hardly fairly open to the reproach that they did not know what they were talking about. The fact was that those who supported the Amendment did know what they were talking about much better than the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer) seemed to suppose. On the very last occasion on which the Bill was discussed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) suggested that those offences for which the punishment of flogging might be inflicted should be set forth in one of the Schedules. Up to the present moment, however, that had not been done, and hon. Members were in ignorance of what those offences were; unless, indeed, an exception was to be made in the case of the Judge Advocate General. If flogging were to be resorted to in future only for the punishment of acts which were of an infamous nature, then, probably, his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would not think it necessary to press his Amendment to a Division; while, if a soldier were subjected to the lash, as was the case in South Africa the other day, for merely bathing in the river, it would be a great pity, he thought, that he should have to undergo the further punishment of being discharged with ignominy from Her Majesty's Service. Entertaining those views, he did not feel himself to be in a position to express a decided opinion on the point under discussion by his vote until he had seen the Schedule of offences, which ought, he thought, to be laid on the Table of the House at the earliest possible moment. As matters stood, he should be obliged, if his hon. Friend the Member for Meath went to a Division, to leave the House without recording his vote either for or against the Amendment.

Sir George Bowyer

Mr. C. S. PARKER thought it would tend very much to the convenience of the Committee if the Amendment were withdrawn; for it was very undesirable, in his opinion, that they should be asked to deal with a proposal of the kind on the spur of the moment, and without having been afforded an opportunity of seeing it on the Notice Paper. He also wished to point out to the hon. Member for Meath that there was some inconsistency between the Amendment which he now proposed and one which he had submitted to the consideration of the Committee in the course of the discussions on the Bill last week. On the occasion to which he was referring, the hon. Gentleman took a Division on an Amendment to the effect that it should not be even within the discretion of the military authorities to expel a man with ignominy from the Army for any offence for which corporal punishment might have been inflicted. Now, however, the hon. Gentleman asked the Committee to support an Amendment which provided that in every case in which more than 12 lashes were inflicted, the Secretary of State should have no option but to discharge a soldier with ignominy from the Army. The two Amendments were inconsistent; and it would be better, he thought, to withdraw that before the Committee, or, at all events, to postpone it until the Schedule, which had been referred to, had been laid on the Table.

Mr. DALRYMPLE expressed his entire concurrence in the observations which had been made by his hon. Friend who had just sat down. The Amendment was one which, in his opinion, was by no means of a reasonable character; and, therefore, he hoped it would be withdrawn. He had risen, however, chiefly for the purpose of protesting against some remarks which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), who, from that lofty stand-point which he was so much in the habit of taking up, had not hesitated to insinuate that hon. Members who sat on the Ministerial side of the House did not invariably vote in accordance with their conscientious convictions. He, for one, begged to repel that insinuation in the strongest possible terms; and to say that when he recorded his vote in favour of any measure which was brought forward by the Government, he did so because he believed it to be deserving of support. He must also express his surprise that the hon. Gentleman who, he believed, was the accepted Leader of the Home Rule Party in that House (Mr. Shaw), should have made, in the early part of the evening, the singular suggestion that a soldier who happened to have committed a disgraceful offence should be branded on the forehead, and should thus carry the mark of his crime with him to the grave.

MR. SHAW admitted that he had said something about branding; but wished to explain that what he meant was that a soldier who happened to have committed any of those disgraceful offences for which the punishment of flogging was to be inflicted should be morally branded on the forehead by being discharged from the Army with ignominy. He hoped, he might add, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be prepared to state that he would take the question of the abolition of the lash altogether into his serious consideration. If he would give the Committee that assurance, he would suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath that he should withdraw his Amendment, at all events, for the present. But he looked upon the Amendment as a very important one, and one which, if carried, would be productive of the greatest advantage to the Army; because, as had been observed by his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), in the course of the discussion that evening, he believed it to be the very worst economy to keep bad men in the Service, and that the very best thing which could be done with those who were guilty of a disgraceful offence was to turn them adrift, or else to place them in such a position that they could do no harm for the future. He hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would consider whether it would not be well to adopt more freely the practice of dismissing soldiers with ignominy after they had been subjected to a certain punishment. He wished to add that he thought it highly desirable that hon. Members who took part in the debates in that House should take care to refrain, as far as possible, from imputing motives to those from whom they happened to differ. He was quite sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite gave their votes with discrimination; and that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) never intended to charge the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer) with having voted dishonestly. There were, at the same time, he was afraid, a great many votes given in that House of which the constituents of those who gave them did not always approve. He trusted they would proceed with the discussion of the Bill in peace, and that there would be nothing like war between hon. Members on either side of the House. If war were inevitable, he hoped he and his hon. Friends around him would be prepared for it; but, for the present, he would advise his hon. Friend the Member for Meath to withdraw his Amendment, if he obtained from the Secretary of State for War the assurance to which he had referred.

MR. MACDONALD regarded the Amendment as a proposal to which it was very proper to ask the Committee to assent. He thought it furnished a very proper answer to what had been more than once said, with regard to the action of his hon. Friends near him below the Gangway, by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. He and his hon. Friends had been told that evening that their object was to patronize the blackguards of the Army, who were undeserving of any less disgraceful punishment than flogging. In supporting the Amendment before the Committee, however, they showed that they had no sympathy with men who were capable of committing offences for which they were liable to have their backs made red and raw. For his own part, he found himself exactly in the same position as the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), for he was entirely ignorant of what the offences were which were to be included in the Schedule. It might include the most trivial offences; and, if so, the discussions on the Bill would have been carried on, to a large extent, in vain. But if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath were agreed to, it would, he thought, be found to be a most salutary provision to have in an Act of Parliament. As matters now stood, when a soldier had disgraced himself so far as to have the punishment of flogging inflicted upon him, he was turned into an hospital and was supplied with medicine. At one moment we cut him, and the next tried to cure him. We all but destroyed him to-day, and sought to build him up to-morrow, in order to make him of the full value of the £10 per annum which he cost. He became a criminal, and he was nursed as if he were a darling child, worthy of the kindest attention. Now, in his opinion, if a man who committed offences of the kind which deserved flogging were turned adrift with his back red and raw, a great many scoundrels would be deterred from entering the Army. As to the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer), he was very glad to hear his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) speak of him in the manner in which he had done. The hon. and learned Baronet set up for being a great military authority—so great, indeed, that it was doubtful whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War himself had anything like the same amount of knowledge on the subject. He hoped, however, that his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), so far from being deterred by the authority of the hon. and learned Baronet, would press his Amendment to a Division, even if he had only two supporters, in order that they might remove from themselves the stigma of desiring to shield the scoundrels of the Army.

MR. A. H. BROWN opposed the Amendment. It would apply to the case of a soldier engaged on active service in the field; and he should like to point out to the hon. Member for Meath what might happen under its operation. Let him suppose, for instance, that during the late Afghan War a soldier, having been flogged, was turned out of the Army; he would have to make his way back to India through the midst of a whole body of hostile Natives, and the probability was that he would run the utmost risk of being killed. In fact, dismissal from the Army, under such circumstances, might mean nothing more nor less than death to the man. He was sure the hon. Member for Meath could scarcely have given sufficient consideration to the probability of such a state of things occurring if his Amendment were agreed to.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that, as he understood the Amendment, it simply raised the question whether a man who had rendered himself liable to so degrading a punishment as flogging was fit to continue a member of Her Majesty's Army? As to the apprehensions which seemed to be entertained by the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, it was only necessary to say that no commanding officer could be so inhuman as to turn a man out of the Service to certain death. Besides, there were always attached to every Army a number of camp-followers, among whom a soldier so placed might find shelter for a time. But the real question at issue was whether a soldier was, in such cases as those to which the Amendment applied, fit to remain in the Army? And he would put the matter to a test by pointing out that there was in civil life no offender, except a garotter, on whom the punishment of flogging was inflicted by the English law. That being so, all that it was sought by the Amendment to affirm was that when a man had fallen to a position so low and degraded as that of a garotter he should no longer be held to be worthy of a place in Her Majesty's Service. Could Her Majesty's Army, he would ask, be honoured by the presence of such a soldier? As a National Army, it was a crime against the nation to argue that it might be represented by men of the most degraded character. Viewed as a Parliamentary Army, surely he and those who supported the Amendment had a right to complain that the House of Commons was seeking unnecessarily to oblige that Army to keep in its ranks men who were only fit to be put on the same platform as the lowest garotter. Entertaining those views on the subject, he should cordially support the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he could not support the Amendment, being of opinion that it would not be for the interest of the Army that it should lose the services of a soldier in the field simply because he happened to have committed some offence for which more than 12 lashes had been inflicted on him.

MR. PARNELL contended that he was not open to the charge of inconsistency which had been brought against him by the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker). He had no recollection of having brought forward, in the previous week, any Amendment, the terms of which were opposed to that which was now under the consideration of the Committee. The only Division which he had taken last week had reference to Sub-section 10, and, probably, the hon. Member confused one sub-section with another. But even supposing he had done last week what the hon. Gentleman stated, there was no good reason why he should not change his mind, following, in that respect, the very distinguished example of some of the Members of the Government. There was, in his opinion, undoubtedly, a class of crimes the commission of which ought to be regarded as rendering a soldier unfit to serve Her Majesty. It had been repeatedly pointed out by the supporters of the Bill that it was only for very serious offences that it was proposed to inflict the punishment of flogging; and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had given the Committee a catalogue of them, embracing rape, and murder, and breaches of discipline, dangerous to the safety of the Army. Now, he would ask any hon. Member whether it was not most reasonable that a man, who had been convicted of committing rape, should be dismissed from the Army? He might receive two dozen lashes for the offence; but there were some men who would care no more about two, or even four, dozen lashes than a school-boy would care about having 12 strokes from his master's broom-handle administered to him. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire proposed to give such a man two dozen, and to turn him loose to commit a savage assault or a murder again. Now, were not all the crimes which were to be scheduled as involving the punishment of flogging bad enough to make it desirable to turn all such offenders out of the Army? He thought there could be only one answer to that. He and other hon. Members had been held up to the contempt of the House as championing the cause of men who committed those disgraceful offences. They had been told they wanted to save ruffians from the lash; and when they adopted that view and tried to follow it up to its natural sequence, they were told they were moving trifling Amendments. As a matter of detail, it had been said that, on active service, there must be a difficulty in carrying out a sentence of discharge with ignominy. He did not suppose that a man so sentenced would be turned loose in the middle of the bush, to be eaten by Zulus, or left to find his way alone through the dangerous Khyber Pass. He would leave the time to the discretion of the military authorities; it would be very easy to keep the man in custody meanwhile. There was no difficulty in the way at all, and the suggestion was a perfectly practical one. Such reasons against it were only worked up by hon. Members to soothe their own consciences, because they were ashamed of supporting these flogging clauses. It was odious to them to have to do so; and, in nine cases out of ten, they were searching round for some miserable little reason or excuse why they should support the Government in its obstinate course. He did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division, but would adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw); and if the Government would undertake to consider the matter between now and the Report, he should be happy to withdraw the Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY could not undertake to make a promise on the subject, nor did he wish to impugn any hon. Member's consistency. The actual point was this—that, on active service, they had to deal with crimes which were very serious and disgraceful, in a military sense, but which were not civil offences; and they must be visited with severe punishment, in some form or other. Perhaps they had a lot of troops on the move, or going into action, or under many other special circumstances which easily suggested themselves; and, in that condition of affairs, they could not imprison a man, they did not want to shoot him, but they must punish him severely in some way. Then, this flogging was the way which had been customary in the Army; and, so far as he knew, the Army were not discontented with it; for they found no difficulty in attracting large—he might say, increasing—numbers of recruits to the Colours. That was the simple matter of fact of the position in which they found themselves. Neglect of duty on sentry, for instance, might imperil a whole Army. Smoking a pipe was nothing very disgraceful; but if a soldier in charge of the ammunition were found with a lighted pipe in his possession, he would be naturally liable to very severe punishment. If a man endangered the lives of a whole Army, although his offence might not be disgraceful, yet he would have committed a serious military crime. Where they could not punish by imprisonment they must punish summarily; and he ventured to say that this was the only course they could pursue. Of course, there was power to dismiss with ignominy; but that was a matter which should be left to the discretion of the court martial.

MR. OTWAY thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not considered sufficiently the nature of the question. Did he mean that flogging was a deterrent punishment? because, if so, he (Mr. Otway) could easily prove, from the War Office's own figures, that it had utterly failed. Then, the hon. and gallant Gentleman made an assertion to which he took exception—namely, that there was no difficulty in obtaining recruits. On that he would put a question to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. Had he any difficulty in retaining soldiers in the Army, and was it not the fact that a soldier left the Army as soon as he could? A colonel of one of our smartest regiments told him the great difficulty was that they could not keep the non-commissioned officers. What was the use, then, of saying there was no difficulty in obtaining recruits? Unquestionably, they had 30,000 or 40,000 boys of 17 or 18 years of age, if they called them soldiers; but he told them they could not keep their men in the Army, and this disciplinary punishment of flogging was a very great deterrent in that sense. [A laugh.] That was his belief, and merely to laugh at a statement was no argument at all. He had observed that sort of proceeding going on. The Secretary of State for War had had two questions addressed to him to-night, to neither of which had he been able, or seen fit, to afford any information in reply; and with every desire on the part of hon. Members to conduct the Business amicably and sensibly, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not answer questions, it would be impossible for them to continue the discussion in that spirit. Above all, the hon. and gallant Gentleman ought to be clear on the point as to whether flogging was a deterrent, on which his mind at present seemed to be in a great state of confusion. It had entirely failed in South Africa, where floggings were very frequent, and seemed to have no deterrent effect whatever. He thought the proposition of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was a very sensible one. Its object was to elevate the character of the soldier. The argument on behalf of flogging was that it was meant to degrade the man who received it. Well, when they had degraded him by that punishment for a disgraceful crime, was it their wish to continue that man in comradeship with the other soldiers of the Army? He thought it a very serious question, and one well worthy to be considered; but it was perfectly clear to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not considered it at all; and, therefore, the hon. Member for Meath had a perfect right to make the proposition which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had answered so curtly, declining even to promise that he would re-consider the question before the Bill was passed. If that was the spirit in which the discussion was to be conducted by the Government, all he could say was that the Bill would not very easily pass.

SIR ROBERT PEEL suggested that the discussion might close, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would say what offences were to be put in the Schedule. After the examples he had given of what was disgraceful in a soldier, he might easily state what would be in the Schedule, and place it on the Table to-morrow. Were they to understand that the offences to be scheduled were those in the 22nd section of the Mutiny Act? If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would be good enough to state that, it would facilitate progress, and tend to the termination of this very long discussion.

MR. C. S. PARKER thought the suggestion might get them out of the difficulty, and when the Schedule was before the House, the hon. Member for Meath might raise his question, which was admittedly an important one. Whether the hon. Member for Meath had or had not been consistent was a matter of very small importance; but the Record of the House showed that he (Mr. C. S. Parker) was right, and the hon. Member for Meath was wrong, as to what would have been the effect of a previous Amendment on which the hon. Gentleman divided. By that Amendment, he would have taken away the power to discharge, and, by his present Amendment, he would take away the power to retain a man who had been flogged. The way out of the difficulty now was to wait for the Schedule, and then they could discuss this important principle—that for all disgraceful offences a man should be dismissed with ignominy.

COLONEL ALEXANDER read the list of offences for which soldiers on active service in the field were now liable to be flogged under the 22nd clause of the Mutiny Act—

“Provided that any court martial may sentence any soldier to corporal punishment while on active service, or on board any ship in commission, for mutiny, insubordination, desertion, drunkenness on duty or on the line of march, or any breach of the Articles of War.”

Striking out the words “or any breach of the Articles of War,” which he disapproved, there was a Schedule ready to hand, which he thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman might be disposed to adopt, if he would consider the matter between this time and to-morrow.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that he had already said he could not decide off-hand, for this was a matter of some gravity. In substance, perhaps, that Schedule might be accepted; but it went too far, in his opinion, with respect to offences on board ship. It would be better to schedule the offences, as far as possible, in harmony with the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th clauses of the Bill now before the Committee; and he should not like to give an undertaking to produce the Schedule-morrow, but he would do so as soon as possible.

MR. PARNELL admitted that the hon. Member (Mr. C. S. Parker) was right, and he was wrong, as to the effect of his previous Amendment; but as to his present Amendment, the more he looked at it the more he was convinced of its value and importance. He believed it would do more than anything else to diminish the flogging of any but those disgraceful characters who ought not be in the Army. Under momentary irritation, a commanding officer might now flog a good soldier, either on board ship or by the assistance of a drumhead court martial, which was a very summary business; but if this Amendment were passed, necessitating the discharge of a flogged man from the Service, a very strong inducement would be afforded to commanding officers to refrain from flogging good soldiers whom they did not desire to lose. Therefore, it would protect the good soldier in a very unexampled way from hasty sentences and quick-tempered officers; because, if they flogged him, they must dismiss him. He must trouble the Committee by dividing, especially as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had refused to give the matter any consideration.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he listened with great attention to what the Secretary of State for War had said; but he fancied there was a very large number of offences that ought and could be punished on the line of march by other means than either flogging or shooting. For instance, an offender might be condemned to very inconvenient labour or fatigue duty, or he could be marched in a position that would expose him to the unfavourable criticism of his comrades. If an officer got drunk on the line of march, they could not imprison him and they could not shoot him, and nobody thought of flogging him; and he wanted to know if it was not necessary to flog an officer for drunkenness, why a soldier should be flogged for drunkenness, unless there were some specially aggravating circumstances, which gave the offence an infamous tinge? He thought, considering the large inducements for getting drunk which the Army system offered to the soldier, the punishment of flogging for drunkenness was very much out of place. At present, in South Africa, soldiers could get drunk very easily, and were getting drunk very readily; and it would be much better if some pressure were put upon the military authorities to superintend their supply of drinks, and to guard their men from the temptations to drink, rather than to put into their hands the power of recklessly flogging the unfortunate fellows who fell under the temptation of drink.

MR. WADDY regretted the somewhat heated manner in which both sides of the House had carried on this discussion. He heard one Member from his side of the House allege that hon. Gentlemen on the Government Benches were of opinion that soldiers liked flogging; and he could not help thinking that it would be as well to keep clear of such absurd assertions. He was going to vote against the Amendment; but the view he took of the matter now was very different from that which he took when this debate began. The difficulty he then felt was that there were hon. Members on both sides of the House belonging to the Military Profession, and almost all, if not all, of them appeared to be on one side of the question. Now, if one attempted to give a conscientious vote with regard to a matter on which, professionally, one knew little or nothing, all that one could do, in the first instance, at all events, was to listen to the opinions of men who had professional experience, and who were perfectly humane, and to be guided very much by their opinions; and it was because he felt that was the only resource he had, that in one or two Divisions on the subject he felt it his duty to vote on behalf of that system of principles which appeared to him to be opposed to death, and in behalf of a minor punishment. But this debate had now lasted for some length of time, and probably would last longer still; and some of them felt it to be their duty, under the circumstances, to get all the information they could on this difficult subject from other men in the Army than those who were in the House. The result of that information, in his case, was that he felt it his duty to give his vote on the side of those hon. Members who opposed the principle of flogging as far as they could oppose it. He knew very well that did not affect this particular Amendment; and the reason he opposed the Amendment was that he could not help thinking that it was one that would destroy itself. In the present state of the composition of the Army, they could not carry out an Amendment of this sort practically. He was sorry to say it; but there were scores and hundreds of men in the Army at this moment, who, he was afraid, would be very willing indeed to go through the punishment of flogging if, in the result, they might be dismissed, even with ignominy. The answer to that, of course, was that they ought not to be in the Army at all. He entirely agreed with that; but they were there, and he thought that was one of the strongest arguments that could be used against the general principle of flogging. He feared that many such men were in the Army, while men of a higher stamp refused to enlist, because there was this punishment of flogging for them; but, then, being where they were for the present, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath would not bear consideration. He did not propose to go into the general question; but he thought they would have, sooner or later, to abolish this punishment, in order that they might bring into their Army a worthier and a higher class of men, who would not join as long as there was this punishment in store for them. There were in this country at this moment thousands of men, well brought up, but not in circumstances of wealth, who would be very happy to join the Army and to fight their way through, now that Purchase was abolished, taking the Army as a legitimate and honourable Profession, but who would be very likely to be hindered from joining as long as flogging was maintained. Therefore, with regard to the broad general question, he had been convinced by what he had heard in and out of this House; but with regard to the Amendment, he should vote against it.

Mr. Waddy

GENERAL SHUTE thought it was only the greatest possible blackguards who should have corporal punishment, and he would have it abolished altogether if it could be; but he should oppose the Amendment for this reason—that although only great blackguards should be punished, yet they must remember that those men whom they discharged with ignominy would be able in a month to enlist in another regiment.

MR. O'DONNELL suggested that such a man would have his mark on his back.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 157: Majority 109.—(Div. List, No. 125.)

MR. O'DONNELL said, he begged leave to propose an Amendment; but he would not persist in it if the general sense of the Committee were against it—

“That in every case in which a soldier should be so punished, he should not be allowed to serve with men who have never undergone this punishment.”

The object of the Amendment was to meet the argument of some hon. Members who had defended flogging. The hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) said just now, if they followed up the punishment of flogging with expulsion from the Army, there were, perhaps, several hundreds of scoundrels in the Army who would gladly undergo a flogging in order to be rid of their military obligations. He supposed the Committee accepted that explanation, for they rejected the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Meath. But they had to consider the position in which the Army was thus left. Soldiers might be flogged, and might continue to serve in the Army, and thus, when the red-coats passed through the streets, the civilians did not know but any particular soldier who was passing by might be a flogged man; and there could be no doubt whatever that that stigma of being possibly a flogged man must lower the character of any individual soldier in the eyes of the civil community. Well, why not—if they were to have flogged men—take a leaf from the regulations of other nations, and provide that such flogged men should continue to serve their country, but in battalions by themselves? Why not have disciplinary battalions, in which men of that character could serve? They had plenty of disagreeable work to do; they had Colonies and posts on which it must often seem a pity to squander the valuable lives of upright soldiers. Why not make use of an inferior class of men for those stations? If they were to keep in the Service men who had suffered the infamous punishment of flogging, let them be brigaded in battalions by themselves, and in that way let the Army be weeded of the hundreds of scoundrels for whose benefit the lash was maintained; but let not that disgraceful class of soldier continue to be shoulder to shoulder with honourable men. He begged, therefore, to propose that men who had been flogged should serve for the future in penal battalions; and he moved that, in page 19, line 28, these words be inserted—

“And in every case where a soldier has been so punished, he shall not be allowed to serve with men who have not undergone this punishment.”

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped the hon. Member would not press the Amendment, which he supposed had been merely put forward as a rhetorical device with which to bring to bear some reasonable observations on other matters.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was bound to give a reason why he could not accept the Amendment, and he was bound to suppose that it was moved with the object of establishing disciplinary corps. All he could say was, that that had never been in accordance with the traditions of the Service, nor did he think it would ever be popular or effective. So far as he was aware, when a man had received corporal punishment, the whole matter was done away with and forgotten. He did not think either the man or his comrades thought anything further of the matter; and, whatever might be said in the House, nothing would induce him to hold any other opinion than that the process which the hon. Gentleman proposed would be vindictively following up a man who had been punished.

MR. O'DONNELL replied, that if it were provided that no man was to be flogged except for an infamous offence, he thought the comrades of such a man would not be likely to think lightly of his offence. He did not think officers would think nothing of an officer who had been flogged; and he did not see why this broad distinction should be perpetually drawn between soldiers and officers on the subject. He should not press the Amendment; but he considered the establishment of disciplinary battalions would be a most useful transitional step, in order to get rid of the scoundrels from the Army, and to convert it into an Army of citizens.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 19, lines 30 and 31, to leave out “for an offence punishable under this Act, with imprisonment or greater punishment.”

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, proposing to inflict flogging only for such offences as were at present liable to be punished by death; but as the Secretary of State for War had agreed to bring up a Schedule of offences, he would not move the Amendment.

MR. H. SAMUELSON moved to insert, in line 22, after “active service,” the words “except in the Island of Cyprus in time of peace.” He said, no doubt, it seemed a very strange Amendment to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and at first it looked equally strange to himself; but he offered it in perfect good faith, because he could not, for the life of him, understand why the troops in the Island of Cyprus should be liable to flogging in time of peace, as they appeared to be under the Bill as it stood; while by the law of England, Her Majesty's troops, as a whole, were not liable to flogging in time of peace. If hon. Gentlemen would take the trouble to look at Clause 6, they would find that offences were punishable more severely on active service than at any other time; and, by reference to the Definition Clause, they would find that active service meant, amongst other things, the active occupation of a foreign country. Now, Cyprus did not answer to the description of a Colony, but to that of a foreign country; and, therefore, the troops stationed there might be held to be on active service. Another reason for that view might be found in the terms of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, by which the occupation of Cyprus was throughout recognized as a military temporary occupation of a foreign country. The Sultan was the liege lord of Cyprus, and Her Majesty merely rented the Island from him for certain purposes. They were told, also, that it was taken as a place of war. He should like to know whether the Secretary of State for War could assure the Committee that, as a matter of law, as well as a matter of intention, Her Majesty's troops now serving in Cyprus, although they were engaged in the occupation of a foreign country, were not subject to the pains and penalties in the shape of flogging to which offenders were liable when on active service? It appeared to him that as the Bill was at present drawn, it would enable a commanding officer who construed the Bill literally, even if it did not absolutely compel him, to inflict a great injustice upon soldiers serving in Cyprus; but he was sure the Government would not wish to make an exception of that Island, but to put service in it on the same footing as service in Malta, Gibraltar, or the other English Colonies. He submitted the Amendment in all seriousness, hoping the Government would be able to show a clear way out of the difficulty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) thought the Amendment was unnecessary. In the Interpretation Clause the term "active service" was applied to a person subject to military law whenever—

"He is attached to or forms part of a force which is engaged in operations against the enemy, or is engaged in military operations in a country or place wholly or partly occupied by an enemy, or is in military occupation of any foreign country."

Undoubtedly, our soldiers were not engaged at present in Cyprus in military operations against the enemy; nor were they engaged in a place wholly or partly occupied by an enemy; nor were they engaged in the military occupation of a foreign country. He did not think that Cyprus was in the same position as any of the Colonies or of any of the Dominions of Her Majesty; and no lawyer would be able to say that the soldiers in Cyprus were in military occupation of a foreign country, or that the troops of this country were without the consent or against the will of the Rulers of any foreign country in military occupation of it. Cyprus was occupied through an amicable arrangement between this country and the Porte, and it was never intended that it should be treated as a military occupation.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE failed to follow the argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General. He admitted—though he did not say so—that Cyprus was a foreign country, or, at any rate, if he did not, the Lord Chancellor had used that very phrase in the House of Lords, and it was frequently used also by persons who were responsible. Therefore, the whole of the question turned upon the words "military occupation." The hon. and learned Attorney General had put in the words "without the consent of" or "against the will of a foreign Power," for there was nothing about that in the Interpretation Clause; and, certainly, they ought to limit military occupation by the insertion of that phrase. If they did not intend to put these words in, then clearly his hon. Friend was right in his contention; because the words of the Convention itself made this position quite clear. In that Convention, as had been pointed out, the ordinary terms of civil occupation were not used, and the terms were military throughout. The word "evacuation" was especially used and not the word "cession," as would have been the case otherwise,

Mr. H. Samuelson

Further, we had occupied the Island with a garrison of 10,000 or 11,000 men; we had declared it to be a place of arms; and we had begun by constructing military roads. Undoubtedly, the troops were, therefore, in military occupation of it; they were on active service, and this clause as to flogging would certainly apply.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL would not dispute the law of the case of the Attorney General; but if there was any difficulty about the question it should be made clear, otherwise, this question would effect not only Cyprus, but also larger places situated in the same position as that Island. For instance, there were very considerable territories belonging to the Ameer of Cabul which hitherto had owned allegiance to him, and which were now to be placed in military occupation of our troops. In that case, also, this same point would arise; and, therefore, it was very necessary that there should be no obscurity.

MR. HOPWOOD pointed out that active service had been defined, and included a military occupation of a foreign country. A foreign country was defined as a place not situated in the United Kingdom, a Colony, or India. Cyprus was not in the United Kingdom, it was not in India, and it certainly was not a Colony. Then, was it not a foreign country—and, if so, the soldier could be clearly subjected to the punishment of the lash? Would it not, therefore, be better to put in some words especially dealing with the case of Cyprus?

SIR HENRY JAMES remarked, that there was a good deal to be said of both views; and, therefore, as doubts might arise, he thought they had better make some Amendment. They all admitted that the soldiers in Cyprus were not to be flogged; and surely, therefore, they could come to some arrangement as to the preparing of the clause. The matter clearly ought to have been put right; for it would not be the least consolation to a soldier if, after a mistake had been made, he were told that the Attorney General had said he could not be flogged. The matter might easily be dealt with in the definition of the clause.

COLONEL STANLEY, with great respect for the opinions of hon. Members opposite, could not entertain a doubt that the military occupation meant was military occupation in a hostile country.

He would suggest, however, that the matter might be dealt with as pointed out in the Definition Clause.

MR. H. SAMUELSON was glad to find that the Government now admitted his Amendment was not so absurd as they seemed at first to consider it; and as his only wish was to prevent the legalization of an anomaly, and the Government had promised to make it quite clear that soldiers serving in Cyprus should not be liable to flogging in time of peace, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SULLIVAN moved, in page 19, line 31, after the word "on," to insert the words "officers or," so that the clause would read—

"Corporal punishment in pursuance of this Act may be inflicted for an offence punishable under this Act with imprisonment or a greater punishment on officers or soldiers while on active service," &c.

His Amendment, of course, raised the whole question of whether the punishment of flogging should be treated in one way for one class, and in another for another class. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had frequently told them that flogging was necessary on the line of march, because they could not imprison a soldier; it was inconvenient to send him to the rear, and they did not want to shoot him; but if an officer committed any of these offences, they could not shoot him, and they did not flog him. What, therefore, were they to do with him? If the soldiers were flogged, why not the officers also? That was the exact point he wished to raise. Such a difference would make a great impression on the country, and it would have much to do, certainly, with recruiting in the future. The real objection to his Amendment was that if it were once introduced a man would never be flogged again, or an officer either. He wished to be candid, and the Committee clearly would see that the object of his Amendment was that there should be no flogging in the Army. He could not understand why a beastly offence should be punished in one case with flogging, and not in the other. Many young men of excellent family had entered the Army as privates; but did they suppose that any young man of education would do so, now that they knew they might be liable to be subjected to the ignominy of the lash; while, if they had entered as officers, they might have committed a much more serious and more disgraceful offence, and yet the lash would not have touched their backs? Why was this class distinction made? It belonged to a time when the private was believed to be of a very different clay to the porcelain of which his officers were made. This was a very serious distinction that they proposed. They said that murder, rape, or robbery was worthy of the lash if committed by Private Tom Smith; but that if Lieutenant Jones, the officer, committed the same offence, he ought not to be punished, and was not worthy of the lash at all. The argument had been used that they ought to flog soldiers because they flogged garotters in the gaols. It was not a very complimentary argument; but he would ask whether, if a garotter belonged to an educated class, that would save his back from the lash? He looked forward to the day when the Army should be drawn from a superior class of men to that which they now had in it. The Board schools would shortly have done their work in turning out more highly-educated children; and did they think that a generation in which the intelligence was quickened, and its powers developed, would ever allow itself to be subjected to the ignominy of the lash? He knew of no Amendment which had yet been proposed which so closely touched the question of the self-respect of the working classes; and, therefore, he hoped that it would be accepted by the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 31, after the word "on," to insert the words "officers or."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'officers or' be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could not accept the Amendment. If the Committee were to accept it, they would undo their own work. They had already made an alteration in the clause which exempted non-commissioned officers from the punishment of flogging for any offence committed by them as non-commissioned officers; and the objection which was raised to their punishment applied to the case of officers also. It was not necessary, for the purpose of discipline, to deal with offences by officers in any other manner than that proposed by the Bill. Upon these grounds, he felt that he was justified in opposing the Amendment.

MR. RYLANDS thought this was a very serious and important Amendment. It was very possible that gentlemen who had themselves been officers in the Army would shrink, and naturally so, from an Amendment of this kind, the effect of which would be, of course, to cast, by implication, some stigma on officers in the Army. It would be supposed that officers could be guilty of the infamous conduct involving such punishment. He wished to point out to the Committee that in our Common Law proceedings any such distinction in classes of offenders would be scouted. Rank would not be allowed to interfere to save a noble Duke from the punishment which would be given to an humble individual for breaches of the law. In Common Law no distinction was ever made, and he could not see why the same principle should not be applied to the Army. He hoped and believed that no officer would ever be guilty of the only class of offences scheduled in the Bill; but if an officer was guilty of any such crime, he ought to be punished the same as the common soldier. He regarded the Amendment as one of the most important yet placed on the Paper, and the Committee would commit a great mistake if it did not vote for it.

MR. BURT said, he felt very strongly, indeed, on the general question of flogging. He thought the time had come when it might, with very great advantage, be entirely abolished. He had no doubt it deterred many good men from entering the Army. At the same time, it was possible there might be offences sufficiently bad to make flogging necessary or justifiable; but he thought the punishment should be attached to the crime or offence, irrespective of the rank or position of the guilty party. He thought that that was the general principle that the House ought to assent to. He did not see on what principle flogging should be administered to a common soldier for an offence which was not punished by flogging when committed by an officer, unless on the old principle mentioned by our great Dramatist—

Mr. Sullivan

"That in the captain's but a choleric word, Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy."

If they retained flogging for certain offences for soldiers, and did not impose it on officers who committed similar offences, then a most odious distinction was established between one man and another.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he entirely differed from the hon. Gentleman opposite, who thought no distinction should exist between officers and soldiers in this matter on the ground of rank. He thought there should be the greatest distinction; and, therefore, he opposed the Amendment entirely. He would reverse the quotation, and he would say—

"That in the private's but a choleric word, Which in the officer is flat blasphemy."

And that those offences which were punished in privates by some minor punishment should be, and must be, visited in the case of the officers by the most severe punishment. If an officer committed any of these crimes he deserved death, and he would get it.

SIR HENRY JAMES was sorry to detain the Committee; but he should like to explain the vote he was about to give. He had consistently voted against flogging, and he could not now accept the invitation of his hon. and learned Friend and vote in favour of his Amendment, which would extend flogging, and declare that flogging should be administered. He wished to see no officer flogged, and he wished to see no private soldier flogged. The Committee had already agreed that no non-commissioned officer should be flogged; and if his hon. and learned Friend was consistent, he ought to have opposed that. It did not make it right to flog one class of men to propose to flog another; and, therefore, while he could understand this Amendment as intended to show how wrong it was to flog private soldiers, when it was put seriously, he must vote against it. He wished to see flogging abolished; and, therefore, he should vote against any proposition that any man, officer or soldier, should be flogged.

MR. PARNELL said, at first sight, there was something inconsistent in the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Louth; but the inconsistency was more apparent than real. How did the matter stand? They had affirmed the principle of flogging. They now came to consider the further question, as to whether flogging should be limited to soldiers only and should not be extended to officers? In considering this question, they might fairly take into account the reasons given by the Secretary of State for War for the position he had taken up on the question of flogging. What had he told them repeatedly? He told them, over and over again, that it was necessary to retain flogging because the officers of the Army wished to have it retained. If the officers wished to have it retained, let it be retained for the officers as well as the soldiers of the Army. They were told, also, that because they had agreed to exempt non-commissioned officers they ought to exempt officers; but non-commissioned officers stood on a different footing as regarded flogging. It was the officers who passed the sentence; it was the others who were sentenced. There was no inconsistency in exempting non-commissioned officers from a punishment which they had no power to inflict. The reason he and others contended for this Amendment was that if it was agreed to by the Committee, flogging in the Army would necessarily end. If officers were made liable to flogging, there would soon arise a feeling among the Army officers in that House which would lead at once to the abolition of flogging.

MR. HERSCHELL said, the argument of the hon. Member was not sound. It did not follow that officers would be flogged, though they were included in the Bill; and it would not follow either that flogging would be done away with altogether.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was as opposed to flogging as anyone; but he saw the importance of the Amendment, and he should vote for it. It was not that they wished flogging; but that the same law should apply to the rich and poor alike.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL was sure the hon. and learned Member for Louth did not wish to flog the officers of the Army; and, therefore, he put it to him whether he had not better withdraw the Amendment? The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) said that all men were equal in the sight of the law, and that what was good for the private was good for the officer. In civil life they were all equal; but, on entering the Army, a man gave up his civil rights. There must be a distinction in rank.

MR. HOPWOOD acknowledged there was an apparent inconsistency here in seeking to extend a punishment which they tried to limit or abolish. But the inconsistency was, after all, merely apparent. It was conceded that the officer might be guilty of crime such as in the case of an English soldier would be punished with flogging. Then, why deny the officer that privilege? They had instituted flogging for "soldiers." If the officers could prove that they were not soldiers, let them go without flogging. If the officers wished to be exempt, let them not be guilty. An hon. Gentleman opposite said—"You have a number of blackguards in the Army, and they must be flogged," among the men. Well, he was only asking the Committee now to flog those who were blackguards among the officers. No Profession was without its blackguards; his own Profession did not escape, neither did the officers in the Army. He should vote for the Amendment.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID said, he had not interfered in this debate before, and he rose now only to appeal to his hon. and learned Friend to withdraw the Amendment. If he pressed it to a Division, he would place those who were in favour of abolishing flogging in the Army in a difficulty. He could not suppose that it was desired to extend the area; consequently, he could not agree to do what he thought wrong in order that good might come of it. He thought his hon. and learned Friend desired to reduce the whole matter to an absurdity, and in that he had been eminently successful.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN also hoped the matter would not be pressed to a Division, because the hon. and learned Gentleman's object had been gained in the discussion which had taken place. It was said the Amendment was inconsistent with others on the same side; but if the matter were looked into carefully, it would be found that all the Amendments, though some of them were inconsistent one with another, had been consistently directed to the abolition of flogging altogether; and, failing that, to limit as much as possible the crimes for which flogging should be inflicted. He hoped the effect of this discussion would be understood out-of-doors. He, at all events, was not in the slightest degree afraid of being held up to ridicule or indignation for having taken part in opposition to the flogging clause. But what he wished would be clearly seen was this—in reference to this particular Amendment, the Government had not, up to the present time, given any reason for the invidious distinction which the Bill made. He was struck by the remark made by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) the other night, that they were all liable to be flogged if they committed serious offences. If anyone brutally assaulted a woman or garotted an old man, said the noble Lord, he would be flogged. That, at all events, took away the invidiousness of the punishment for civil offences. He did not understand that anything had been advanced to justify the invidious distinction in favour of officers of the Army. If they were all liable to be flogged, he did not see why officers in the Army should be exempt.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought it desirable the Committee should be consistent; and, therefore, he reminded it of what had been legislated in regard to corporal punishment in the Navy. By Sub-section 11, Clause 53, of the Naval Discipline Act, passed 10 years ago, it was provided that no officer should be subject to corporal punishment, and no petty or non-commissioned officer should be subject to it, except in case of mutiny. He thought the officers of the Army and the Navy should be on a similar footing.

MR. SULLIVAN, in consideration of the appeals made by several hon. Friends who were opposed to flogging, offered to withdraw the Amendment. He should raise the question, however, next Session. He and others were opposed to all flogging, and they had begun an attack on the lash, and they intended to persevere with it Session after Session.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 22; Noes 213: Majority 191.—(Div. List, No. 126.)

MR. HOPWOOD said, he considered the Amendment of which he had given Notice was a very important one. He proposed to leave out from the clause the words "or on board any ship not commissioned by Her Majesty." Those words, of course, did not affect what were ordinarily known as Queen's ships. He did not know whether they excluded also transports; but he believed that they did. On board Queen's ships the Naval Discipline Act, of course, applied with such extraordinary severity that under one clause it would, it was said, be possible, for some infraction of military discipline, even to flog a Colonial Bishop who might be a passenger on his way to his See. He wished they would attempt to flog one once, for that would be quite enough to show the absurdity of the present system, and to do away with it. Why was this extraordinary power to flog on board a ship not commissioned by Her Majesty maintained? Soldiers could not be flogged upon land unless they came within the definition of active service; but the moment troops got on board a vessel, although there were still better means of securing discipline, they had this extraordinary power of flogging given. Suppose, for instance, troops were at Southend, and they were put on board a river steamer to go up or down to some place; and suppose even that they were Volunteers, they would yet be amenable to this flogging clause. How could that be necessary? The defence, he supposed, would be the defence of necessity; but if this power were necessary on board ship, why should it not be given also to commanders on land in regard to troops in time of peace? Corporal punishment was said to be necessary on active service, because when on march a man could not be sent to the rear, and could not be imprisoned; but on board ship that was by no means the case. They could put an offender into irons in the hold; they could imprison him until the voyage was ended; and, therefore, where was the necessity for this extraordinary exception? A party of Artillery Volunteers going down the river to practice might be subject to this law; and if there were any infraction of military discipline, their commander might call a court martial and have one of them flogged, although on land he would have no such power. That did seem to him a most extraordinary inconsistency. Again, the other day, the 1st Dragoons started from this country. On land they were not liable to flogging; but when they got on board the transports the commanding officer had power to flog, and it was a power he used on three men whilst on the voyage to the Cape.

Sir George Campbell

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 32, to leave out the words "or on board any ship not commissioned by Her Majesty."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

COLONEL STANLEY said, it was asked why troops on board transports, and, therefore, not under the pennant, should not be treated exactly the same as if they were on shore? There were two reasons. First of all, the offences became much more analogous to those committed on active service; and, consequently, some offences might have very serious effects. A sentry, for instance, in charge of a lamp who went to sleep might, by his neglect of duty, endanger the safety of everybody; and that was not a light offence when a ship was 1,000 miles at sea. Again, in some of these ships going out to the Cape the heat was very great; and, on the score of humanity, he would ask which was the more severe punishment—to administer flogging, or to keep a man in irons, perhaps for 28 or 30 days, in a temperature of over 100 degrees? Another thing was, the troops on board ship did a large portion of the pulling and hauling work; while if a man stood still and refused to work they could not argue with him whether he was to pull a rope or not, and discipline was obliged to be very sharp on board ship.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, if it was not the case that troops going out to the Cape in a man-of-war were liable to a maximum of 48 lashes; whereas in another ship, not under the pennant, 25 would be the maximum?

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that it was hardly a matter he could answer himself, not being in possession of the Naval Discipline Act; but his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) would never allow 48 to be inflicted after the decision of the Committee.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that when he had gone out with troops men had often been flogged merely by the order of the captain commanding. The officer in charge of the troops complained to him of a soldier, and he said—"You will be flogged to-morrow;" he was flogged accordingly.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, of course, he was speaking in the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty; but he had no doubt that he expressed his sentiments, when he said that after the decision come to by the Committee the other day, as to the limitation of 25, that that really would be followed in the Naval Discipline Act.

MR. OTWAY said, this rule might have some justification when troops were on board ships for two, three, or four months together. But, now, he would defy the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stanley) to name any place which was a distance of 28 days from an English port—the greatest distance that he knew of was 21 days. The contention was that it was better to treat soldiers in this barbarous manner than to inflict on them a lengthened term of imprisonment; but that contention fell to the ground, when they knew that the longest term of imprisonment could be but 21 days. In these changed circumstances, he thought they might find an efficient argument for abolishing corporal punishment on these ships. The most valuable officers in the Navy were of opinion that they might get rid of it; and on this point he might quote the opinion of a man whose opinion they would all respect, the more readily that he was no longer alive—he meant Captain Goodenough. Often and often he had come to him and urged him to bring that particular point to the notice of the House. The whole conditions of service had now so altered that it seemed to him almost impossible to continue this punishment.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would not quarrel with the hon. Gentleman on the point of time; but the voyage to the Cape had taken 28 days.

MR. HOPWOOD, in reply, said, it was not at all a necessary alternative to flogging a man that he should be stifled. Some hon. Member had maintained that this was necessary in order to make the soldiers work on board ship; but he must remind him that the sailors could not be flogged—it was only a soldier in Her Majesty's Service who enjoyed that odious privilege and distinction. He thought his position was unanswerable, or, at all events, his arguments had not been answered.

Colonel Alexander

MR. SULLIVAN asked, whether troops going from Dublin to Holyhead would be liable to be punished under this clause?

MR. PARNELL wished to know whether the clause would apply to the conveyance of Volunteers along the coast in time of peace from one port to another?

COLONEL STANLEY could not at that moment say whether, if Volunteers were brigaded with the Regular troops, they would be liable to corporal punishment. As reasonable men, they would know perfectly well that no such thing would occur. The infliction of such a punishment as this would only be after a trial by court martial.

MR. PARNELL did not think it was at all an unimportant question as to whether the Volunteers would be liable to this punishment. As they were going to have Irish Volunteers, perhaps the Government might be disposed to apply to the Irish Volunteers what was not applied to the English. They had lately seen exceptional things done to Irishmen; and he should not be surprised if this clause were brought into play in their case. He rose for the purpose of saying that he thought the part of the clause which they were discussing was a relic of bygone days. It was introduced to meet the case of the old slow passages on board the sailing troopships. It was not in accordance with the modern conveying of troops on board steam transport ships. The voyage was now of such short duration, and the powers in the hands of commanding officers were so ample, that it was not right to give exceptional powers during the passage. There was nothing on board ship, as anyone who had been on board ship would know, which could be at all endangered by the soldiers not doing their duty. It was really a power which took its rise in past times, when the captains of ships had power to flog their sailors. It was not likely that the captain of a ship would intrust any of the duties of navigation to the soldiers; he would be solely dependent on his own crew. He was sure, therefore, that the power would not be required for the purpose of preventing danger to the ship; and he did not see that its abolition would do any harm whatever.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that it appeared to him that there was an impression that this punishment was to be inflicted on board of ships carrying troops, when such ships were not commissioned by Her Majesty. Her Majesty's troops were now sent to various parts of the world, and very often assistance had been given by the troops on board the vessels to the crew; but he had a distinct conviction that the power to inflict corporal punishment had nothing whatever to do with the services the troops rendered. The services were generally cheerfully and willingly given, and tended to promote a good feeling between the officers of the ship and the officers of the troops. There was no question of flogging in the matter; and it was unnecessary in respect of those services. So far as he had seen, the troops were always willing to lend their hand on board ship when required, and no advantage was gained by making them subject to flogging under those circumstances. The right. hon. and gallant Gentleman had alluded to what he considered might be a great offence, by reason of its endangering the vessel and those on board—namely, by the neglect of lamps. He had no hesitation in saying that no captain of a ship would ever trust that, on which the safety of the ship and those on board so much depended, to any but his own people. As to any lamps which might be upon the troop-deck, that was rather a question of troop discipline, and could be treated in the ordinary way.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE did not think that it was absolutely necessary to flog on board ship; the watches on board ship were not kept by soldiers, but by sailors; and if soldiers kept them, they would probably be washed overboard. There was ample power to maintain discipline on board ship without flogging, by imprisoning or by putting in irons in the hold, and there were other punishments which might be inflicted. He did not see any necessity for flogging on board ships; and, therefore, he should vote for the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 164; Noes 68: Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 127.)

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) that the Amendment he proposed in page 19, line 34, to insert the words—

“And shall never be inflicted on any soldier save by the sentence of a court martial,” was not germane to this clause.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, whether the Amendment would not be germane to the 72nd clause?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that it appeared to him that the Amendment might be properly raised on the 72nd clause.

MAJOR NOLAN observed, that the Chairman's decision seemed to him to be very curious. The clause began—“Punishments may be inflicted in respect of offences committed by persons subject to military law, and convicted by court martial,” and it certainly seemed to him that his Amendment was perfectly germane to this clause, and that he ought to be allowed to move that the punishment should be restricted to persons convicted by court martial. Of course, if he were ruled out of Order, he would submit; but he did not see how it could be so.

MR. PARNELL said, that the clause stated that punishment might be inflicted on all persons subject to military law. What his hon. and gallant Friend wished to do by his Amendment was to add that the punishment of flogging, one of the punishments which might be inflicted by the sentence of a court martial, should not be inflicted except by a sentence of a court martial. The clause, at present, was only permissive; but his hon. and gallant Friend wished to secure that the punishment of flogging should never be inflicted under certain circumstances.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. and gallant Member proposed by his Amendment that the punishment in question should not be inflicted by any other tribunal than a court martial. The clause now before the Committee had relation only to punishments inflicted by courts martial. It seemed to him that an Amendment of that character would be properly moved upon a clause which proposed to inflict the punishment in another way.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to shut out not only the flogging by the provost marshal, but by captains on board ship, and the present seemed to him to be the only place to insert the restriction that flogging was only to take place by order of a court martial; he did not see how he could raise the Amendment elsewhere. There would be great difficulty in moving a new clause; and it would be much easier to raise it upon one of the penal clauses. He thought it would turn out that it was a very inconsistent decision to rule that he could not move his Amendment upon that clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) agreed with the Chairman's view, that the effect of the Amendment upon this clause would be to make it most absurd. The clause would read that punishments might be inflicted upon persons subject to military law, and convicted by court martial, and afterwards would come the restriction that this particular punishment should not be inflicted upon any soldier, save by the sentence of a court martial. The words were out of place in a clause dealing with the punishments to be inflicted by a court martial; he thought the Amendment might properly be moved upon the 72nd clause, as had been suggested by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea. The symmetry of the clause would be destroyed if the Amendment were inserted here.

MAJOR NOLAN did not think that the symmetry of the clause would be injured by the adoption of his Amendment. The clause dealt with a number of punishments, and that simply put a restriction upon the infliction of corporal punishment.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, that as the Chairman had ruled that the Amendment was out of Order, the only course open was to move to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. and gallant Member had, he supposed, been endeavouring to alter his decision upon the admissibility of the Amendment. He was, therefore, not absolutely out of Order in what he said.

MR. HOPWOOD rose to Order. He said that, in Clause 44, punishments might be inflicted upon persons subject to military law and convicted by court martial. Would it be possible to introduce after the words "military laws," "and shall not be inflicted otherwise than by court martial?" He did not think that there was anything wrong in inserting, in a later part of the clause, "should be inflicted upon a soldier only by the sentence of a court martial." The whole clause was descriptive of punishment; and there was no harm in making some punishments only to be inflicted under particular circumstances. On the other hand, Clause 72, in which it was proposed to insert the Amendment, had nothing to do with punishments. It was only in that clause that punishments which were to be inflicted were enumerated; and there could be nothing inconsistent in saying that a particular punishment could only be inflicted by a court martial.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. and learned Member for Stockport was expressing his opinion that an Amendment of this sort should have been placed in the earlier part of the clause. But it had not been moved in that place, and the words at the beginning of the clause had been passed, and were the governing words of the clause. It was not competent to move these words now.

MR. CALLAN asked whether he could move to insert after the words "other circumstances," "save by sentence of a court martial?"

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member would be out of Order.

MR. CALLAN begged to move to report Progress, as he thought the decision of the Chairman was of such importance that time should be afforded to hon. Members to consult authorities, and to decide what course of procedure should be adopted.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. Callan.)

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that hon. Members would not report Progress for a short time, for he proposed to move to leave out the last three lines upon that page, and the first three lines of the next. After that there were only three other Amendments which he proposed to accept, and there was nothing more upon this sub-section of the clause. They had already spent a long time upon the discussion of that clause, and he trusted that the discussion had been productive of good. It was not then so late but what they might well do good work, as they were accustomed to do at a much later hour. He would accept the ruling of the Chair, giving hon.

Major Nolan

Members the assurance that the discussion could very properly be brought on, as the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had said, upon the 72nd clause. As they had cleared away much of what was debatable, he trusted that the Committee would that evening finish the few sub-sections which remained of the clause.

MR. HERSCHELL agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that this matter could be properly raised upon the 72nd clause. There were provisions upon that clause which would have to be dealt with upon the 72nd, and the limitation of flogging was one of those matters which would be properly considered upon the provost marshal clause. The 72nd clause was one of the vaguest possible character; and it would be necessary to make considerable alterations in it, and to decide whether or not there should be any flogging by the provost marshal.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that considering the numerous Amendments to the Bill, and the dangerous ground over which they had been going, he thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had met them in a very fair and conciliatory spirit. For his own part, having taken part in this discussion, he did hope that his hon. and gallant Friend would take his advice, and would adopt the suggestion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and allow the Committee to go on for another half-hour.

MR. PARNELL thought that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway would do best to postpone his Amendment—in fact, he did not see how he could help it, as the Chairman had ruled him out of Order. He thought, moreover, that at that late hour, and considering how long they had been discussing this question, that it might very well be postponed until Clause 72 was reached; any matters which had been omitted would come later upon the discussion of the 72nd clause.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he would not move Amendment then, but would raise it upon the 72nd clause. He saw a considerable difficulty in doing so; and it seemed to him that there would be much more difficulty and responsibility in changing that clause than in altering the present clause, and declaring that a soldier should only be punished in respect of flogging by a court martial. He thought it very hard that he should have been ruled out of Order upon this clause, and he was afraid the Bill would suffer for it.

MR. CALLAN begged leave to withdraw his Motion to report Progress. At the same time, he begged to give Notice that he intended to raise a question as to the decision of the Chairman upon this point.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. OTWAY did not wish to prolong this discussion; but he must express his extreme regret that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had chosen to protract this debate by the course he had pursued. It would always be remembered that it was the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's Government, and it was during the reign of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that the British soldier was subjected to a punishment which lowered the gallant fellows upon whom it was inflicted. It would always be remembered that it was the present Secretary of State for War, and the Home Secretary, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who distinguished themselves by continuing the use of the lash. One remark he wished to make before he left this subject. Statements had been made by Ministers of that House that the military authorities—and he had it upon the authority of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War—that the military authorities were in favour of this punishment. He challenged the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to produce his military authorities. Why did he not? On the other hand, he had some military authority against this punishment. He had the authority of a gentleman whose name would pass down for ever as a brave and gallant soldier—namely, the late General Napier, and he was most decidedly opposed to flogging, as well in time of war as in time of peace. Then, again, was there any authority among military gentlemen having seats in that House higher than the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Anson) who seconded a Motion that he (Mr. Otway) had made in that House? Neither of those distinguished officers thought it necessary to retain the lash; but the Government said that they had the highest military authority; and he challenged them to name any officer of recognized position who was prepared to come forward and say that the discipline of a British Army could not be maintained unless the use of the lash were retained. He should divide against this clause; and he hoped that all who wished to relieve the Army from this disgrace would vote with him.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 45: Majority 92.—(Div. List, No. 128.)

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

DEATH OF THE PRINCE IMPERIAL. QUESTIONS.

MR. BENNETT-STANFORD asked, If the Government would give the House the contents of the telegram which they had received from the Cape, and which had occasioned much anxiety?

MR. PULESTON also inquired, What information the Government had received with reference to a report which had occasioned great anxiety to the Members who had heard of it?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, with your permission, and with feelings of very deep regret, which I am sure will be shared by the House, I will read the telegram just received from General Lord Chelmsford, telegraphed from Madeira to-day—“Camp, seven miles beyond Blood River, under Itellezi Mountain, 2nd June.

“Prince Imperial, acting under orders of the Assistant Quartermaster General, reconnoitered on the 1st of June. Rode to camping ground on June 2, accompanied by Lieutenant Carey, 98th, Deputy Assistant Quartermaster General, and six white men and friendly Zulus, all mounted. Party halted and off-saddled off the road about ten miles from this camp. Just as the Prince gave orders to mount a volley was fired from the long grass around the kraals. The Prince Imperial and two troopers are reported missing by Lieutenant Carey, who escaped and reached the camp at dark. On the evidence taken there can be no doubt of the Prince being killed. Some 17th Lancers and ambulances are now starting to recover the body, but I send this off at once hoping to catch the mail. I myself was unaware that the Prince Imperial had been detailed for this duty.”

I have the melancholy satisfaction, such as it is, to add that a telegram has been received by my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), stating that the body of the late Prince Imperial has since been recovered. I think, Sir, it is hardly necessary for me to express here in this House what, I am sure, is felt by all of us in this House, of whatever Party, that a young Prince who, we are proud to think, had derived some portion at least of his military education in our own Military Academy, and who, united by the tenderest bonds of comradeship, had volunteered gallantly to go out and assist his former comrades at a time of difficulty and danger, should have met with a fate which, though it well becomes a soldier, still is one which has cut him off prematurely. I am sure we must all feel the deepest sympathy with that gracious lady who is thus deprived of the only prop to which she might have justly looked forward in after-life.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIAN MARINE BILL.—[BILL 182.]
(Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. John G. Talbot.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BIGGAR said, he hoped that the House would not consent to go into Committee on this occasion. The Bill proposed to give large powers to the Governor General of India in Council; such powers as the House should not delegate to anyone.

MR. PARNELL objected to the House going into Committee. He thought, as the Order was an opposed one, it should not be taken at that late hour.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that the Bill was exactly the same now as it was before; it was only presented to the House now in an amended form.

MR. DILLWYN observed, that there was a Notice of Amendment down to this Bill; and, as he understood the half-past 12 o'clock Rule, this Bill should not be brought on.

Mr. Otway

MR. SPEAKER said, that the Motion to go into Committee was only taken pro forma, in order to render the Bill more acceptable to the House. He would point out to the hon. Member that the Bill was not advanced a stage by its being taken on that occasion.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Bill reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 211]; re-committed for Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT (1875) AMENDMENT (INTERMENTS) BILL.—[BILL 61.]
(Mr. Marten, Mr. Greene, Mr. Cole.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Marten.)

MR. DILLWYN trusted the third reading of the Bill would not be taken that night. The Bill was only unopposed because there had been no time to put down Notice of opposition.

MR. SPEAKER said, that as no Notice of Amendment had been put down the Bill could be taken then.

MR. DILLWYN said, that the Bill had only so recently gone through Committee that there was no opportunity to place any Amendments on the Paper.

MR. SPEAKER said, that it was open to the hon. Member to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DILLWYN moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN begged to second the Motion for the adjournment. He said, that this Bill was an exceedingly objectionable measure. The clauses of the Bill were short; but, in effect, they proposed to give to rural sanitary authorities power to construct cemeteries entirely irrespective of the wishes of the ratepayers, and then to charge the cost of such works upon the rates. He could not conceive any proposal more absurd than this. Moreover, the Bill was a retrograde one, as it went, so to speak, behind the back of the Burial Acts, and authorized the construction of burial grounds, without any unconsecrated portion being set apart for the use of Dissenters. So far, therefore, from meeting their demands, it placed them in a worse position than before. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridge had stolen a march upon them; and because he happened to leave the House a minute or two before the Bill came on yesterday, it was taken without opposition. In consequence of the Bill going through Committee so recently, there had been no time to put down any Notice to oppose it. Under these circumstances, he conceived that the Bill ought not to be pressed through the House at that hour. The ends of the Bill would be most mischievous; it was a very objectionable measure, and would give enormous powers to the local authorities.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. BARING thought that, considering the great attention the hon. and learned Member had paid to the subject of interments, which he had made his own for many years, he ought at least to have been careful to see what Bills were going on with reference to the matter. Under the circumstances, the House owed him no special consideration.

MR. CALLAN trusted that, after the long discussion they had had that night, this Bill would not then be taken. He was under the impression that the half-past 12 Rule applied, unless the day after a Bill was taken a Notice of Amendment appeared on the Paper; but, in this case, no hon. Member had any opportunity of placing a Motion for the rejection of the Bill upon the Paper; and, as that had been the case, he thought that the half-past 12 Rule ought to apply.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the hon. Member wished him to refer to the half-past 12 Rule he would do so. The third reading of that Bill had been fixed for that day, and no Notice of Amendment had been given. Under those circumstances, he was bound to rule that the regulation in question did not apply, and that the Bill could be taken then.

MR. MONK would be obliged if the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten) would explain the nature of this Bill. The Bill had passed through Committee without a single observation being made respecting it; and when the hon. and learned Member asked that it might be read a third time, he should, at least, tell the House something about it.

MR. MARTEN said, that private Members had so few opportunities of passing their measures that he trusted the House would take the third reading of this Bill on that occasion. He entirely disclaimed any intention of smuggling the Bill through the House, and had only taken advantage of such opportunities as fell in his way. He might say that the Bill was supported by the hon. and learned Member for Penryn (Mr. Cole).

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN remarked that the hon. and learned Member for Penryn (Mr. Cole) had told him that he entirely disapproved of the measure.

MR. MARTEN said, that he had conversed with the hon. and learned Member for Penryn (Mr. Cole), and, so far as he knew, he approved of this Bill. It was merely a Bill to enable the sanitary authorities, in certain cases, if they thought fit, to provide cemeteries. There was an absolute necessity at the present moment for a machinery to enable the ordinary sanitary authorities in certain cases to provide for the interment of particular persons, in the same way that they now had to provide mortuaries. In fact, it was simply a Bill enabling the sanitary authorities to make provisions for the public health. He trusted that the House would now proceed to the third reading.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 15; Noes 43: Majority 28.—(Div. List, No. 129.)

Original Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. CALLAN said, that after a prolonged debate, extending from 4 o'clock that evening, of more important matters, this Bill was now pressed on in spite of a most determined opposition. No real legislation could be done by victories snatched like this. He begged to move that the House do now adjourn.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion, being of opinion that the Bill was one which required further discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Callan.)

Mr. Monk

SIR WILFRID LAWSON did not think that the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge had been wrong in taking advantage of every opportunity which he had to bring on this Bill. It was a matter of great difficulty to private Members to bring their legislation to this stage; and he did not think that the hon. and learned Member should be blamed for wishing his Bill to be taken then. When the hon. and learned Member had steered safely through all the shoals and got safely to that point, it was rather hard to ask him to give up the fruits of his perseverance. Perhaps the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) was jealous of an interference with a matter which he might think belonged entirely to himself. He would point out to him that there was nothing ecclesiastical in this Bill.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle was perfectly right in saying that there was nothing ecclesiastical about this Bill; it was only a Bill which made better provision for the health of the people.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN thought they were entitled to have the opinion of the Government upon this measure. He doubted whether the Government had read through this Bill; and before it passed the third reading, he thought the House should know what their opinion of it was.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he had been asked his opinion, and he would give it very shortly. He had read the Bill through carefully, and he could not conceive that anyone could, by any possibility, object to it. It simply did this—it gave the local authority facilities for having cemeteries if they wished to have them. There was nothing ecclesiastical in the Bill; it only enabled the local authorities to take more powers in respect to sanitary matters. He could not conceive any possible objection there could be to the Bill.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 45: Majority 35.—(Div. List, No. 130.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MOTION.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. SALT moved for leave to bring in a Bill to make better provision for the adjustment of Parish Boundaries, and to make further Amendments in the Acts relating to the relief of the poor in England.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was surprised at the introduction of this Bill. The hon. Member who had asked leave to bring in the Bill was perfectly well aware that the recommendations of the Committee upon which this Bill was said to have been founded applied to the Three Kingdoms. Many weeks ago, he received a promise that legislation in this matter affecting Ireland should take place this Session. If the Government was so anxious to transact what was called the Business of Parliament, why did they leave Ireland and Scotland out of the proposed legislation? He should take the earliest opportunity on a future occasion, when there was a fuller House, of explaining what he could not but regard as the very extraordinary conduct of the Government in this matter.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to make better provision for the adjustment of Parish Boundaries, and to make further amendments in the Acts relating to the relief of the Poor in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SALT and Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 212.]

SUPPLY.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That a sum, not exceeding £500,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay off and discharge Exchequer Bonds that will become due and payable on the 29th day of June 1879.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March

VOL. CCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

1880, the sum of £6,567,023 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

MUNGRET AGRICULTURAL SCHOOL, &c.

BILL.

On Motion of Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY, Bill to enable the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with the assent of Her Majesty's Treasury, to vary the trusts of the Mungret Agricultural School and Model Farm, in the county of Limerick, ordered to be brought in by Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY, Mr. SYNAN, and Mr. GABBETT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 213.]

PETROLEUM ACT (1871) AMENDMENT

BILL.

On Motion of Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY, Bill to continue and amend "The Petroleum Act, 1871," ordered to be brought in by Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY and Mr. Secretary CROSS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 214.]

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, 20th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—

Public Health Act (1875) Amendment (Interments) * (123).

Committee—Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.) * (94); Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.) * (103).

Report—Prosecution of Offences * (121).

Third Reading—Racecourses (Metropolis) * (45); Omnibus Regulation * (117); Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal * (77); Hares (Ireland) * (89); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.) * (96); Local Government Provisional Orders (Aysgarth Union, &c.) * (104), and passed.

ARMY ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE—THE MEMBERS.

VISCOUNT BURY said, it might be convenient to their Lordships that he should announce the names of the Members of the Committee on Army Organization. They were—General Lord Airey, General Lord Napier of Magdala, General Sir J. Lintorn A. Simmons, Lieutenant General the Earl of Longford, Lieutenant General Sir Patrick M'Dougall, Lieutenant General Armstrong, Lieutenant General Sir Henry Norman, Major General Sir Archibald Alison, Colonel Saunders, R.A., Colonel Hutton, and Colonel Bigge. The Secretary was Colonel Clive.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—HOUR OF MEETING FOR PUBLIC BUSINESS.

RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the Sittings of Public Business should commence at 4 P.M. instead of 5 P.M.”

said, that the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Midleton), in moving a similar Resolution last Session—the debate on which was still fresh in their Lordships' memory—had explained the subject in detail, and it would not be necessary for him (the Earl of Dunraven), therefore, to speak at any length upon it now. The noble Viscount commenced by saying that the Sittings of this House divided themselves into three heads; an arrangement which, though it sounded somewhat peculiar, was so convenient that he would follow the same plan. The Sittings of their Lordships' House naturally fell into three classes. It not unfrequently happened that the House, having little Business before it, passed through that little quickly, and rose about half-past 5 or 6 o'clock. He saw nothing to be ashamed of in that respect. Provided the House got through its work well, there could be no reason why it should not get through it quickly. It would greatly conduce to the convenience of the House, on those occasions, if the House met at 4 o'clock and rose at half-past 4 or at 5, rather than meet at 5 and rise at half-past 5 or 6 o'clock. The former hour would be more suitable to Members serving on Select Committees, because those Committees adjourned at 4 o'clock, and noble Lords could hardly be expected to wait about for an hour on the chance that some interesting discussion might arise in the House. It would be more convenient, also, to the House in general, and would induce a larger attendance of Peers. It was not always possible to tell, by looking at the Notice Paper, whether anything of interest would come before the House, because discussions of considerable importance sometimes arose spontaneously, on the moment, and without any public Notice; and he felt sure many noble Lords would come down on the chance of any important debate arising, provided they felt that by doing so they would not, if disappointed, lose the entire afternoon. By meeting at 4 o'clock, there would be plenty of time, during the summer season, for their Lordships to ride or take exercise of any kind, to take advantage of trains leaving town at a convenient hour, or to go to outdoor places of amusement, when nothing of interest took place in the House; and in winter or spring, which was the same thing, only worse, they could console themselves, for lack of work, by the society of their friends at the most sociable hour of the day—5 o'clock. The present system was a direct premium on absenteeism. If it had been deemed advisable to weed out of the House all those Peers who were not resolutely determined to devote themselves to political life, no better plan could have been devised than to fix the hour of meeting for Business as it was at present fixed. Then there were the intermediate days on which unpremeditated debates arose which lasted till dinner-time, or discussions arising on important matters after due Notice, which never lasted beyond the same mystic hour. In fact, “the tocsin of the soul, the dinner-bell,” tolled the knell of all debates in that House unless an important Division was expected, or some matter of vital interest to the Empire was under discussion. The extra hour before dinner-time which would be gained would be of the greatest use in these cases. It would allow of a reasonable amount of discussion on important topics, and the House would be able to pay more deliberate attention to the details of Bills in Committee. An hour did not represent a great lapse of time, but, practically speaking, it doubled the time at the disposal of the House. It would be a great advantage to all Members, and more especially to those who had the misfortune to have committed the “atrocious crime of being young men.” He did not mean specially young in years, but young in the House. Many of them had to get all their experience in the House. They were in the lamentable position of being recruits delegated to the Reserves not only after short and inadequate service, but without any active service whatever. On occasions of great debates there was no difficulty in keeping a House to a late hour. But these occasions were rare; like angels' visits, they were "few and far between." The House sat till a late hour perhaps three or four times in a Session. On those occasions, no doubt, the more inexperienced Members were better employed in admiring the eloquence and listening to the opinions of certain noble Lords than in endeavouring to give utterance to their own thoughts; but it would be well if they could have some chance of joining in those debates, and an extra hour before dinner, by giving more time for the first two or three great speeches, might afford some opportunity for a little desultory firing during the dinner-time before the principal forces were again got into position after that hour. He was sorry to mention the dinner-hour so often, because it sounded as if their Lordships were especially fond of that entertainment. That idea was, of course, absurd. Their Lordships were always ready to subordinate their comfort to the public welfare on great occasions. But it was perfectly natural that the dinner-hour should form a legitimate boundary to the ordinary labours of the day. It would be easier to obtain the attendance of members of any assembly between the hours of 4 and 7.30 than between the hours of 5 and 8.30. The circumstances of the two Houses of Parliament were so different, it was useless to compare them. Besides, noble Lords were, no doubt, unselfishly anxious to avoid the social sin of being late for dinner. He believed the change would be to the convenience of society and of the House as a whole, with the possible exception of the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor). If it were a mere matter of personal convenience, he had no doubt that the noble and learned Lord would rise in his place and clamour to sacrifice himself to the general good; but, possibly, he thought of Lord Chancellors in the abstract, and of the legal business. The House might sit for appeals at 10 o'clock in the morning—and in doing so it would meet at the hour which all the Courts in the country met at. But if grave legal difficulties existed, he maintained that afforded no argument against the contemplated change—that was no reason why the House should lose an atom of its usefulness or sacrifice its convenience;

but it did show cause why some change should be made as to the Speakership of the House. The House was its own Speaker—an anomalous state of things which had advantages, but which might lead to strange results. It was obvious that any Party in a majority might prevent the minority from ever speaking at all. That was not likely ever to be more than a theoretical possibility; but there were other objections. He would not mention them, as that was not actually the point in question. All he wished to say was that it would be better to alter the system than continue it to the detriment of the House. He did not believe it would be necessary to alter the system, because if the House sat for legal business at 10 o'clock, the Lord Chancellor could take his seat at half-past 4, or a quarter of an hour after the regular Business would commence. Surely the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees might occupy the Woolsack for those 15 minutes? And in cases where a Committee of the Whole House was the First Order of the Day there might be a Deputy Speaker or Chairman chosen. Those occasions occurred about 10 times in a Session. It would be necessary to have a Deputy Chairman for two hours and a-half each Session. He asked if such a small matter should weigh against the convenience of the whole House? He believed the alteration in the hour of assembling would increase the usefulness and add to the dignity of the proceedings of their Lordships' House.

Moved to resolve, That, in the opinion of this House, the Sittings for Public Business should commence at 4 P.M. instead of 5 P.M.—(The Earl of Dunraven.)

VISCOUNT MIDLETON, in supporting the Motion of the noble Earl, said, the experience of their Lordships was in his favour of the proposed change. When brought a similar Motion forward last Session, his noble Friend at the head of the Government met it by statistics. Now, he found that in 1877 the House met 93 times and adjourned on 49 occasions before 6 o'clock. Last Session, it met 103 times and rose before 6 o'clock on only 47 occasions. Noble Lords left the building when the Select Committees adjourned and did not come back. On one occasion he met a noble Lord going home, and, on his asking him whether he intended to return, he said he had been serving on a Committee and was too exhausted to do so. It was obvious that if the House had been sitting he would have gone into it. The present arrangement for meeting had the effect of shutting out any discussion on the part of independent Peers, and confining the debates exclusively to Ministers and ex-Ministers. In the present Session, when the Afghan debate was about to be adjourned, his noble Friend at the head of the Government moved that the House should meet at 4 P.M. on the following day. The result was that the debate was resumed at that hour, and kept up until half-past 3 on the morning following. Acting on that precedent, he (Viscount Midleton) moved that the Zulu debate be resumed at 4 in the afternoon; but the Lord Chancellor said that an important appeal case would be interfered with by that arrangement, and the Prime Minister suggested that such a Motion ought not to be made without Notice. He did not press his Motion. Consequently, the debate was resumed at a quarter-past 5 and brought to a close at 12. Only 11 noble Lords took part in the debate, of whom seven were, or had been, Cabinet Ministers, two had been, or were, Under Secretaries of State, and one had been a permanent Under Secretary of State. On the occasion of the discussion of the Bill for Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister the debate ended by a quarter to 8, only three-quarters of an hour having been devoted to it after the noble Lord who had charge of the measure moved the second reading. When the Duke of Argyll brought forward the foreign policy of the Government, the dinner-hour approached before the noble Earl at the head of the Government could address their Lordships, and even his ability and eloquence could not keep a good attendance. The system of pairing was not in vogue in their Lordships' House, as it was in the House of Commons, and, therefore, noble Lords could not leave the House for a short time without running the risk of finding the Division taken before their return. The practical difficulties which it had been suggested were in the way of an earlier meeting could easily be surmounted. When noble Lords holding Office, or those who had done so, wished to address the House, no private Member with any decency could take part in the debate. There were three classes to be considered in this change. First, the officials, who would be placed in no worse position by such a change as that proposed than their colleagues in the House of Commons. With regard to the Lord Chancellor, who was the hardest-worked man in the House, he could be relieved by one or more Deputy Speakers, and he believed that any loss of dignity which might arise from such a course would be more than balanced by its convenience; and then, thirdly, with regard to the independent Members on both sides of the House and the leading Members of the Opposition, such a change as that proposed would be in their favour. Moreover, by the proposed change, younger Members of their Lordships' House would be listened to without impatience.

LORD ZOUCHE supported the Motion. In these days, when every institution must expect to be freely criticized, their Lordships' House should endeavour to do more legislative Business. Under the present system, the opportunities given to independent Members to express their opinions were almost nil; and, if by meeting earlier their Lordships were enabled to give more time to practical Business, the legislation of the House must be improved. Why, he asked, was it that all the work was thrown on the shoulders of one House and none on the other, but simply because there was no time given in their Lordships' House for transacting it before the dinner-hour? It was becoming more and more necessary that there should be an independent Chamber to check the Business that was not properly considered in the House of Commons. What was the use of that House, if they had no work to do? No less an authority than Mr. Gladstone had stated a few nights since, on the occasion of the debate on Indian finance, that the reason why a measure of such vast importance had not received its proper consideration was that the pressure of Business in the House of Commons was so great that there was not time enough for deliberate debate, even on questions of so grave a character. Of course, he (Lord Zouche) did not mean that the House of Lords would be competent to legislate on money Bills; but there was a large amount of intermediate Business which, if the House met an hour earlier, the less known Members of the House might usefully deal with.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN expressed a hope that the Motion would be adopted. Those of their Lordships who attended the House regularly knew that on many occasions their Lordships had not adequate time to consider the intermediate class of Business that came before them. About a quarter to 7 o'clock the House became uneasy, and at 7 o'clock noble Lords who rose to address it alluded to the lateness of the hour and apologized for intruding. There was, in consequence, a general feeling that if a noble Lord wished to make a speech, he ought to be as quick as possible about it. It was said that noble Lords must get their dinners; but, then, when they had got their dinners, they did not return. The consequence was, that matters under discussion were left to the Lord Chancellor, a Minister or two, and such few Peers who might remain in the House. The debate last night did not commence until 7 o'clock. The consequence was, that one of the most important questions that could be brought before it—the great subject of Indian Finance—was debated in a thin House. At the magic hour of 7 the House consisted of about 12 Peers, and, at one time, if their Lordships had come to a Division, he was afraid it would have been found that their number had dwindled down to nine; and, at its conclusion, the audience consisted of the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), the noble Lord at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale), and himself—

THE EARL OF LONGFORD rose to Order. The question was the meeting of the House at 4 o'clock, and not last night's debate.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he was strictly in Order, inasmuch as the circumstance which he had stated showed that if the House had met at 4 instead of 5 o'clock, his noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook) would have delivered his speech to a full instead of an empty House. He would ask their Lordships to imagine what would be the feelings of "the intelligent foreigner" who, after watching the lengthened proceedings of the House of Commons, should compare its diligence with the time devoted by their Lordships to such important questions as that to which he had referred?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My noble Friend who has addressed us with so much ability asks us what would be the feelings of a stranger if he had entered the House for the first time last night, when we were deliberating on Indian Finance. I can only say, that if a stranger had been here for the first time to-night, he would naturally have supposed that there was a plethora of business, that we were labouring under arrears, and that the most extreme measures must be taken at once in order that we should have time and opportunity to contend with the mass of affairs with which we are, unfortunately, so incommoded. My noble Friend (Lord Zouche), in the ingenious remarks addressed to us, was not very happy in his illustration. He said that it was one of the grievances of this House, which might ultimately be productive of injurious consequences, that we could not have debates on such subjects as Indian Finance. Now, the fact is that last night we had a debate on Indian Finance, and I am quite sure, if my noble Friend had addressed us on that subject with as much ability as he has done to-night, he would have received the utmost attention. But where was he? My noble Friend (Viscount Middleton) made reference to the Zulu debate. Now, it so happens that when Notice was given of bringing forward that subject, I, remembering the complaints that had been made of opportunities not being afforded to our younger Members for discussion, though I did not think those complaints well founded, took some pains to secure that there should be an adequate debate. I communicated with several Members of the House on both sides, in order to ascertain whether they desired to take part in the debate, expressing a hope that they would do so. Well, some of them did announce to me that they would participate in the discussion, and I looked forward with great confidence to the debate being sustained in a manner which would have done honour to the House. But I regret to say that when the opportunity came, and when I looked round, on the one side, for those who were to attack the policy of the Government, and, on the other, for those who were to buckle on their armour in its defence, no champions appeared. With regard to one of those noble Friends—who is capable of addressing us with power, and of whom I have had experience in the other House of Parliament—upon him I particularly counted. I had received what I regarded, of course, under a misapprehension, as a positive assurance that I might depend upon his taking part in the debate. Many were the messages sent, and many were the means taken to find out where my noble Friend was, but he could not be found. But, when I was on my legs, winding up the debate, what was my astonishment when I turned round and saw my noble Friend returning to the House in that peculiar costume which denotes the festive hour. A noble Earl seemed to think that the present hour of meeting is particularly inconvenient as regards those noble Lords who are serving on Select Committees. The Members of Committees labour during the morning in a manner the industry and efficiency of which are universally admitted; and it is refreshing to call to mind that the House of Lords has some virtues, when so many of its own Members are attacking its proceedings. The noble Earl complained that it was a great inconvenience that a Member serving on a Committee should not be able to proceed at 4 o'clock to his place in the House. My noble Friend who seconded the Motion (Viscount Midleton) completed the picture. He gave an instance—and as Sterne observes there is nothing like an individual instance, and that a solitary captive gave him the true idea of slavery, so my noble Friend met a Friend who had just left a Committee, and remonstrated with him for going away and not attending the debate. But the Friend said—"I cannot agree with your proposition that we should attend the House at 4 o'clock, because I am entirely exhausted." So the great grievance, therefore, is that we are not forcing exhausted Members to take part in our debates. I know very well that it is considered a great advantage by many noble Lords, that between the conclusion of the Committees and the commencement of the debate there should be an opportunity for Members to have some air and exercise, and then they return with renovated energies to the performance of their duties. During this debate we have had a great many remarks on the necessity of dining. One would really suppose that it was peculiar to the House of Lords that they could not go on without their dinners, and that Members of the other House of Parliament sacrificed their meals without compunction. I know that what takes place in the House of Commons—what is brought forward as a model for us to imitate—is not very different from what takes place here. It is just as difficult to keep a House there during the dinner-hour as it is here. The Members of the House of Commons, inferior beings as they are, do dine, and they do so with the mortifying results which have been described with so much vigour as if they were peculiar characteristics of the Senate of England. Unfortunately, last evening, the House was not so full as might have been desired, and some of my Colleagues, who possess much experience and eloquence, had not an audience numerically worthy of the occasion; but I understand, from the usual sources of intelligence, that on a late occasion, when the same question—the Finances of India—was under consideration in "another place," and when the House was addressed by a Member of great Indian experience, and who is an effective speaker, and afterwards by the great master of eloquence in this age, the attendance did not exceed four Members. Therefore, your Lordships' House gains by the comparison, because, on the showing of the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown), we had at all periods of the previous evening a much larger attendance than that. He admits that there were nine Peers who sacrificed their dinners, and sat throughout the debate. Before your Lordships come to the conclusion which the noble Earl the Mover of the Resolution recommends, your Lordships have to consider something more than the convenience of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. Your Lordships must remember, a few years ago, when there was a prospect of your being deprived of your judicial powers, you very properly resented that attempt, and you vindicated and preserved your privileges as the great Court of the Kingdom. A Bill was introduced which secured those privileges, and constructed on a larger scale the machinery by which those great duties should be fulfilled. That included a number of Peers of eminence, who formed a body for judicial functions. It is well to consider whether it is desirable that this considerable number of Members should be called upon to commence their Parliamentary duties without the slightest interval for refreshment or repose. Again, I venture to make another remark on behalf of those whose case has never been stated to the House. I mean the Ministers of the Crown. The Business of the country is increasing every day, and it is extremely difficult for those who fill the great Offices of State to keep pace with the demand on their time and attention. But it may be said that the Ministers who are Members of the House of Commons have to attend there at an earlier hour. The pressure of Public Business in the House of Commons is so extreme that it must be met in the manner most conducive to its discharge; but all who have been Ministers know that the hour from 4 to 5 is most precious for the performance of Business, and it is highly desirable that the time which the Members of the Administration possess should be curtailed as little as possible. Some of the great Departments of the State are filled by persons who are Members of your Lordships' House. Of late years this has been the case to a greater extent than before. I myself fill an Office of constant care and labour. The Secretaries of State for more than one Public Department have seats in this House, and men who have experience of those Offices will tell your Lordships that it is a great boon to a Minister—like the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, for instance—to have the hour from 4 to 5 at his disposal. Even a Minister who rises early can scarcely expect to get well to his work before 11 o'clock, considering the immense mass of correspondence with which he has first to deal. There are then five or six hours, some portion of which must be given to refreshment and exercise, and it is, therefore, an object of importance to a man thus situated that he should have that hour of leisure which hitherto the House of Lords has so conveniently afforded him. These are considerations which, in my opinion, ought to have some degree of weight with your Lordships in coming to a decision on the question before you. The issue, I may add, has been entirely changed during the progress of the discussion; and the fact that the House met at 4, instead of 5 o'clock, would not at all remove the evils on which one or two of the noble Lords who spoke in the debate dilated. The House is asked to make this considerable change, not because it has work which it cannot get through—not because there is a large amount of arrears of Business—but because, in reality, we have not as much work as we can do, and on frequent occasions we have had to adjourn for lack of work. In these circumstances it is, that it is proposed that the whole judicial body of the House shall be disturbed—that the time of leisure most valuable to Ministers shall be curtailed—that Deputy Speakers shall be appointed—and that machinery of a colossal kind shall be set up. One would naturally suppose that the House of Lords were overwhelmed, and in despair with the Business crowding their Table, and that you were inventing this comprehensive and colossal machinery for the purpose of encountering the difficulty. Under all the circumstances of the case, I hope your Lordships will not assent to the Motion.

The Earl of Beaconsfield

EARL GRANVILLE said, that as he had spoken on this question when it was last brought before the House, he should not trespass on their Lordships' time at any length upon the present occasion. He agreed with the noble Earl who had just sat down, that the House was not overwhelmed with a plethora of Business—he scarcely remembered a Session in which it had so little to occupy its time as the present. As to the young Peers, he thought it was most desirable they should be afforded the opportunity of speaking; but he could not help adding that he thought they might create more frequent opportunities of doing so for themselves. Many of the young Members of the House might find the occasion for addressing their Lordships if they would only take the initiative, and he hoped they would do so more frequently in the future. He had no doubt, however, that it operated as a great discouragement to them to have to speak when the House was looking forward to breaking up. Whether they were likely to be much encouraged by the charming raillery of the Prime Minister, and whether they would not probably deem it better to postpone their speeches until he had spoken, he would not say. But be that as it might, he, for one, should be glad to see them afford the House more frequent opportunities for admiring the ability which they undoubtedly possessed. As far as he could make out, the young Peers were in favour of the proposed change, and it was one, therefore, which was likely to be again brought under their Lordships' notice. He was glad that on the present occasion the proposal had enabled the noble Earl opposite to correct some exaggerated notions which seemed to have gone forth to the public as to their Lordships' anxiety about the dinner-hour. It was not a peculiarity of the Members of the House of Lords to desire to dine. That was a most laudable desire, which was fully shared in "another place." What happened, generally speaking, was that while there was no Assembly more willing to assist at an important debate, yet when a prolonged conversation occurred in which the great majority did not intend to speak, and there was no question of a Division, many of their Lordships, having previously made their arrangements, naturally did not care to postpone them. He was, therefore, disposed to think that the change which was suggested might be found of use in giving time for the transaction of what might be called "intermediate Business," and he certainly had heard no argument from the Prime Minister to show it would not be an advantage to the House in its political character to have the additional hour before dinner for the purpose. As to the judicial argument, he would observe that he had always thought it hard that the Lord Chancellor, who had Judicial as well as Ministerial duties to perform, should be obliged to remain in the House throughout the evening in a way in which no other Peer was required to do; and he would remind the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven), that the suggestion of appointing a Deputy Speaker was not a new one, as he seemed to suppose; nor could he, for one, see any objection to returning to the practice of appointing such an officer, so that the Lord Chancellor might be relieved, not only between the hours of 4 and 5, but more frequently, from duties which must be very irksome to a man who was so hard worked. As to the members of the Judicial Body generally, he did not think they shared in the wish to have the additional hour at their disposal. His noble and learned Friend Lord Selborne, for instance, stated last year that he thought the proposed change would be exceedingly desirable. As regarded the Ministers, he agreed with the noble Earl that they were, for the most part, overworked—especially in the House of Commons, where they had more to go through than almost any human being could endure. The same remark, however, did not apply with equal force to those Ministers who had seats in their Lordships' House, who had no such extravagant demands made upon their time, and whom there would be nothing to prevent from returning to their Offices on many evenings if the House were to meet at 4. He did not think, therefore, the Ministerial objections ought to be allowed to stand in the way of the change, and he should be happy to support the Motion of his noble Friend.

Earl Granville

On Question? Their Lordships' divided:—Contents 64; Not-Contents 101: Majority 37.

CONTENTS.

Westminster, D.	Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.)
Lansdowne, M.	Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
Ripon, M.	Carlingford, L.
Airlie, E.	Carysfort, L. (E. Carysfort.)
Camperdown, E.	Clements, L. (E. Leictrim.)
[Teller.]	Clermont, L.
Carnarvon, E.	Conyers, L.
Cowper, E.	Cottesloe, L.
Denbigh, E.	Crewe, L.
Fortescue, E.	Crofton, L.
Granville, E.	Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.)
Grey, E.	Emly, L.
Ilchester, E.	Foley, L.
Kimberley, E.	Granard, L. (E. Granard.)
Lovelace, E.	Hare, L. (E. Lis-towel.)
Morley, E.	Houghton, L.
Morton, E.	Inchiquin, L.
Northbrook, E.	Keane, L.
Onslow, E.	Kenry, L. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)
Powis, E.	[Teller.]
Romney, E.	Leconfield, L.
Rosse, E.	Monson, L.
Shaftesbury, E.	Mostyn, L.
Spencer, E.	Oranmore and Browne, L.
Sydney, E.	Ribblesdale, L.
Canterbury, V.	Sandhurst, L.
Cardwell, V.	Somerton, L. (E. Normanton.)
Gordon, V. (E. Aberdeen.)	Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
Leinster, V. (D. Leinster.)
Portman, V.
Powerscourt, V.
Aberdare, L.
Blachford, L.

Strafford, L. (V. Enfield.) Sudeley, L.
Stratheden and Camp- Waveney, L.
bell, L. Zouche of Haryngworth, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Canterbury, L. Archp.	Avoland, L.
Cairns, E. (L. Chan- cellor.)	Bagot, L.
	Balfour of Burley, L.
Bedford, D.	Blantyre, L.
Northumberland, D.	Bolton, L.
Richmond, D.	Braybrooke, L.
Wellington, D.	Castlemaine, L.
	Clanbrassill, L. (E. Roden.)
Abercorn, M. (D. Aber- corn.)	Clinton, L.
Abergavenny, M.	Clonbrock, L.
Ailesbury, M.	Cloncurry, L.
Bristol, M.	Colville of Culross, L.
Salisbury, M.	Colville of Culross, L.
	De Mauley, L.
	de Ros, L.
	De Saumarez, L.
Amherst, E.	Dunsandle and Clan- conal, L.
Annesley, E.	Forbes, L.
Bathurst, E.	Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
Beaconsfield, E.	Gerard, L.
Beauchamp, E.	Gordon of Drumearn, L.
Belmore, E.	Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)
Bradford, E.	Grey de Radcliffe, L.
Cadogan, E.	(V. Grey de Wilton.)
Clonmell, E.	Hammond, L.
Coventry, E.	Hampton, L.
Dartrey, E.	Harlech, L.
Devon, E.	Hartismere, L. (L. Hen- niker.)
Ducie, E.	Hylton, L.
Dundonald, E.	Kenlis, L. (M. Head- fort.)
Ellesmere, E.	Moore, L. (M. Drog- heda.)
Hardwicke, E.	Norton, L.
Jersey, E.	Oxenfoord, L. (E. Stair.)
Lanesborough, E.	Penrhyn, L.
Lucan, E.	Raglan, L.
Manvers, E.	Rivers, L.
Mar and Kellie, E.	Robartes, L.
Nelson, E.	Romilly, L.
Ravensworth, E.	Saltersford, L. (E. Cour- town.)
Redesdale, E.	Saltoun, L.
Saint Germans, E.	Silchester, L. (E. Long- ford.)
Selkirk, E.	Skelmersdale, L.
Somers, E.	[Teller.]
Stanhope, E.	Strathspey, L. (E. Sea- field.)
Stradbroke, E.	Templemore, L.
Strange, E. (D. Athol.)	Tollemache, L.
Tankerville, E.	Tredegar, L.
Verulam, E.	Truro, L.
Waldegrave, E.	Walsingham, L.
Wilton, E.	Winmarleigh, L.
	Wynford, L.
Clancarty, V. (E. Clan- carty.)
Cranbrook, V.
Hardinge, V.
Hawarden, V. [Teller.]
Hood, V.
Melville, V.
Airey, L.
Ashford, L. (V. Bury.)

Resolved in the Negative.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 20th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—Resolutions [June 19] reported.
WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—
Resolution [June 19] reported.
PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Consolidated Fund (No. 4) *.
Select Committee—Report—Tramways Orders
Confirmation [No. 241].
Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation
[88]—R.P.
Considered as amended—Sale of Food and Drugs
Act (1875) Amendment * [139]; Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment * [181], debate adjourned.
Third Reading—Marriages Confirmation (Her Majesty's Ships) * [149], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE GLOUCESTERSHIRE MILITIA.

QUESTIONS.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether orders have been given for the removal of the Royal North Gloucester Regiment of Militia from Cirencester to Horfield; whether his attention has been called to the unsuitable character of Horfield as a place for the training and accommodation of troops, when compared with that of Cirencester, where they now enjoy exceptional advantages; and, whether he is willing to cause further inquiry to be made into the respective advantages of the two places as head quarters, and will direct that the issue of orders for the removal of the regiment should in the meantime be suspended?

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering that the clay field in which the Royal South Gloucester Militia were encamped in May last at Horfield is ill suited for the combined purposes of a camp and drill ground, it is intended to accommodate the regiment next training with quarters in the barracks or to provide it with a more healthy and suitable camping ground?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that new training-places for the Gloucestershire Militia had been selected in pursuance of the localization scheme adopted some seven years ago, and it would not be easy to make a change without very considerable inquiry. The encamping ground at Horfield was not in a very good state; but it was intended to drain it and make it more healthy. He could not promise that this improvement should be carried out at once; but if his official duties would permit him to do so, he should shortly take the opportunity of going to see the ground for himself.

MR. J. R. YORKE gave Notice that he should call attention to the subject on going into Committee of Supply.

EGYPT—ABDICATION OF THE KHEDIVE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY: I have placed a Question upon the Paper in reference to Egypt to the following effect:—

“To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether Her Majesty’s Government have received any information confirming the report that the French Consul General had waited on the Khedive to announce the intention of France to demand his abdication; and, whether such step, if taken, was taken with the concurrence of Her Majesty’s Government;”

and, with the permission of the House, I wish to make an extension of it. In the first place, I do not propose, as represented in the Question, to put it to the Foreign Secretary, but to his Representative in this House—my hon. Friend the Under Secretary, to whom I have given private Notice of my intention. In doing so, I shall endeavour to confine myself strictly to the Rules of the House, for the extension I wish to make expresses no opinion, contains no argument, and states only facts. Intelligence has recently been received in this country of a very startling character. This intelligence has been given both in the English and in the French papers, and it varies somewhat in the accounts which are given. But suffice it generally to say that a statement in the English papers has been made to this effect—that the French Consul General in Egypt has waited in uniform upon the semi-independent Sovereign of that country and demanded his deposition, or, as it is afterwards qualified by another account, has demanded his abdication in favour of his son, Prince Tewfik, promising him, at the same time, a Civil List, should he accede to the French demand. Now, I should say that another telegram states that the Sultan of Turkey has expressed his approbation of this step, and his opinion that Prince Halim, now resident in Paris, should succeed in the room of the present Khedive. The Questions I desire to ask my hon. Friend in consequence of this intelligence are—Firstly, has this step been taken at all by the official Representative of France in Egypt; and, if so, has it been taken with the cognizance and concurrence of the Representative of England in that country? Has the approbation and concurrence of the Sultan been obtained towards this step; and, are the views of the other Powers of Europe, who are connected with us in the present engagements with regard to Egypt—are those Powers of Europe also cognizant, and do they concur with the step? Then, Sir, has any promise whatever been made that, in the event of the Khedive abdicating and Prince Tewfik succeeding, the Civil List in its present extent, or, if not, to what extent, would be accorded to the present Khedive; and has Her Majesty’s Government given its assent generally to these proceedings, if I have correctly stated them, and, especially, to this promise of a Civil List to be accorded to the Khedive in case of his abdication in favour of Prince Tewfik?

MR. BOURKE: I do not think any person can be surprised that my hon. Friend (Mr. Otway) is anxious to obtain official information of an authentic character with respect to the subjects he has just mentioned to the House, and which have been the subject of many statements in various newspapers within the last few days. But I have already informed the House that negotiations on all those very important subjects which he has mentioned are in progress between the Powers, and therefore it is impossible for me—or I would rather say that negotiations with respect to Egypt are in progress between the Powers—and therefore it is impossible for me, following the precedents of a similar character, and also acting in accordance with the public interests, to make any statement in regard to the inquiries which have been made.

MR. CHILDERS: I hope I may be allowed to follow up the Question of my hon. Friend by an appeal to the Government on the points which have been raised, and by asking a further Question. [Cries of "Move!"] I am always reluctant to take that step; but if it is necessary, I will do so. For the present, however, I will not take the course of moving the adjournment of the House, and will confine my remarks to the Question I intend to ask. The Question I wish to ask is this—Whether, under the circumstances of our not having had any Papers on the affairs of Egypt during the last six months, when a Question is asked, not as to negotiations, but as to public acts going on in a country our relations with which are of so important a character as our relations with Egypt, that when my hon. Friend asks a plain question of fact—namely, whether the Consul General of France has made certain official communications to the Khedive of Egypt, we are to be put off with the answer that negotiations are going on, and that until those negotiations are completed the Government cannot make any statement? That may be a perfectly good rule generally, as regards anything tending to affect those negotiations; but I humbly submit to the House that it is not an answer to a plain question of fact, and I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will not give a more full answer?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I regret very much that we do not feel ourselves at the present moment in a position to make a full and complete statement to the House in regard to what has passed in reference to this matter. I feel, and the Government feels, that an imperfect statement might be both embarrassing, and might cause serious complications; and, therefore, though I say so with great regret, I feel it necessary for me to adhere to what my hon. Friend has already stated by direction of the Secretary of State—namely, that it is not in our power at the present moment to make any statement with regard to what has passed. It will be observed that the reports which have reached this country have reference distinctly to the action of the Minister of another Power. The Questions which have been put, of course, have to a certain extent reference to the action, or consent, or approval of Her Majesty's Government with regard to what has been done; but the main Question relates to the supposed action of a Minister of another Power; and I think that will at once commend itself to the House as a reason why we should be particularly careful as to making any statement specifically on the subject, without the consent of and clear understanding with the Power to which reference is made. I can only say upon this subject that active negotiations are going on, and that we are perfectly in accord with the French Government and the other Powers.

MR. OTWAY: I wish to observe, that one of the telegrams states that an English Representative, Mr. Lascelles, accompanied the French Consul General, M. Tricou, on the occasion of his interview with the Khedive, and concurred in the demand which he made. I can quite understand the reasons which my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend, have put forward. Although I am much disappointed that he is not able to inform us as to the facts, I will not press my Question further to-day. I presume, however, that my hon. Friend will have no objection to place on the Table of the House—and it is most essential that we should see it soon—a copy of the Firman by which the Khedivial rank was conferred upon Ismail Pasha.

MR. BOURKE: Certainly, there can be no objection.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL. QUESTIONS.

MAJOR DICKSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received any official information from South Africa as to whether the remains of the late lamented Prince Imperial have been forwarded to this country; and, if not, whether it is his intention to telegraph instructions on the subject?

COLONEL STANLEY: I have not myself received any such information; but, as I stated at an early hour this morning, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies has, I believe, received a telegram. The telegram sent to me simply stated that an ambulance and escort were being sent out in search of the body. My right hon. Friend has, I believe, heard by telegram from the Cape that the remains of the lamented Prince Imperial have been recovered, and that steps have been taken to forward them to this country.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, with reference to the reply of the right hon. Gentleman upon the untoward and unhappy misfortune which has befallen Prince Louis Napoleon, I wish to ask him if he can inform the House in what capacity the Prince Imperial served, and what position he held in the Army of South Africa; also if he was on the Staff of Lord Chelmsford; and if, therefore, it was by Lord Chelmsford's order, and with what view, such a small force as that with which the Prince went was sent into an enemy's country, whilst there was a Force of no less than 26,000 men massed on the frontier of Zululand?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I am not aware what position the lamented Prince occupied in connection with the Forces, and I am not aware of his having held any commission, nor am I aware of his having been attached to the Staff, although, like all the rest of the world, I was, of course, cognizant of the fact that he was with them. With regard to what the right hon. Gentleman has said about Lord Chelmsford, as to whether the Prince was sent out by his orders on the reconnoitring expedition, of that fact I am aware distinctly. Lord Chelmsford says in his despatch that he was ignorant of the fact that the Prince had been sent away with an excursion party.

INDIA — BRITISH AND PORTUGUESE INDIA—CUSTOMS UNION.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in this morning's papers, that a Treaty creating a Customs Union between the Portuguese Colonies and British India has actually passed the Portuguese Cortes, though this House has had no information whatever on the subject; and, whether the matter will be submitted to the House, or to the Legislative Council in India?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I answered this Question the other day. If the hon. Gentleman wants any further information, and will put down a Notice upon the Paper, I shall be happy to give an answer.

Colonel Stanley

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARMY REGULATION AND DISCIPLINE BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

ARREST AND TRIAL.

Arrest.

Clause 45 (Custody of persons charged with offences).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in moving as an Amendment, in page 20, line 24, after "custody," to insert—

"Provided, That in every case where in time of peace any officer remains in such military custody for a longer period than eight days without a court martial for his trial being ordered to assemble, a special report of the necessity for further delay shall be made by his commanding officer—if at Home to the Commander in Chief, if in India to the Commander in Chief in India; if in a Colony to the General Officer commanding in such Colony; and a similar report shall be forwarded every eight days until a court martial is assembled or the officer is released from custody. In the case of soldiers a similar report shall be forwarded every eight days to the General Officer commanding the Division or Colony within the limits of which the soldier shall be serving: Provided also, That no officer holding a commission from the Sovereign shall, on account of alleged misconduct, be liable to be suspended, or arrested, from the performance of the duty entrusted to him by virtue of such commission, in any other manner than that which is specified in this Act."

said, he understood from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that he intended to accept the first portion of the Amendment, and, therefore, he (Sir Alexander Gordon) need only say a few words as to the matter in which they differed. The first portion of the Amendment sought to reimpose the condition that the officer should be brought to trial within eight days. Up till the year 1866 the Articles of War contained a provision that an officer could only be kept under arrest for eight days. In that year the clause was struck out, and the time for which he was to be kept under arrest was left indefinite. The privilege so given had since that time been greatly abused. Officers had been kept two, three, four, and even six months, without being brought before a court martial, or allowed to know the offence for which they were under arrest. He proposed simply to re-enact the provisions respecting eight days, and to require, if an officer were not brought to trial within that time, that a certificate should be sent at the end of that time, and of every succeeding eight days, to explain the reason. But the part of his Amendment to which he specially wished to call attention was the last four lines, providing that no officer holding a commission from the Sovereign was, on account of alleged misconduct, to be liable to be suspended from the performance of any duties entrusted to him by virtue of such commission in any other manner than that specified in the Act. His object in this Proviso was to put a stop to a practice which had arisen since the present Commander-in-Chief took office, of suspending officers from their duty, instead of placing them under arrest. He knew it was maintained that the suspension of an officer was not recognized, and, that, therefore it need not be legislated for. It was precisely on that ground that he wished Parliament to legislate on the subject, and to express an opinion that this should not be done. He happened to have there an official Order for the suspension of an officer, and he would read it in order to show that this was a practical complaint, and that officers had been suspended from their duty when they really ought to have been put under arrest. The first Order ran as follows:—

“Lieutenant So-and-so will proceed immediately to Blank, in order to take over command of the detachment from So-and-so, who will at once return to head-quarters.”

The second Order was—

“Lieutenant So-and-so will immediately join head-quarters, his duties to be taken by Lieutenant So-and-so, pending a Court of Inquiry, which will assemble at 11 a.m. to-morrow.”

The third Order was—

“A Court of Inquiry, over which Major So-and-so is presiding, will assemble at 12 o'clock this day.”

These were official Orders published to the garrison, and known to all the people of the town where the regiment was stationed. The officer concerned had his character taken away; he was removed from his command; he was brought before a Court of Inquiry; and then, on investigation, it might be found that there was no ground whatever for preferring any charges against him. A month or six weeks after, he was allowed simply to rejoin his regiment and to resume his duty, and there was no reason given for the public censure he had received or why he was allowed to return to duty. During the remainder of his term of service, however, he was liable to have this brought up against him, and when his turn for employment or promotion came, it might be said to him, “You came before a Court of Inquiry on a certain date, how did you get out of it?” That was often the cause of misconduct and crime. An officer, fretting under an imputation of that kind, felt that an act of injustice had been done him, and he had no redress in place of being brought before a court martial, and receiving a public acquittal in a legal way, which had been the custom up to the last 25 years. He could see no case where an injury was so likely to be done to an officer than under this system. If a man were invalided, or declared sick, or unfit for duty, it was different. He hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would yet be able to give way.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was glad to accept the greater part of the Amendment. He had no doubt the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon) would give his consent to alter it in the manner he (Colonel Stanley) would suggest. It was to leave out the words “in time of peace,” and to insert, after “any officer,” &c., the words “or soldier, not on active service.” He would ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman to allow the Question to be put in this form. Then, as regarded the last paragraph, he was sure that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would be going further than he intended in inserting the words “no person should be liable to be suspended,” &c. He took, of course, the obvious case which occurred of an officer who was physically incapacitated, although he might not acknowledge that himself. He might be anxious to go on with his duties, even though he was not fit to perform them. Obviously, in such a case, the authorities ought to be able to suspend an officer; but he was informed that there was considerable doubt whether the words proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, if they were placed in an Act of Parliament, would not go further than he himself wished. Another case was where a paymaster, for instance, did not render his account to the Treasury; it would then, unquestionably, be the duty of the General Officer commanding to suspend him. He should be sorry, however, to refuse it; and if the right hon. Gentleman wished, he would accept the Amendment on the understanding that he reserved to himself the right to revise it before the Report.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he was glad that himself and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman were so much in accord upon the subject; and he just wished to say that, as to the first case suggested, he had himself said he did not propose to extend the clause to an officer who was physically unable from illness to perform his duties, or was incapacitated from performing them, but expressly restricted the provision to alleged misconduct. And then, as to the paymaster, if the paymaster failed to deliver his accounts, that, he imagined, was misconduct; but still, he would not go into the question of the Civil Departments, which were under the War Office, and not under the military authorities.

COLONEL ALEXANDER was very glad the Amendment had been accepted. Not only officers, but men, were very often kept too long under arrest; not from any intention to do injustice, but from mere procrastination. He was quite sure that the Amendment would answer the purpose required.

MR. OTWAY asked, whether it would not be necessary to make a verbal alteration. The officer in command of the troops in India was the Commander-in-Chief, but Commander-in-Chief who was General Commander-in-Chief, which was by no means an unimportant difference.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

MR. J. BROWN said, the object of the Amendment of which he had given Notice was merely to make more distinct and clear the nature of the powers given to an officer under the clause. These powers were nothing new, but they were something extraordinary, and, especially, the power given to a junior officer to put a senior officer under arrest.

Colonel Stanley

He thought it was very important that they should clearly understand that an officer had that power, whether in uniform or in plain clothes; and, therefore, he begged to move the insertion, in page 20, line 28, after the words "an officer," of the words "whether in uniform or not."

MAJOR NOLAN was not at all certain that the proposal would not complicate the question, instead of clearing it up. It was clearly laid down at present that an officer had just the same authority, whether in uniform or not; and if this matter were pressed too far, the question might arise as to whether an officer was in proper uniform. The effect of uniform merely was to be evidence that a man was an officer. If, however, these words were put in, a man might come out of a crowd and say he was an officer, and the man ordered into arrest would not be able to know whether the case came under the Statute; and he did not think the insertion of the words would answer any purpose. The clause was very clear as it stood, and he did not think the addition was necessary.

COLONEL STANLEY quite agreed with the view of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and thought that they would be trying too much if they inserted these words. After all, the question really was, whether the man knew that the person interfering was an officer or not, and that must always be a matter of proof to be decided on the court martial. It would be perfectly absurd, because an officer was not regimentally dressed—they all knew how particular a distinction might be made—to say that he was not to interpose.

COLONEL ALEXANDER also quite agreed with the view taken. Suppose, after mess, the officers changed their uniform, and adjourned to a billiard-room, where a row ensued. They were not in uniform; but was that to deter the junior officer from being able to put his senior under arrest? That was a case which might very probably occur.

GENERAL SHUTE remarked, that it was perfectly understood an officer was an officer even in his dressing-gown. In case of fire at night or such sudden emergency he might rush out of his barrack-room so attired, and it would be a very great mistake to add these words to the clause.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON hoped the Amendment would not be pressed; for it was most important that, in a fray, an officer should not be liable to be punished for disputing the order of a person in plain clothes, whom he knew nothing about. The question of officers in a mess-room, dressing-gown or not, was not a case to legislate for. He himself had an Amendment lower down, that an officer should be in uniform before he exercised the powers there given. He did not like the idea of dressing-gowns at all.

MR. J. BROWN always understood that an officer had the power; but, with the permission of the Committee, he would withdraw the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL would not wish the Amendment to be withdrawn under the idea that it was particularly understood that a junior officer in plain clothes was entitled to order his senior into arrest.

MR. BIGGAR thought it would be preposterous that a General in plain clothes, whom nobody knew anything about, should be at liberty to arrest an officer. He thought some badge of authority was necessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in moving as an Amendment, in page 20, line 31, after "an officer," to insert the words "if dressed in uniform," said, the rule requiring an officer to obey his junior in a fray was drafted years ago, when officers were always in uniform. So much was that the case, that in the Peninsular War there was not a point more insisted on by the Duke of Wellington than that officers were not only to be in uniform, but were always to wear their swords. He had stated publicly that he would take no part to protect any officer who got into trouble in plain clothes. He was not ashamed to act on these principles still, though he knew it was old-fashioned. It was now not thought fashionable for an officer to wear his uniform, and as they were legislating for the Army, he stipulated in this case that it should only have effect when the junior officer who gave an order to a senior was in uniform. Then the senior would know the responsibilities he incurred if he did not obey. When he joined the Army, officers wore their uniform at mess, and he did not understand the custom that now prevailed of putting on shooting-jackets and dressing-gowns for dinner. He went down to visit a detachment once, and after the day's duties were over, the officer in command still wore his uniform. He thought that it was in compliment to himself, and he, therefore, told him not to keep it on, unless he wished. The officer thanked him, but replied that the fact was he had got no other coat there. That took place a long time ago, when officers were not ashamed to appear in uniform.

COLONEL STANLEY was afraid he must make the same objection to this Amendment that he made to the other. They were putting into a clause that which ought to be matter of evidence before the court martial. The point was not whether the officer was in uniform or not, but whether the other person knew that he was an officer. That was not a matter to be dealt with by a clause, but a question for proof before the court martial. Take the case, for instance, of an officer going to play cricket, and, therefore, of course, not in regimental dress, seeing two of his men fighting. If he interfered, the men might tell him that they knew such conduct was against discipline, but they should not leave off, because he was not in regimental dress. He thought this seemed to be more a point for a court martial than for a Bill.

MR. BIGGAR hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon) would press the Amendment to a division. He thought officers ought to be proud of their uniform, and he did not understand why they were always so anxious to get out of it as soon as possible.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT entirely agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon). In his opinion, it would be very much better if officers did wear their uniforms, for the feeling against them arose apparently a good deal too much from what was called "shop," which was very inconsistent with the military spirit. He must point out, however, that the Amendment would really fail to accomplish the purpose in view. The hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to put pressure upon officers to wear their uniform, whereas the effect of his Amendment would be to prevent the very interference which they desired by men not in uniform. The real remedy for what his hon. and gallant Friend desired was that there should be some more stringent orders to officers to be more constantly in uniform. The Amendment would not do what was desired, and they really should exercise some pressure in order to require the uniform to be constantly worn.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that uniforms were expensive, and that it would be putting officers to a great deal of unnecessary inconvenience if they were always compelled to appear in them. Besides, no man liked to interfere; and, therefore, if only an officer who wore his uniform could interfere, officers would get into plain clothes to avoid the necessity. In his opinion, the present arrangement was by far the best, and he thought the best thing to do was to leave it as it stood.

COLONEL COLTHURST begged his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) to withdraw the Amendment. Things had worked well in the past, and they all hoped they would also do so in the future.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE was also of opinion that it would be no good, for the purposes at which they aimed, to pass this Amendment.

COLONEL ALEXANDER added, that uniforms were so much more expensive than plain clothes, that if an officer had to wear them all the year round, the expense would be three times as great as it was at present.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON replied, that if officers objected to wearing their uniforms, the remedy was to make them cheap and comfortable. When he was in India, the uniform there was so comfortable that the officers wore it in preference to plain clothes. His object was to prevent the officer or soldier getting into trouble by disputing an order given by a man in plain clothes, and of whom he knew nothing. When he was formerly in command at the Curragh a quarrel occurred between two regiments. The Commander-in-Chief, who was on the ground in plain clothes, rode amongst them, and ordered them to stop; but, as he was in plain clothes, they did not know him, and it was very nearly being an unpleasant business. As, however, his right hon. and gallant Friend did not intend to accept this Amendment, he would not press it.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. PARNELL thought there should be some distinction drawn between the powers of officers to order arrests when they were in uniform and when they were not. Suppose, for instance, two men were fighting. A plain clothes officer interfered, and one of the men struck him. By the Bill, that man would be liable to suffer death. ["No, no!"] Well, Clause 8 said so. Of course, at the time he would be in the execution of his office. They constantly would have cases where the soldier did not know the officer who was interfering, where, in consequence, he would run great risk of being insulted, and where the soldier also would be subject to very severe penalties for misconduct. He had often himself known cases where officers had distinctly refused to interfere, lest they should subject the soldiers to severe penalties, owing to their not being able to judge quickly whether the person who interfered was an officer or not. Besides, the onus of proof in this case was thrown on the negative, which was not fair. A man was asked to prove that he did not know a man was an officer; or, in fact, they asked him to prove himself innocent of an offence of which he had not been shown to be guilty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, the Amendment, if adopted, would lead to a good deal of difficulty. In the first place, as only an officer dressed in uniform was to put a man under arrest, they would have the question at once arise—What was uniform? At present, an officer could order a man into arrest, whether he was dressed in uniform or whether he was not. Of course, if an officer ordered a man into arrest, and the man did not know he was an officer, and the circumstances of the case were that it was not reasonable that he should know it, that would be taken into consideration in the decision. The whole question would be a question of proof, and all the circumstances, no doubt, would be taken into consideration by the court martial.

MR. OTWAY observed, that there was more in this matter than was supposed by the hon. and learned Attorney General. Had it not occurred to the hon. and learned Gentleman, that uniform was essentially a part of the Military Profession? They never heard of military acts being performed, except in uniform. Therefore, when they had the very extreme case of a junior officer ordering his superior officer into arrest, they ought to have some guarantee to the officer that the man who was about to treat him in that way had a right to do so. What occurred abroad in this matter was a good example. Whenever a fray took place in France or Belgium, the commissary of police always repaired at once to the place where it was said the crime had been committed; but he always first made himself and his authority respected by putting himself into a sort of uniform. No doubt, it was of a very simple character; but his position was thereby recognized, and an act sanctioned which otherwise would not have been tolerated. What surprised him in this respect was that officers in England were so very different from every other Army in the world. If they went to Austria, Italy, or Germany—and he specially mentioned those three countries—they found the officers invariably in uniform, and they never went even to a place of amusement, or a theatre, or travelled on a railway without wearing it. The fact was, they were proud of their uniform, because it was of a handsome and becoming description. At one time when he was in the Army our uniform was most uncomfortable; for the shoulders were loaded with ridiculous gold scales, with straps to their trousers, and, altogether, the dress was most disagreeable and unpleasant. Now, however, it was a very pleasant dress to wear, and he could not understand why officers did not show themselves more frequently in it than they did. He was not perfectly certain that the recommendation was one which should be altogether disregarded.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Otway) must know perfectly well that the usual occupations in which foreign officers employed their time were totally different from those in which it was the habit of officers of the English Army to engage. Foreign officers did not shoot, they did not hunt, or play cricket, or occupy themselves with any amusements of that kind. He ventured to think, he might add, that if the hon. Gentleman—the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he might call him, for he had been in the Army—were still in the Service, he would be one of the very first men to lay his uniform aside when off duty, and when he went outside the barrack-gates. He quite concurred in the opinion that when an officer was on duty he should be properly dressed in uniform, and should, upon all occasions, wear his uniform; but it was entirely opposed to the pursuits of English officers that they should wear uniform when out of barracks. And was it seriously contended, he would ask, that if an officer, on his return to barracks without his uniform, were to find a fray going on, he was not to interfere, although he might be well known to every one of those engaged in it, whom he might deem it to be his duty to put under arrest? In his (Sir Walter B. Barttelot's) opinion, the Committee, in the discussion of the Bill, were entering into too many technical details; and he should like to know from the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), whether he had ever seen an officer doing anything which could be regarded as a grievance of ordering a man to be placed under arrest while out of uniform? If it could be shown that the fact of an officer not wearing uniform was in any way prejudicial to the interests of the Army, then a case might be made out for the adoption of the Amendment; but he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) challenged the hon. and gallant Gentleman to point out any such grievance as would justify the Committee in accepting it. Failing to do that, it would be better, he thought, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman should leave things as they were, and that officers should continue to be allowed to wear plain clothes when off duty.

MR. RYLANDS would not dispute with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) the point whether it was desirable that officers should wear uniform when off duty or not. It would, he dared say, be difficult to find many cases in which inconvenience had arisen from the operation of the Articles of War, which it was proposed by the present clauses to retain; and he quite admitted the force of the objection to modify those Articles by the proposed Amendment. It was not often, in all probability, that an officer desired to put his superior in rank under arrest. It was a very unlikely thing for him to do so without sufficient cause; but the Amendment of the hon.

and gallant Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) was simply intended to meet such cases if they did arise, and he thought it was only right that when an officer did exercise his authority to put a man who happened to be engaged "in a quarrel, fray, or disorder," under arrest, he should bear with him the signs of the rank which he held.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he recollected having been present on a race-course close to Gibraltar when a fray had arisen in which the Governor of Gibraltar told the officers not to interfere. Now, under the provisions of the Bill, he would have no business to issue such an order; but if the Amendment were carried, the same thing might occur again, and an officer, because he happened not to be in uniform, would be deprived of all authority to put a stop to a disturbance. In the case which he had just mentioned, the Governor was not in uniform, nor were any of the other officers—for no English officer had a right to be in uniform there—but why, he would ask, should they on that account not be permitted to interfere to put a stop to the fray? The Amendment would seem to imply that when an officer was divested of his uniform he was divested of all authority; and he could not, therefore, support it, for if military control were once to be connected with the wearing of uniform the worst results might, in many instances, follow.

COLONEL MURE said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), who moved the Amendment, must be aware that it was only in very rare and extreme cases, where there was some gross misconduct calling for his interposition, that an inferior interfered with a superior officer for the purpose of ordering him to be put under arrest. There were few Members of that House who could point to the occurrence of cases of that kind. It was, however, absolutely necessary that when there happened to be a great riot, for instance, an officer should be able to act as a man, and not only as an officer, and that he should be permitted to exercise the power of placing under arrest. It was now the custom for officers, generally speaking, to wear plain clothes; and he would like to ask the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) what he would say, if in some case of great violence, where possibly a great deal of injury might be done, an officer was not allowed to interfere, because he was not in uniform? Would it not be disgraceful that the violence should be suffered to go on because of any such regulation? Would such a state of things be conducive to the honour of the Army? He hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would consent to withdraw the Amendment, for he did not believe that he thought in his own heart it was one that would work.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON rose to Order, and asked the Chairman, whether it was competent for one hon. Member to say of another that he had moved an Amendment which he thought in his heart would not work?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the observation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) appeared to him to be somewhat out of Order.

COLONEL MURE said, he would gladly withdraw it. He had no intention of imputing anything like insincerity to his hon. and gallant Friend; but he believed his intellect was becoming clouded since he had a seat in the House of Commons. His mind was evidently warped by his sitting on those Benches below the Gangway; and if he were at that moment in command of a regiment, a brigade, or a division, and not a Member of the House, he would be the first to deprecate such a proposal as that which he made, and to say that it would tend to weaken the natural authority which officers ought to possess, and to bring disgrace on the British Army.

COLONEL STANLEY appealed to the Committee to allow progress to be made with the discussion, so that the Amendment might be disposed of as soon as possible. It was, he believed, well understood that no practical difficulty had ever arisen under such provisions as those contained in the clause; and if hon. Members deemed it to be their duty to discuss all the small points in the Bill, and to put forward, on every occasion, their own special views, it would be impossible to pass the present or any other measure through the House within anything approaching a reasonable time. He did not, of course, object to discussion; but, at the same time, he hoped the Committee would not lose sight of the comparative proportions of the Bill, and that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) wished to take a Division on his Amendment, they would allow it to be taken without further delay.

Mr. Rylands

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had stated some time before that it was not his intention to press the Amendment to a Division. He should like to add, with reference to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), that, although he was aware that liberty of speech was sometimes carried to a great extent in that House, yet he scarcely remembered to have heard it carried so far as it had been by the hon. and gallant Gentleman on the present occasion.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK rose to a point of Order, to which it was not too late, he hoped, to call the attention of the Chairman. He had listened, he must confess, with great surprise to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure). As he understood the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he had expressed himself as being perfectly certain that the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) knew, in his own heart, that the Amendment which he proposed would not work.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH wished to rise to Order. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) did not take exception to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) when they were uttered, nor did he dispute the ruling of the Chair. He should like, therefore, to know whether it was competent to raise the question of Order now?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Baronet the Member for Hastings (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth) had quite correctly stated what was the practice of the House. Any hon. Member who desired to raise a point of Order was bound to do so at the moment when the alleged violation of Order occurred; but two speeches had since been delivered, and, therefore, the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland was not in Order in now raising the question. He had not, however, deemed it necessary to stop him from commenting on the observations of which he complained.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he at once bowed to the decision of the Chairman. He was perfectly aware of the Rule of the House on the subject, and he rose at the moment to take exception to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure). The attention of the Chairman was, however, diverted at the time, and it was, of course, impossible for him to see every hon. Member who rose in his place, and another hon. Member happened to be more fortunate in catching his eye. He did not, however, wish to prolong the discussion. He sympathized very much with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) in his complaint of the manner in which his Amendment had been met. It was, of course, open to any hon. Member to question the usefulness of any Amendment which might be proposed; but it was scarcely competent to him to impugn the bona fides of the Member who moved it. If he had been in the place of his hon. and gallant Friend, he should, as he had done, have placed himself under the protection of the Chair.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that no hon. Member had given more assistance to the Committee in the discussion of the clauses of the Bill than the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), and that he, for one, very strongly objected to the remarks which had been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), and to which exception had been already taken. He did not care very much what might be the opinion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman as to the intellect of those who sat below the Gangway; but he should like to know what law it was that governed the intellect of hon. Members according to the part of the House in which they happened to sit? Did their intellectual power range inversely with the distance, or the square of the distance, at which they sat from the front Opposition Bench. Judging from the tone of contempt which the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire had used, it was evident that the nearer a man got to the front Opposition Bench the more power and authority he could assume.

COLONEL MURE hoped the Committee would bear in mind that he had already said, the moment his attention was called to the expression which was complained of, that he had no intention whatsoever of imputing anything like insincerity to the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) in proposing his Amendment. If he was not satisfied with that statement, he begged at once to offer him the most ample apology. Having done that, he hoped the Committee would now be allowed to proceed with the Business before it.

MR. O'DONNELL rose to support the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon). It was, he thought, for many reasons, desirable that an officer should be in uniform, if he was to exercise the authority of putting a man under arrest. The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) said it was the custom of officers, when off duty, to wear plain clothes, and proceeded to draw a comparison between the British officer and the officers of foreign Armies. Foreign officers, he pointed out, did not play cricket, did not shoot or hunt, or indulge in several other amusements with which it was the habit of British officers to occupy themselves. But the question was, whether, taking into account what expensive articles British officers and soldiers were, Parliament should not try to induce them to pay more attention to their military duties and less to their society avocations? A foreign officer appeared almost always in uniform, because he was an officer above all things, and he would venture to say that his military character would not be improved if he were to imitate more closely the example of the British officer. In a scientific Army like that of Germany, for instance, the officer lived for his Profession chiefly; and he would point out that to permit British officers to appear, as they did, without uniform, served to furnish another illustration of the broad distinction which was drawn between officers and soldiers in the British Army. A soldier was made to remind one constantly that he was a soldier; while an officer had every facility given him for appearing as a civilian for by far the greater portion of his time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Colonel Mure

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, to leave out in page 21, line 12, the words "the proper military authority," and to insert the words "by his commanding officer," instead.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he hoped he had shown, by his acceptance of a previous Amendment, that he was as desirous as the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire that a man should not remain untried for any charge which might be brought against him for too long a period. But he would point out that if the words "to his commanding officer" were substituted for "the proper military authority" in the present instance, great inconvenience might be the result of the operation of the clause. A commanding officer might be engaged on a court martial or some other important duty, and a man might have to be kept in confinement until the commanding officer was at liberty to deal with his case. It was desirable, therefore, to save unnecessary delay, that he should be able to direct the officer who was second in command, for instance, to investigate the case.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that being perfectly satisfied with the explanation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 21, to leave out lines 12, 13, and 14, and insert—

"His commanding officer, who shall dismiss the charge, and release the prisoner from custody, if he in his discretion thinks the charge ought not to be proceeded with; but where he thinks it ought to be proceeded with, he shall take steps for bringing the offender to a court martial, or, in the case of a soldier, he may deal with the case summarily: Provided, That whenever a court of inquiry is assembled to investigate any matter affecting the conduct or character of an officer or soldier, such officer or soldier shall be entitled to receive a copy of any opinion which may be delivered by such court; and, if the officer who convenes the court of inquiry shall prefer to instruct the court to receive evidence only and not to deliver an opinion, the officer or soldier whose conduct or character has been called in question shall be entitled to demand that the officer who convenes the court of inquiry shall himself deliver an opinion upon the matter which has been the subject of investigation, and a copy of such opinion shall be delivered in writing to the officer or soldier concerned.

"And further, any officer or soldier who, after such investigation, is not fully exonerated from blame or culpability by the opinion of a court of inquiry, or by the officer who convened the court, shall be entitled to demand that he shall be placed upon his trial before a court martial, in order that the matter which had been the subject of investigation by the court of inquiry may be inquired into by a court competent to receive evidence upon oath, and of which the members composing it are themselves bound by the sanctity of an oath."

He looked upon the Amendment, he said, as being a very important one. The subject of Courts of Inquiry had already been very fully debated in the course of the discussions on the Bill; and it was, therefore, unnecessary to say very much more with respect to it. He must express a hope, however, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would see the expediency of acceding to the substance of his Amendment, even if he found himself unable to agree to the exact words. It proposed a change which was very greatly demanded by officers, and he was very anxious that it should have been brought under the consideration of the Select Committee last year. The hon. and learned Chairman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), however, pointed out that it was outside the Instructions of the Committee, and they did not, therefore, go into it. Several officers, however, had spoken to him on the subject, and he had asked them to give evidence before the Committee with regard to it; but they begged to be excused, saying that the proposition which he now embodied in his Amendment was not one to which the authorities either at the War Office or the Horse Guards were favourable. The Commander-in-Chief had given evidence that Courts of Inquiry were useful in cases where proof was difficult. But those cases, he contended, in which, in the investigation before a Court of Inquiry, proof was found to be difficult, were the very cases which ought to be submitted to a court martial.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to point out to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that there was nothing in the clause before the Committee relating to Courts of Inquiry. It was a clause which had reference simply to the custody of persons subject to military law when charged with offences. Although, therefore, the hon. and gallant Member might be in Order in moving the first part of his Amendment, if he thought proper, the second part ought to be moved as a separate clause.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it would, perhaps, save the time of the Committee if he were to state that he intended, in a subsequent clause, to propose an Amendment which would show that there was no very serious difference of opinion between the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) and himself with respect to some of the points involved in his Amendment.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he was quite satisfied to wait until the Committee came to the clause to which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman referred, and would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 21, at the end of Sub-section 4, to insert the following words:—

"And a copy of such 'account in writing' shall, at the same time, be given to the officer, soldier, or other person, so placed in military custody, if he desire to have it."

As matters now stood, a man might be kept in custody for weeks and months, and that was a grievance which ought, he thought, to be redressed. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would agree to the Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was afraid the Committee would be going too far if they were to agree to the introduction of the proposed words into the Bill, because it was proposed to deal with those matters of regulation. He should like to know whether, in the case in which a number of prisoners were in custody for any offence, the hon. and gallant Member meant that the depositions were to be taken down in writing, and that each prisoner was to be furnished with a copy, if he wished to ask for it? He quite admitted that in a very serious case that might be a right thing to do; but an "account in writing" merely corresponded to what was known as "the charge-sheet" in the police force, and it might, in some instances, mislead. He saw what the hon. and gallant Gentleman had in view, and he would see whether he could not deal with the matter on the Report.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he was satisfied with the assurance of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and would not press his Amendment.

MR. A. H. BROWN pointed out that under the operation of the clause, as it was drawn, an officer who might not himself be subject to military law, as provided by the 166th clause, would have the power of arresting a superior officer whom he found "engaged in a quarrel, fray, or disorder." Now, an officer should not, in his opinion, have that power, unless he himself was subject to military law.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would consider the point.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Power of Commanding Officer.

Clause 46 (Power of commanding officer).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, in page 21, line 16, to leave out "the" and insert "a" before the words "commanding officer." He was of opinion that it was not desirable to restrict the power of dismissing a charge to the commanding officer of a regiment.

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that the word "the" was inserted in the clause in order not to give too wide a power of dismissing charges.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had rightly divined the intention of the draftsman of the Bill, which was clearly to restrict; whereas he (Sir Alexander Gordon) wished to extend the protection afforded by the Bill. Every officer who had another officer under him was a commanding officer.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted accordingly.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, to leave out in page 21, line 16, the word "may," and to insert "shall." His object was to make it compulsory on a commanding officer to dismiss a charge, if, upon investigation, he thought it was one which ought not to be proceeded with.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME pointed out that in all Acts of Parliament the words "may" and "shall" had nearly the same force.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the word "may" in the clause applied to the word "dismiss," and that he proposed to substitute for it the word "shall," so that an officer might have no discretion but to dismiss a charge, if he was of opinion that it was one which ought not to be proceeded with.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY wished, with the permission of the Committee, to call the attention of the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) to an Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name, and which had for its object to reduce the number of days' imprisonment which it would be in the power of commanding officers summarily to inflict under the operation of the clause, from 21 days to seven, for every class of offence, except absence without leave. He was prepared to accept the principle of that Amendment; and it had always been his intention to impose a limit in the matter of regulation, although he thought it desirable, in the first instance, to set forth the number of days which was not to be exceeded, as was done in the Bill. He had already stated to the Committee the reasons which had induced him to give the commanding officer what, he admitted, was the extensive power of sentencing a man to imprisonment for 21 days with or without hard labour; but he never meant that that power should be exercised in every instance. It should be borne in mind that a great number of the cases which would come under the operation of the clause were cases in which, so to speak, the facts proved themselves; and it would, he thought, be a very fair compromise, if the power of the commanding officer were left, as now, to inflict 21 days' imprisonment for the offence of absence without leave, the power in other cases being limited to the infliction of seven days' imprisonment. Absence without leave was an offence which proved itself, for if a man was not present when the roll was called, there could be no question about the fact of his absence. In those circumstances, it would, he thought, be perfectly safe to leave the power of imprisonment for that offence for 21 days in the hands of the commanding officer; but he wished it to be distinctly understood that the question involved in the clause was one which it was fully intended should be dealt with by regulation.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that if he was not mistaken as to the views of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, they coincided with his own in the matter, and that if the substance of the Amendment which he intended to propose was such as he had stated, he could not have the slightest objection to its being moved instead of that which stood on the Paper in his own (Sir Henry Havelock's) name.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the more convenient course would be that the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) should move his Amendment. If he did not wish to press it, it might be withdrawn, and the Amendment which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War intended to substitute in lieu thereof could be inserted in the Bill later on.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK moved, as an Amendment, the insertion in page 21, line 24, after the word "shall," of the following words:—

"If he be not under the rank of field officer, or if under that rank, if he be in temporary command of a battery of artillery, a regiment of cavalry, or a battalion of infantry, for the offence of absence without leave."

There was also, he said, another Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name, which it had been his intention to propose in line 27, and the object of which was to limit the power of the commanding officer to inflict summarily the punishment of imprisonment to imprisonment for a period not exceeding seven days for any other offence than absence without leave, in which case, he thought, the power should be extended to 21 days for the purpose of diminishing the number of courts martial. He might be permitted to refer to a Question which he had the honour of addressing to His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief when he was examined before the Committee up stairs.

MR. PARNELL rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. and gallant Gentleman was entitled to enter into a discussion with regard to an Amendment which was not immediately before the Committee, and which stood some way down on the Paper?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he did not think the hon. and gallant Member was out of Order in supporting the Amendment which he had moved by reference to another which he had proposed to move in line 27.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, his object was to limit the power of the commanding officer, as he had pointed out, except in cases of absence without leave, which, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had very properly stated, proved themselves. In the answer which had been given by the Commander-in-Chief to the Question which he had put to him on the occasion to which he was referring, when he was interrupted by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), and which was whether, in the opinion of his Royal Highness, any practical inconvenience had been experienced up to the present time by the limitation of the power to the infliction of imprisonment for not more than seven days, His Royal Highness said that the number of courts martial was reduced thereby, and that that was an advantage. That being so, and there being no reason to think that any practical inconvenience resulted now from the limitation of the power, it struck him, he must confess, as being somewhat of an anomaly, that provision should have been made in the Bill for increasing the power three-fold. On the understanding, however, that the Amendment which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) intended to propose would limit the power of summarily awarding the punishment of imprisonment to a period not exceeding seven days, except in the one particular class of cases which he had mentioned, he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was anxious, if possible, to make the matter clear to the Committee. He did not wish to accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) in the sense of putting in the Bill what was a matter of regulation. What he proposed to do was to leave out the word "twenty-one" in line 26, and then, in line 35, to insert a separate paragraph, providing that in the case of absence without leave the commanding officer might award imprisonment with or without hard labour for any period not exceeding 21 days. If that were agreed to, the commanding officer would, in dealing summarily with other offences, be exactly in the same position as that in which he now stood.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK was quite willing to accept the Amendment suggested by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, which, he believed, would fully carry out the object which he had in view. He thought, however, that the matter might be made still clearer if, in the proposed Amendment, the word "only" were inserted after the words "in the case of absence without leave."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would have no objection to make that alteration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. HOLMS said, the discussion which had taken place had shown both the importance of the clause itself, and the necessity for its rectification. He understood the main object of the clause was to give to commanding officers greater powers than those which they at present possessed, in order to get rid of the great number of courts martial which it was found necessary to hold under the Act now in force. But it was, in his opinion, necessary to define a little further the powers to be given to commanding officers. For, with regard to the extension of power, although he considered it to be a move in the right direction, so far as commanding officers were concerned, he could not but think it wrong that these increased powers should be intrusted to subalterns. He therefore trusted the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would take the matter into his serious consideration, and endeavour to schedule the special judicial powers which were to be given to particular officers with a view to their clearer definition. In the German Army, the amount of punishment which each particular officer could award under the special judicial powers given to them was clearly defined. For instance, the officer commanding a company, battery, or squadron had the power of dealing with non-commissioned officers and privates to the extent of awarding eight days' open arrest, five days' medium arrest, and three days' close arrest. Then, the officer commanding a battalion had extended powers, and could award 14 days' open arrest; 10 days' medium arrest, and seven days' close arrest; while the powers of the colonel of a regiment were still more extended. He ventured to suggest that we should have in our Army some scale of a similar character, clearly and precisely defining the special judicial powers to be exercised by officers of each particular rank. He therefore begged to move the Amendment standing in his name—namely, in page 21, line 24, to leave out from "summarily" to "An" in line 36, in order to insert—

"(a) An officer commanding a company, a troop, or a battery, may exercise special judicial powers to the extent set forth in Schedule. . . . of this Bill;

"(b) An officer commanding a battalion may exercise special judicial powers to the extent set forth in Schedule. . . . of this Bill;

"(c) An officer commanding a regiment may exercise special judicial powers to the extent set forth in Schedule. . . . of this Bill;

"(d) Officers of superior rank to the foregoing may exercise judicial powers to the extent set forth in Schedule of this Bill."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was not in a position to advise the Committee to accept this Amendment, as it would have the effect of adding to the slight difficulties which already existed. It was well known that there were simply two existing powers—first, that exercised by the commanding officer; secondly, that delegated by him to be exercised by officers commanding companies. He could not see what advantage would be gained by scheduling the various powers in question; and as the whole system referred to by the hon. Member was, besides, foreign to the ways of the Service, he trusted that the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. PARNELL pointed out that there were very strong grounds for the inquiries of the Committee being extended in the direction suggested by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms). When the Committee appointed last year to consider the whole question of Army Discipline was sitting, none but the cut-and-dried evidence supplied by the War Office was laid before it; while the Members of the Committee had not sufficient time at their disposal to call independent witnesses. He, himself, had moved that the deliberations of the Committee should be prolonged for that purpose; but, owing to the lateness of the year, the Motion—which was not, for that reason, very much to the taste of the Committee—was withdrawn. Had the hon. Member for Hackney been able to call witnesses, he would have fortified himself with arguments which he (Mr. Parnell) believed would have gone a very long way to induce the Committee to accept his Amendment. The Amendment was one which was, to a certain extent, demanded by the necessities of the Service, for the Queen's Regulations showed that something of the kind was needed. They were dealing with a very old Mutiny Act that had come down almost from time immemorial, many sections of which, and of the old Articles of War, had been almost word for word put down in the present Bill; therefore he thought that the customs handed down to us should not be too blindly followed by the Committee. It appeared to him that if the Queen's Regulations gave authority to commanding officers to delegate their powers to inferior officers, the Committee should clearly understand why it was not right that such powers should be delegated by Parliament. He did not, however, think the Committee would be able to investigate the point on that occasion. If, therefore, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consider the matter before the Report, he would suggest that the hon. Member for Hackney might withdraw his Amendment.

Colonel Stanley

MR. RYLANDS considered there were strong arguments in favour of an Amendment of this character. As he understood the clause, the powers of a commanding officer might be exercised by a lieutenant in charge of a company. He held in his hand a Memorandum written by a colonel, holding at the present moment that rank in the Army, which said—

“Considering that this power is to be exercised by any sub-lieutenant, it is a very dangerous power to give to any man of that rank;”

And it went on to remark—

“In view of the idiots sometimes to be found in the command of regiments, it is a very dangerous power.”

COLONEL STANLEY pointed out to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr.

Rylands) that he had already stated that the whole question was to be reviewed, and the clause in this respect modified.

MR. J. HOLMS regretted very much the way in which the Secretary of State for War had replied upon the Amendment, and trusted that the Committee would consider the question a little further. He (Mr. J. Holms) had rejoiced to see the 21 days' imprisonment which stood in Sub-section (a), because he believed that it would get rid of the necessity for a great many courts martial; but the Amendment put down by the Secretary of State for War minimized that advantage by reducing the number of days' imprisonment in cases summarily dealt with to seven. He held that, undoubtedly, at the present moment, a more defined responsibility was required with relation to officers in the Army, and that the Committee should settle some means for ascertaining their powers, whether it be upon a foreign system or not. He could not see that the mode of dealing with this question as suggested by him was in the slightest degree objectionable. On the contrary, the fact of its having been drawn from that nation which understood military matters so well was a strong argument in its favour. Therefore, he again urged that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should schedule the powers to be given to each particular officer; and if he could not give an assurance that the matter should be considered, he should be obliged to take the sense of the Committee upon his Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, as an Amendment, in page 21, line 26, after the word “labour,” to insert “in the case of the offence of absence without leave.”

COLONEL STANLEY pointed out that absence without leave was dealt with in a proposed Amendment to the clause standing in his name.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 21, line 26, to leave out “twenty-one,” and insert “seven.”

Amendment agreed to; word substituted accordingly.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the 15 Amendments proposed to the clause, all of which treated of different subjects, had made it rather difficult for the Committee to understand its exact position. It appeared that the 21 days' imprisonment in Sub-section (a) had been struck out, and seven days inserted instead; that, of course, covered his first Amendment. But he had another Amendment, which came immediately after it—namely, to insert after "twenty-one days,"

"For absence without leave, provided that a number of days greater than that for which the offender has been absent is not awarded and for all offences other than absence without leave may award seven days."

And the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had another Amendment coming on which confined the 21 days' imprisonment to the offence of absence without leave, so that a commanding officer might award 21 days' imprisonment for an absence of one or two hours. That was a power which he did not think ought to be in the hands of commanding officers. It was believed by some that this power would save a great number of courts martial; but there were, in 1877, only 99 courts martial in which imprisonment was awarded for absence without leave. He would suggest to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to go a little further, and in some way limit this power of giving 21 days for this offence. Although he could not regard an absence of 48 hours as a very terrible offence, he admitted that an absence of three days became more serious, and thought that the Secretary of State for War should propose an Amendment leaving the power of awarding seven days for absence without leave to commanding officers.

COLONEL COLTHURST wished to bring under the consideration of the Committee the possibility of extending to absence without leave the fines now exacted in cases of drunkenness. Drunkenness was at present punished by a scale of fines varying from 2s. 6d. to 10s. each, and the Queen's Regulations treated absence without leave and drunkenness in the same way; and, in nine cases out of ten, it was the cause of the latter offence. He thought that if this crime could be diminished, it would be more satisfactory than extending the powers of commanding officers. At present, a man sentenced by the commanding officer to 14 days' imprisonment lost 7s. and his comrades had to do the duty for him; but by the Amendment which he desired to see adopted, the man would have to do his duty, and be fined 7s. as well. He trusted the Secretary of State for War would accept the proposal which stood in his name—namely, in page 21, line 28, after "drunkenness," insert "or absence without leave."

COLONEL STANLEY admitted that the Amendment was one likely to effect a very considerable improvement, and he was willing to accept the words, provided, of course, that the fine was left optional with the commanding officer. By the 134th clause, "absence without leave," ipso facto, carried with it forfeiture of pay.

MAJOR NOLAN contended that the system of fining soldiers was a dangerous one, and denied that having entered into a definite engagement with our soldiers it could be fairly and honestly broken. By the accumulation of fines, a large number of men were made desperate and anxious to be discharged with ignominy. If he wanted to know who were the men scheming to be discharged from the Army with ignominy, he should look to the accounts of the men who were fined for drunkenness, and had a number of fines accumulating against them. The number of men annually discharged with ignominy from the Army amounted to the serious total of 2,000. He doubted that we had the right to stop the pay of the men, and make them do their duty as well. Such an act would certainly not be looked upon as fair in private life, and would be likely, in his opinion, to lead to dangerous results in the Army. If he could have found a Teller, he would have divided against the Amendment.

COLONEL ALEXANDER pointed out that when the system of fines was first instituted in the Army, the fine by a commanding officer for drunkenness involved an entry in the regimental defaulters' book, and subjected the offender to the loss of the good-conduct badge; but an important alteration took place about two years ago, and the fine did not now involve any such entry in the defaulters' book.

EL COLTHURST, in view of the opinion of the Committee, asked leave to draw his Amendment. He placed disposal of the right hon. and gentleman, so that if he thought any he could bring it up on

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

O'BEIRNE said, that this treating absence without leave drunkenness, had, to his knowledge, led to desertion. A man who to be unjust naturally left the force for one where the practice did

Originally, the fines exacted from men were given back in the gratuities, when they left the service; but that had, under the short-service system, been done away with. It, therefore, came very heavily upon men, and he begged to move that the highest fine of 10s. be reduced COLONEL STANLEY failed to see the effect by a result of the short-service system could be held to be a ground for punishing a drunken man pay 3s. less of fine. He did not think the punishment excessive. He agreed that there could be more similarity in the punishment; but that was a matter which should not be gone into then.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE considered the fine of 10s. amounted, in the case of a man, to four week's income, was too

MAJOR O'BEIRNE thought the course of the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction in cases of drunkenness might very well be followed. People fined by these Courts had an opportunity of earning money to pay the fines easily, so that punishment hardly amounted to anything at all; but the case of a soldier was different; he had no such opportunity of earning money, and it was manifest that the scale in use in the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction should not be exceeded. He thought that the hon. and gallant Member for the County of London (Major O'Beirne) taken 5s. as a standard, it would have been very high. He hoped the Secretary for War would re-consider the matter, and agree to reduce the fine to 7s.

O'BEIRNE said, it ought to be brought into consideration that the men were not to have gratuities whatever after three years' service, and the fines, consequently, fell upon them very heavily. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not noticed this point, which was a very important one. The men on short service got back none of these amounts, which went into a fund, out of which soldiers on long service received allowances. He thought that the system should be altered, and that the short-service men were entitled to share in the fund, if they had behaved themselves well.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the question of the destination of the fund arising out of the fines had been recently under the consideration of the Under Secretary of State for War. The Committee were not then dealing with the destination of the fund, but with the fines upon drunkenness. This system, which had resulted from the recommendation of a powerful Committee, had, as far as he was aware, with one or two slight defects, been working, on the whole, very well.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, there were men in the Army who could not help getting drunk, and who, spending their whole time in prison, left their comrades to do their work. It was necessary, he thought, to consider the good soldier, as well as the bad soldier; and the system of fines had the effect of reducing the number of these drunken fellows, by taking away the money which they would otherwise spend in drink. There was nothing which a good soldier felt more than having to do duty for these drunken and useless men. It was to be borne in mind that the fines for drunkenness were upon a graduated scale. For the first two offences a man was admonished; for the next he was fined 2s. 6d.; for the fourth offence, 5s.; for the fifth, 7s. 6d.; and after that, 10s. He trusted his hon. and gallant Friend (Major O'Beirne) would withdraw his Amendment.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, as the Committee did not appear to wish to go to a Division, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 21, line 35, after officer, to insert—

“And to forfeit his pay for any day or days, not exceeding five, during which he shall have been absent without leave,” said, that the 174th Article of War, which was not embodied in this Bill, provided that—“ Any soldier shall be liable, at the discretion of the commanding officer, subject, however, to right of appeal, to forfeit his pay for any number of days not exceeding five, for which he shall be absent without leave.”

This was very important, because, as he had already pointed out, a soldier in that way sentenced by the commanding officer to stoppage of pay was subjected to a regimental entry. It was, therefore, necessary to know whether the commanding officer was to have both the power under the 174th Article of War, and that under the Sub-section (c) of the present clause?

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the stoppage of pay was made ipso facto for the time the soldier was absent, under the 174th Article of War; but it was now to be awarded by the commanding officer. He did not know where the law was laid down; but it had been the custom from time immemorial that where a soldier was absent from 4 o'clock on one day until 3 o'clock next morning, two days' pay might be stopped, and it was thought better, on revising the Bill, to make it clear that the soldier should forfeit his pay for the time for which he was absent. But it was provided, in Clause 135, that the commanding officer might restore him any portion of the deduction which he might think fit.

MR. PARNELL wished to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with reference to Sub-section (b) of this clause, whether it re-enacted the substance of the 77th Article of War? The Article of War in question gave a power to levy fines which should not exceed 4s. a-day, whether imposed by a court martial or by a commanding officer. That provision did not appear in the present clause, which only enacted that the fine should not exceed 10s.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Gentleman was not in Order in referring to Sub-section (b), which had been already passed.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that it was a very important matter to deprive a soldier of his good-conduct pay. It ought to be specified that absence without leave did not necessarily carry with it a regimental entry. If his right hon. and gallant Friend could give him an assurance upon the point, he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment. A commanding officer did not necessarily sentence a man to lose his pay for absence without leave; perhaps, for three convictions for absence without leave, a commanding officer would stop a man's pay for two or three days; then an entry was made in the regimental defaulter book, and if a man were in receipt of good conduct pay he lost that. It appeared to him that an injustice would be inflicted, if a soldier should be made to forfeit his pay as a matter of course on conviction for absence without leave.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON did not think that a soldier absolutely lost his pay under the circumstances mentioned. He did not understand that that was the effect of the Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that if a soldier was absent without leave he did not necessarily lose his pay. A commanding officer, if he chose, might sentence him to forfeit his pay—to order, in fact, that he should not be paid for the time he had been absent. If a man were absent from his regiment and neglected his duty, it was only fair that he should lose his pay for the time he was absent. Clause 135 gave power to a commanding officer to remit the whole or any portion of any deduction of pay in any case where it might seem to him to be just. He might say that he followed the point of the hon. and gallant Gentleman behind him (Colonel Alexander), although, as the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) said, it did not follow, as a matter of course, that the pay would be stopped, for a commanding officer could remit the deduction. He fully agreed that it was right that there should be some power to remit a deduction if a commanding officer did not think the case was one which made it necessary that the pay should be stopped. Although a soldier technically forfeited his pay, it was in the power of his commanding officer to remit the deduction. With respect to good conduct pay, that was a matter which depended upon the Royal Warrant, and that case did not arise under the Bill.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he would beg leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Colonel Alexander

MR. J. BROWN wished to point out that the clause did not provide for the case of an officer being in charge of the wings, nor an officer in charge of head-quarters, nor did it seem to him that the case was met by the Amendment. An officer in charge of the wings probably would not be the commanding officer of the regiment, and while in charge of the wings he ought to have the power of exercising the punishment provided by the clause; also an officer left in charge of head-quarters, at any time, would be fit to exercise the powers given to him by this Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he had already given a promise upon this point to the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), and he would repeat that he would consider the point with reference to half-battalions. There was a great deal of difficulty in providing for all the cases; but he would endeavour to put the matter on a thoroughly satisfactory footing. He might say that he should not like to go beyond the rank of field officer in the extension of this power. If the hon. Gentleman would be good enough to remind him of the matter on another occasion, he would endeavour to meet the case.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE was opposed altogether to the extension of the powers of commanding officers. The men were much more satisfied when they were punished by the sentence of a court martial than by an individual. Giving the power to a commanding officer was only to avoid the extra trouble of calling a court martial.

On the Motion of Colonel STANLEY, the following Amendment was made:—
In page 21, line 35, insert as a separate paragraph—

“In the case of absence without leave, the commanding officer may, if he is not under the rank of field officer, or if under that rank is in temporary command of a battery of artillery, a regiment of cavalry, or a battalion of infantry, award imprisonment with or without hard labour for any period not exceeding twenty-one days.”

MR. A. H. BROWN wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the Amendment which he proposed to move. Under certain circumstances, this clause would apply to Volunteers who might be subject, for the time being, to military law. It was, therefore, most necessary that the clause should be carefully scanned with regard to its bearing upon Volunteers. He was aware that they were then only dealing with the extended powers of a commanding officer in the case of absence without leave. The extension of the power of a commanding officer appeared to have been drawn from the recommendations of the Royal Commission upon courts martial. But the recommendations of the Royal Commission went further, for they proposed to extend the powers of a commanding officer in the case of all offences to a sentence of imprisonment for 21 days. To that recommendation he was entirely opposed. Camps of instruction were now formed, and Volunteers were subject to discipline. A Volunteer who went into those camps did so under the impression that he could rid himself of all his obligations to the Service after the expiration of 14 days, and this new law was to be put upon him, which would take away his right to resign at the end of that period, for a commanding officer had power given him to put him in prison for 21 days if absent without leave. Of course, he did not for one moment stand up in favour of any man who was absent without leave; but they must consider most carefully the effect that this provision would have upon Volunteers. They should not have such provisions as would make Volunteers afraid to go into camps of instruction. If the power was given to send Volunteers to prison for 21 days by the sentence of a single officer, he believed the effect would be that Volunteers would not be so ready to go into camps of instruction as they were at present. It was the object of all commanding officers to get Volunteers into camp, and he thought the provision would interfere with that which they wished to do. He did not think the same effect would be produced if power were given to the commanding officer to award imprisonment for 14 days only; for every Volunteer knew that he was subject to military law for the period of 14 days. This provision had been made, no doubt, with reference to the interests of the Army; and so far as the Army was concerned, he gathered from the opinions of the Committee that it was accepted; but as regarded Volunteers, he could not accept the clause, and felt bound to rise to protest against

it. He thought it would interfere most materially in the formation of these camps of instruction; and, however much they might wish for the discipline of the Volunteers to be increased, on the other hand, they must remember that they were not an entirely military Force, but were only a quasi-military Force. This power of imprisoning a man for 21 days, because he happened to be absent from the camp for three or four hours, would, he thought, be considered by many Volunteers to be a very heavy penalty. In active service it was, no doubt, well to have such a provision as this; but in time of peace he could not see that it was necessary in the case of Volunteers. He moved, in line 5 of the Amendment just made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, "to leave out "twenty-one" and insert "fourteen."

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that the hon. Member would not press his Amendment. It was admitted on all hands that 21 days was not an excessive period. With regard to the fears of the hon. Gentleman as to the Volunteers, he (Colonel Stanley) thought that it was a very unlikely thing that any Volunteer would so commit himself as to require this punishment to be awarded to him. He must also take into consideration that a commanding officer, in dealing with such a matter, would probably not exercise the full powers given him, nor would take any steps which would raise doubt or difficulty. But he would base his objections to the Amendment of the hon. Member on a broader ground. He had every reason to believe that the Volunteers were anxious, when they took upon themselves these military duties, to accept them upon the same terms as the soldiers by whose side they served. He defended the opinion which he expressed earlier upon the Bill; for though the hon. Member, no doubt, spoke from good information, yet he might not be aware of the representations which had been addressed to the War Office from many quarters. There was a general feeling that the Volunteers were anxious to accept the full liability and the full restrictions of soldiers when they went into camp with the Regular troops. He trusted the hon. Member would not insist upon his Amendment.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON did not see his way to accept the clause which they were now upon, for it seemed to him to be perfectly unworkable. It did not provide for many cases which were constantly occurring in different parts of the world. In India, and in the Colonies, where regiments were broken up, the clause would be inapplicable. Sometimes companies were under the independent command of captains; and sometimes not more than two or three officers and the commanding officer, with one company, might be present with the Colours at head-quarters, while the bulk of the regiment might be hundreds of miles away. He was opposed to this extension of the power of imprisonment to 21 days; he had an Amendment to substitute 14 days, which he withdrew in favour of another for seven days. It seemed to him that 21 days' imprisonment was too much. Supposing there was a case of misunderstanding—a man might be at a distance from head-quarters and the means of communication might be uncertain, and he did think that this clause gave a commanding officer great extension of power, which was quite unworkable.

MAJOR NOLAN thought that this power of imprisonment ought to be limited in some way. There were several ways in which the clause might be amended, one of which was to give a power to award seven days' imprisonment for absence without leave of, say, for five days. The power ought to be limited by providing that the number of days' imprisonment should not exceed the time during which the soldier had been unwarrantably absent. If that were done, a man would know at once what punishment he might expect to receive. Graver cases of absence without leave could be dealt with as a matter of course by a court martial. He thought, however, that a punishment of 21 days being placed in the hands of one man, without restriction, was too great a power. It was said that a hard case made bad law; but a commanding officer might consider that a man required some punishment for other offences which he was supposed to have committed; and, therefore, if he were absent for only one day, he might sentence him to the full period of imprisonment for 21 days.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the matter to which the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had referred could be met by regulation, if found to work harshly. It appeared to him, however, that there might be circumstances in which one day's absence might be punished too severely, and the case of absence for over seven days could be dealt with in another way. He was disposed to accept some limitation such as that proposed, and was willing either to put the words in then, or to consult with his advisers with regard to doing so.

MR. HOPWOOD wished to say a word or two in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. H. Brown). The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had expressed an opinion that the Volunteers were anxious for the enforcement of further discipline. He ventured to say that the representations which had been made to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman must have emanated entirely from the officers of Volunteers. He believed that the officers of Volunteers were very much in favour of obtaining military power, and of having some such means of punishing those under their command as were usual in the Army; they were anxious to extend the little power they had at present, and to make it very much more. He ventured to suggest that if that were done it would be a very dangerous course to pursue in relation to the Volunteer Force. The Volunteers were unduly praised by some people; while, on the other hand, other persons unduly depreciated them. He assumed that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman thought highly of the Force; but the way in which he was now going to treat it was by imposing upon it penalties which did not at present exist by law. He was not going into a legal argument upon the matter; but it was his conviction that further legislation on this point was of extremely doubtful utility. He thought that it was a matter of great doubt whether the Military Act ought to be applied at all to Volunteers, although brigaded with, and acting with, the Regular Forces. At the present time, there was great doubt upon the Acts relating to the matter, as to the extent to which Volunteers could be punished; and it was sought by the present Bill to settle and extend the powers to punish Volunteers under certain conditions of service, and to place them on the same footing as the Regular soldiers. By the terms of his engagement, a Volunteer was entitled to rid himself of it by a fortnight's notice; but here they were proposing to inflict a punishment for various offences which would extend beyond that period. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman alleged that he had learned from the Volunteers that they were disposed to submit to all these matters. To that he (Mr. Hopwood) answered that if the Bill were passed all the liabilities which a man would undertake on entering the Service ought to be drawn to his attention, and to be publicly exhibited at the places of drill of the various corps. He felt quite sure that if they were to tell the artizans of Lancashire, Cheshire, or Yorkshire, that whenever in pursuance of their desire to get more instruction in military matters, or with the object of obtaining a summer holiday, they chose to go into camp along with the Regular troops, they would then be liable to the extreme penalties of this measure, he thought they would at once refuse to go. He thought that the adoption of such provisions as these would defeat the intention and object of them, and that they would, in the result, do mischief rather than good. The Volunteer Force, by the very terms in which it was created, was not to be ruled in the precise manner in which soldiers were disciplined; and to try and apply the same rules to Volunteers was a contradiction in terms, and did away with the object and altered the character of the Force.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the Committee that it was not in Order then to discuss the questions relating to the Volunteer Force.

MR. PARNELL said, that the Bill referred as much to Volunteers as to other Forces of the Crown. Volunteers gave their services freely and voluntarily, and submitted themselves to the same discipline as the Regular Forces. He thought that they were entirely in Order in discussing whether any particular clause of the Bill was suitable or otherwise in its application to the Volunteers. He did not think that there was any reason for applying these stringent regulations to the Volunteers. He did not believe that they were in favour of the extension of the punishments to which they would be subjected.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the Chairman had just now ruled that it was not in Order then to discuss the question of the Volunteers.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he had just pointed out to the Committee that that was not the proper time to raise any question with regard to Volunteers. Of course, there was no doubt that the Volunteers were dealt with by the Bill; and in the clauses relating to them any question with regard to the Force could be discussed. But, certainly, hon. Members were not in Order in speaking of the Volunteers upon an Amendment which proposed to substitute 14 for 21 days' imprisonment.

MR. PARNELL said, that if brigaded with Regular troops, the power which they were then discussing would be applicable to the Volunteers; it might be inflicted upon the Volunteers under the Bill by a commanding officer, who might be, and probably would be, an officer of a regiment of the Line. Any Volunteer might be sent to prison for three weeks by an officer of the Regular Forces, who knew nothing about him, and by whom his case could not well be considered. He did not wish to enter into the general question of the Volunteers; but, at the same time, he wished to point out that there was a tendency all through this Bill to increase punishments and render them more severe. In every line of the Bill they met more severe punishments and increased terms of imprisonment. It was said that the placing this increased power in the hands of commanding officers would have the effect of reducing the number of courts martial. It would, unquestionably, increase the severity of sentences by commanding officers; but whether it would reduce the number of prisoners sent before courts martial he doubted. He would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, whether he could not introduce some provision for decreasing the punishments which might be awarded for slight absences without leave? He believed, at the present time, a soldier, who was unlucky enough to have been absent a short time, was driven to desert from fear of the consequences. He had known the case of a soldier who was brought before him for having deserted, to which act he was driven by having been absent one night without leave. If soldiers knew that the punishment for temporary absence would not exceed seven days' imprisonment, they would return to their barracks and would not desert, and thus the services of the soldier would be gained, and the expense of punishing him would be saved. Many military men must be fully aware that in many cases a soldier was afraid to return from fear of the severe punishment which he would suffer for having been absent for a short time without leave.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the advantage of giving an increased power to a commanding officer would be great. Fewer courts martial would be held, and a soldier would not be kept away from his duty for such a long period if dealt with summarily the next morning. There was a general opinion that much good would be done by giving a commanding officer increased powers of dealing with absences without leave. But in respect of other offences the Government did not wish to press for any increased powers to be placed in the hands of commanding officers.

MR. RYLANDS thought there was some justification for the change proposed in giving commanding officers increased powers of dealing with cases of absence by soldiers without leave. He thought, however, that they ought to be careful not to give commanding officers authority to inflict heavy punishments in all cases, but that they should limit the amount of punishment which might be inflicted in particular cases. He wished to point out to the Committee that absence without leave was one of the most numerous classes of offences committed in the Army. During the last year there were no less than 3,347 cases occurring of absence without leave. Upwards of 3,000 of those cases were tried by court martial. Therefore, what the right and hon. and gallant Gentleman was pressing the Committee to do was to give commanding officers power to deal summarily with a large number of those cases. He did not complain of that; but when he considered that this power would be exercised in some cases by men of not altogether sound judgment, and that the more men that were sent to prison the more they injured the efficiency of the Force, he thought they should look with jealousy upon the power of a commanding officer to inflict such a punishment. He remembered very well, that in the proceedings of the Royal Commission which sat a number of years ago, evidence was given before them with reference to the number of summary punishments inflicted in different regiments, and it was shown that the number varied very much indeed. It was brought out as clearly as possible that, some commanding officers were a great deal more severe than others, and that while numerous punishments were inflicted in some regiments, in others the number of punishments inflicted was very small indeed. That was most important, as showing that in giving commanding officers these summary powers they ought to surround them with sufficient safeguards.

COLONEL STANLEY was sorry again to trouble the Committee with any observations upon this matter. He did not know whether the hon. Member for Burnley had really taken the trouble to listen to what had passed during the last hour or two; if he had, he would have known that the power given to commanding officers was by no means what he seemed to think. They desired to give this power to the commanding officers in the way suggested by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan)—that was to say, that short absences without leave should be punished by imprisonment not exceeding seven days, and absences for periods beyond that, according to the length of time for which a soldier was absent, up to 21 days. Of course, in cases of absence without leave for extended periods, a court martial would be the proper tribunal. He did not think, therefore, that they were giving commanding officers any such extended powers as the hon. Gentleman seemed to think. On the contrary, he believed that the powers which they had given would be completely limited and restricted. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the Committee would agree to give commanding officers a power to award imprisonment for a period not not exceeding 21 days.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that at present, if a man was more than five days absent, he must be tried by a court martial, and when so tried, a man really got more than 21 days' imprisonment. Under the new scale, which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War proposed to introduce, a man would get the same number of days' imprisonment as he did at present when his absence was for a period less than five days.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON inquired whether the Secretary of State for War was aware whether the prisons would, in all cases, have sufficient accommodation to carry out sentences of imprisonment for 21 days? Many prisons had very inferior cells, which were only suitable for confining men for a few days. If, therefore, the period of imprisonment was increased to 21 days, cells which would be suitable for a few days' imprisonment might be found totally unsuitable for a longer period.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that in cases of absence for over five days, it was now necessary that there should be a court martial; in such cases, a man was sure to get 21 days' imprisonment. In future, a man would get less than that amount of imprisonment.

MR. A. H. BROWN begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK moved, as an Amendment, in page 21, line 27, after "twenty-one days," to add—

"Provided, that in every case where the power of summary award by a commanding officer exceeds a sentence of seven days' imprisonment, the accused person may demand that the evidence against him should be taken on oath, and the same oath as that required to be taken by witnesses before a court martial shall be administered to each witness in such case."

He thought that such a provision as that was necessary where they were extending the power of commanding officers in the matter of imprisonment. At present, cases of absence for over five days were tried by courts martial, and evidence was then, of course, taken on oath. In some of these cases it might happen that considerable doubt might arise as to the circumstances which constituted the offence; and it, therefore, seemed to him desirable that in the case provided for by the Amendment the evidence should be taken on oath.

COLONEL STANLEY assented to the Amendment, on the understanding that if he should find there would be serious practical difficulty in carrying it out, the Amendment should be struck out on the Report.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. J. BROWN remarked, that so much had already been said on the subject of absence without leave that he did not propose to move the Amendment which stood in his name with regard to it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER moved, as an Amendment, in page 22, line 7, before the words "court martial," to insert the word "district." He said that his object was to provide that an appeal from a commanding officer's decision should not lay to the officers immediately serving under his command. By the present Articles of War, if a soldier was fined any sum exceeding 10s., he might appeal, if he pleased, from the decision. He had a right in that case to be tried by a district or garrison court martial. No doubt, there was a difficulty in bringing together officers to compose such a court, and for that reason the appeal had not been retained to a district court martial. He thought, however, that it was not right that an appeal from a commanding officer's decision should be only to those officers immediately under his command.

COLONEL STANLEY had no objection to the insertion of the word "district," although there were some practical difficulties in the way. It had been pointed out that in some cases they would have appeals set up as a matter of course; and it was then undesirable that a district court martial should in every case be bound to assemble. He had no objection, however, to making the appeal lay to a district court martial in any case which was sufficiently serious. But supposing the soldier was sentenced to one day's imprisonment, it was not right that he should have an appeal to such a court martial. To give a soldier a right of appeal to a district court martial in every case would lead to a considerable amount of trouble and expense. He thought that the difficulty would be met, however, by providing that where a soldier appealed from the decision of his commanding officer, and obtained a hearing by a district court martial, he should then be liable to suffer a greater punishment at the hands of the court martial than he had originally received from his commanding officer. By adopting that course, he thought appeals would not be made frivolously and without undue ground. He should, therefore, agree to the Amendment giving an appeal to a district court martial; but, at the same time, he should insist that there should be no limitation on the soldier's receiving a greater punishment from the court martial than had been originally awarded by the commanding officer. He might say that he did not wish to punish unduly, but only to prevent the right of appeal being abused.

MR. RYLANDS rose for the purpose of suggesting that it might be possible to restrict the power of appeal to cases in which the sentence of imprisonment exceeded seven days. They had a Proviso already for cases in which imprisonment amounted to seven days, for in that case evidence must be taken on oath. He should suggest the insertion of a Proviso for limiting an appeal to a district court martial to cases in which the sentence of imprisonment exceeded seven days.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that perhaps his hon. Friend was not aware that any soldier sentenced to deprivation of pay had a right to appeal to a court martial.

MR. RYLANDS inquired whether that was a district court martial?

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the clause, as it stood, would cover everything, and the soldier would have a right to be tried by a court martial.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that it was only in cases of fines for drunkenness that a soldier could at present appeal to a district court martial. In all other cases his appeal lay only to a regimental court martial under the 50th Article of War.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), that the law was as he had stated, and he thought it was one of the present anomalies for which there was no reason. He considered it of great importance that a soldier should have a complete right to appeal to a competent court.

COLONEL STANLEY did not know whether it was worth while to leave it optional to make the appeal to a regimental or district court martial. He would give his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Arthur Hayter) an undertaking that the words "have a right to be tried by a court martial" should be altered to "have a right to be tried by a district court martial."

Colonel Stanley

MR. PARNELL said, it would make considerable difference whether the appeal were to a regimental or a district court martial. A regimental court martial would only have power to inflict a short term of imprisonment, whereas a district court martial might give a longer term.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN stated that he would not move the Amendment which stood in his name—to provide that a court martial hearing an appeal from a commanding officer's decision should not be empowered to award a punishment greater than was originally awarded by a commanding officer.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Courts Martial.

Clause 47 (Regimental courts martial).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had an Amendment to propose, but could not explain it in the short time which would elapse before the Sitting was suspended. He would therefore move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Alexander Gordon),—put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

It being now Seven of the clock, House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CYPRUS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE rose to call attention to Sir Garnet Wolseley's recent Despatches with reference to the Government of Cyprus, and to move an Address for Copies of the Ordinance No. VIII. of 1879, giving power to the Government of Cyprus to exile persons without trial; of the Ordinance No. VI. of 1878, prohibiting the sale of land to any but British or Turkish subjects; and of the Ordinance No. XVI. of 1879, confiscating uncultivated lands. The hon. Baronet said, that a few nights ago, in "another place," the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Salisbury), in answer to a Question put to him, stated that it was very desirable that the beginning of the rule of a new High Commissioner should be marked by a nearer assimilation to, and greater respect for, the habits of the population. That observation was no doubt made with regard to the particular case brought under the noble Marquess's notice; but the facts which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had to bring before the House would no doubt induce hon. Members to believe that there was some reason for making the arrival of the new Commissioner a fresh starting point for improved relations with that country. The despatches to which he called attention referred to statements, many of them made by him in that House, with reference to the government of the Island after it had been taken possession of by the English authorities, and the tone in which Sir Garnet Wolseley had written was shown by his speaking of a "small and insignificant clique of foreigners in the town of Limasol, who were prepared to make monstrous charges." The charges which had come from Limasol, however, were chiefly received not from a clique, but from a club of considerable size, whose members included but two foreigners, one of whom had been in Her Majesty's service at Constantinople, while the other was a Greek gentleman. Many of the charges which the despatches were intended to rebut were really confirmed by them. The Bishop of Citium and others complained that they had been threatened, in consequence of the representations that they had made. The allusion seemed to be to the Ordinance which gave power to the Government of Cyprus to exile anyone without a trial—a power against which the House should protest. Sir Garnet Wolseley, in the Correspondence respecting complaints made against his government, proceeded to consider the statement that petitions written in Greek had been refused, and it appeared from his despatch that such petitions, unless accompanied by a translation, had been refused in the local courts of Limasol and Paphos. It should be remembered that in the mountain districts of the Island there were no people who could speak Turkish. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) wished to know, whether it was not the fact that Turkish and English were the only official languages in Cyprus; and, whether it was not true that Greek, although the language of the vast majority of the people, was in no sense recognized in the Courts or Administration of Cyprus? Since our occupation of the Island there had been a disposition to administer the Sheri or sacred law, which was very offensive to the majority of the people, rather than the Nizam, which was a very modified form of Turkish law. Replying to Sir Garnet Wolseley on the subject of forced labour, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said that an Ordinance might be promulgated instituting forced labour; but that in no case were individuals to be punished for non-compliance with the Ordinance, for if individuals were punished, the Government “would be charged with setting up slavery.” But the forced-labour Ordinance, as it now stood, violated that instruction of the noble Marquess; the punishment for its infringement not being a fine upon a whole village, but a punishment directed against the individual. Sir Garnet Wolseley said, in his Correspondence, that he named the occasions upon which forced labour had been used; but it had been used on other occasions than those mentioned in Sir Garnet Wolseley’s Return. It had been used, without any payment at all, by Colonel Warren. The facts did not seem to support the statement of Sir Garnet Wolseley, that he paid the market price for his forced labour; and, indeed, it would not be necessary to have forced labour, if the market price of labour were paid. In Cyprus it was forced labour, of the Egyptian type, about which we had so often protested elsewhere. It was said that the people rather liked it; but then M. de Lesseps had said that the people of Egypt liked it. On page 5 of the Forced-Labour Correspondence would be found a substituted clause, under which an individual could be fined for non-compliance with the Ordinance, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs having first directed Sir Garnet Wolseley only to levy fines upon villages. He wanted to know whether that was not a mere juggle. They were told, over and over again, that people who could not pay their debts were sent in iron manacles to hard labour in prison. He should like to have some explanation of this. Those who did not pay their taxes were debtors to the State, and those who did not pay the fines imposed under the forced-labour Ordinance were liable to be sent to prison. For his part, he regarded the Ordinance as unwise in principle and injurious in practice. It was a fatal policy for this country to depart from the principles of freedom by which it had been uniformly guided, and to introduce into Cyprus a principle against which we had protested in the case of Egypt, and in the case of Turkey herself. Well, Sir Garnet Wolseley said that forced labour had not been imposed upon the people at half the usual rate of wages. That was so, no doubt, in parts of the Island; but in other parts it as undoubtedly had. The rates of labour varied according to the price of food and the condition of the people. In some parts the usual rate was 1s. a-day; in other parts it went very nearly up to 2s. a-day. There had also been forced labour without any payment at all. On that subject the Commissioner of Limasol had done something to confuse Parliament. He spoke of forced labour and of free labour. What was free labour according to Colonel Warren? It was forced labour for which he did not pay. He would now consider the inclosures forwarded by Sir Garnet Wolseley. In one, Colonel Warren said—

“The Bishop of Citium would be right had he stated that I declared the Ottoman Code and law to be still in force, and that I was bound to follow the ordinances of that law.”

But why should the Ottoman Code be allowed to remain in force when ten to one of the population were Greek-speaking people? The Commissioners in Cyprus and the Assistant Commissioners had all had letters and speeches sent to them, with a view that they should prepare replies to the charges preferred; but it would be seen that while each Assistant Commissioner contradicted a number of the statements made, they had all made admissions which, if they were all put together, made out the entire of the 22 charges brought forward. Colonel Warren admitted that a double tax was imposed; but he said that it was levied by the Turks, and that the over levy was now being repaid. Then, he denied that any priest had been manacled or condemned to hard labour. That assertion was utterly untrue, for they had the names of many who were manacled and who were made to labour in public. Colonel Warren, no doubt, made the statement believing it to be true; but the danger was that each Commissioner contradicted in sweeping terms things as having occurred in his district which really occurred elsewhere. With respect to manacling, they had the distinct admission made by Mr. Cobham, one of the Commissioners, in an excellent and admirable speech delivered after the shaving of the two priests, in which he stated that greater care must be observed in future, and in terms admitted the accuracy of the charge of manacling. Colonel Warren admitted that one priest had been compelled to work at hard labour; but he denied the statement that threats as to an exercise of the exile Ordinance had been used. What, however, was that Ordinance enacted for, if it were not intended to be given effect to? Colonel Warren asserted that the forced labour resorted to under the new Ordinance gave "universal satisfaction." All he could say was that the masses of letters he received from Cyprus spoke of a very different state of things. The witnesses he had cited in support of his statements on a previous occasion were disparaged by Sir Garnet Wolseley; but he could bring a host of others to give evidence to the same effect. As a matter of fact, however, he disputed everything said about the character of these witnesses by Sir Garnet Wolseley, who, apparently, had not acquainted himself with the facts of the case. When Sir Garnet Wolseley spoke of a charitable and educational institution so universally known as the Cypriote Fraternity of Egypt as a small Greek society, which had for its object the spread of disaffection in Cyprus, it was evident that he had not tried to put himself in sympathy with the mass of the population he had had to govern. His (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) statement was denied that corporal punishment had been resorted to by the Government of Cyprus; but what he had alleged was that it was practised by the cruel Turkish Zaptiehs who were under our authority. He had heard of a great number of cases of flogging, and also that people were tortured by marching them 30 or 40 miles wearing heavy Turkish manacles. The Zaptiehs employed were Mahomedans in nine cases out of ten; they were persons who did not know the wishes of the population, and it would have been far better for the Government to have employed Sikhs on this duty rather than Zaptiehs. Colonel Warren said that the Zaptiehs, as a body, were much improved; but then it appeared that one-half of them had been imprisoned. It appeared to him, as he had said, that throughout Sir Garnet Wolseley's despatches he had shown that he had not put himself in sympathy with the people of the Island, and, that being so, good government had not been secured. Information had been suppressed—the Greek newspapers had been kept back because it was thought that their circulation would be injurious to our interest; but still information upon the point had not been given, and the denial given by Sir Garnet Wolseley to his (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) statements appeared in most cases to be made on insufficient or inaccurate information. It was not true that "no priest had been manacled for debt under our rule"; and as for the statement that M. "Theocharis Mitzi" had never been rejected for a public office on the ground that he was a Greek, he held a letter in his hand from M. Mitzi's brother, affirming the statement, and mentioning the place where the event had occurred. The statement also that he had received from a late German Consular agent, to the effect that a capitalist at Larnaca was imprisoned and fined £25 for saying—"We believed the state of things would become better (under the British), and it has become worse," he insisted was worthy of inquiry. Then, as to the Courts, it was an admitted fact that English barristers could not plead in Cyprus; and if it was not true that all petitions addressed to the tribunals had to be in Turkish, the inhabitants in certain districts were undoubtedly under the impression that such a condition had to be complied with. Sir Garnet Wolseley stated that no taxes had been increased and no new ones had been imposed, and that all duties upon exports had been removed; but it was certain that a forest tax had been raised, or there had been a revival of an old Turkish tax which had not been enforced, and new duties had been levied at the landing stages, and on olives and wine, from which a considerable revenue was derived. M. Pitzis, of Larnaca, however, wrote that many taxes had been raised; that every commodity had been raised in price in consequence; and that people were not allowed to sell the stones from off their fields without paying £20 a-year and 5 per cent on the value of the stones sold. It was admitted by Colonel Warren that taxes had been paid twice over, because they had been returned. One Commissioner, Mr. Inglis, said the rule to prevent English barristers pleading had been applied in only one case. That meant that only one application had been made, because the refusal had deterred others from applying. Another Commissioner, Mr. Wauchope, denied that any labour had been forced; but it was admitted to have been forced outside his district. He said no one had been flogged "by order of the Government," and no one ever asserted that there had been any flogging by such "order." His extraordinary defence for compelling the majority of the population to petition in Turkish, which they did not understand, was that he compelled the English to do the same, thus compelling them also to have Turkish secretaries; while it was admitted that even the Cypriote Mahomedans spoke nothing but Greek, and that it was not easy to find "experts at writing strange languages," the "strange language" in this case being Greek. Could anything be more absurd? Since those statements were made, Sir Garnet Wolseley had changed the law and ordered Courts to receive petitions. As a matter of fact, however, the inhabitants had been put to great expense and labour by being obliged to go long distances in order to get petitions translated. He showed that the conduct of the Zaptiehs was good by stating that it had been necessary to imprison some of them. He said they were "not angels," and nobody supposed they were. He had unearthed one case of beating by a Zaptieh, for non-payment of taxes; but a good many more such cases had been "unearthed." Colonel Warren denied that a slaughter-house had been built by forced labour; but the statement was that it had been partially built by it. As to the water-works at Limasol, he admitted that he claimed the "four days' free labour allowed by law," and said "this free labour was in addition to paid labour." What was this but forced labour, for which he did not pay? It was admitted that prisoners were taken along the streets in manacles; and though this was said to be done to the worst characters only, such as robbers, murderers, and refractory criminals, it was really done to persons whose sole offence was debt for not having paid their taxes. Mr. Inglis out-Heroded Herod, and, in order to satisfy Sir Garnet Wolseley, went too far in his contradictions. He said—

Sir Charles W. Dilke

"I dismiss his (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) charge of the unsatisfactory condition of Famagosta. Suffice it to say, ophthalmia is almost unknown; and, in cases of blindness, it is not a fair criterion to take the beggars from the country as an example of unhealthiness of towns."

But Mr. Inglis did not notice the turned commas, and did not know he was contradicting a statement quoted from an official Report to the Admiralty, which actually stated that the whole population was afflicted with fever last year, half with ophthalmia, and that one-sixth were smitten with permanent blindness. Mr. Inglis quoted a case of forced labour, which Sir Garnet Wolseley had not mentioned in his list; for, speaking of the repair of a bridge, he said—

"I consulted the Mayor, a Greek, and we agreed the people must finish the labour. I paid the masons; and the people of Varosia, who preferred paying to working, paid the Turks of Famagosta for the labour."

It was clear that in this case some of the people paid in forced labour or its equivalent. The old Turkish practice of billeting the Zaptieh on the population, and supplying him with food and lodgings free, which not only was a severe tax on the people, but which frequently led to acts of violence, was one also which ought to be got rid of; and which, though it might have been done away with throughout a large portion of the Island, prevailed, if he was correctly informed, in Mr. Holbech's district only three months ago. As to the question of slavery, he could not see any allusion to it in the despatches from first to last, although that it was permitted to exist was one of the first charges which were brought against the Administration of Cyprus, and although he had, in the speech which he made on a former occasion, insisted strongly on the necessity of preventing slavery in Cyprus under the British flag. From the Report on the subject, he saw that the proposal for free labour—that was, for unpaid forced labour—was negatived by the vote of Colonel Biddulph. He wished to notice that particularly, because Colonel Biddulph was the new High Commissioner, and the vote which he gave on that occasion against forced unpaid labour showed that he was disposed to administer the Government in a liberal sense; and he could not but hope that in taking up the charge of the government of the Island he would continue to act on such principles. He had, he might add, recently received a letter from an English gentleman in Cyprus, in which he stated that slavery still existed. Its existence, he added, would, of course, be denied; but the Turks had negro servants, who could not get wages and who could not leave their masters. The jurisdiction question could never be forgotten. There was Correspondence between the Government and foreign Governments on that question, and especially there was a remonstrance by Italy. He hoped hon. Members would press for Papers on the subject. If the Correspondence between the Government and foreign Governments was concluded, and those Governments had accepted the existing state of affairs, then the time had come when Cyprus ought to be taken from the Foreign Office and handed over to the Colonial Office; because the Foreign Office had no experience on such questions as the Administration of Cyprus; whereas the Colonial Office had been long accustomed to deal with such questions in all parts of the world. As to the health question, he hoped the Government would make some statement. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War stated in August last, in reply to the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) and on the authority of Sir Garnet Wolseley, that only about six persons were in hospital in consequence of Cyprus fever; but he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) made it out that the number was then 906, and he awaited with interest the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's explanation on this point. He would also like to have an explanation with regard to complaints that had been made by foreign newspapers as to the Administration of Cyprus, and to the case of the two Greek priests, who, for trifling offences, had been deprived of their beards and sentenced to imprisonment. Respecting the latter, he would say no more than to hope that for the future, in punishing persons charged with offences against the law, care would be taken not to offend against the religious prejudices of the people. An article in The Neologos made precisely the same complaint as he did, of oppression of the Greek population, not emanating from the Commissioners, but from the interpreters. It complained that the English and Turkish languages were made the official languages of the Island, although the great majority of the inhabitants were Greeks; while the Greek holy days, which were most religiously observed by them, were set aside, and the Greek assessors compelled to attend to the performance of their official duties on those days. It stated, further, that in all questions between the Natives the local Courts were allowed jurisdiction; but in those in which the British Government was interested, those Courts were overridden by a sort of drumhead court martial. He had obtained from Cyprus copies of the Ordinances which he asked should be laid on the Table. The House would never recognize their character from mere acquaintance with their names. One of them actually confiscated any land left uncultivated for a year, and yet it was merely called an "Ordinance to Promote the Cultivation of Land." Such an Ordinance was altogether opposed to English habits and legislation. Another of these measures was called an "Ordinance Regarding the Sale of Land to Subjects of Foreign Countries;" but it absolutely prohibited the sale of land in Cyprus to anybody but the subjects of England and Turkey. Some time ago we entirely changed our own law on this subject, and he did not see why a retrograde step should be allowed in Cyprus. There was also an "Ordinance for Securing Peace and Good Order in the Island of Cyprus." It gave absolute power to the Government to banish from the Island, without trial or reason given, any person of whom they might disapprove. What were the circumstances which came to the knowledge of the Government, and induced them to enforce an Ordinance of that kind? There was a wish now to keep things quiet about Cyprus. He had asked for these Ordinances to be produced; but they were not forthcoming. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State, in answer to a Question he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had put to him on the subject, had refused to lay them on the Table, saying that he would put them in the Library. Some of them came out six months since, but they were not in the Library yet. He maintained, however, that they ought to be laid on the Table; for if they were placed in the Library they would never get into the newspapers. They ought to be issued and circulated, as they would then be discussed in the country, and the subject would be opened to the light of day; but that would never result from merely placing copies of those Papers in the Library. He had some time ago asked the Under Secretary of State a Question with regard to the expulsion of persons from the Island; and he replied that if a person were found to be objectionable as a resident he ought to be expelled. That was a curious admission, and when the hon. Gentleman complained of the terms in which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had referred to the matter, he could not help thinking of a passage in The Bourgeois Gentilhomme, in which M. Jourdain says that it is monstrous to call a certain individual marchand; the fact being that all he did was to buy things from persons whom he knew, and exchange them for money with certain other persons whom he had the privilege of knowing. There appeared to be a great wish to keep back information relating to Cyprus, the reason being, he believed, that there was now more doubt as to the wisdom of occupying the Island than there was at the time when the occupation took place. He would again ask, why was the Island kept under the Foreign Office? The Colonial Office managed Malta and Gibraltar, and surely it was equal to Cyprus. In conclusion, the hon. Baronet moved an Address for the Papers of which he had given Notice.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Mr. MONK, who had placed on the Paper a Motion—

"To call attention to the inaccuracy of certain Reports made by Sir Garnet Wolseley to Her Majesty's Government with regard to Cyprus, and contained in the Returns presented to this House on the 7th day of April and the 2nd day of May 1879," seconded the Motion. He thought it an unconstitutional exercise of power that the Government should have power to exile persons from Cyprus without trial. They ought to know the grounds on which the sale of land was prohibited to any but British or Turkish subjects, and why uncultivated grounds were to be confiscated. He had also to complain that correct information had not been sent home last August by Sir Garnet Wolseley with regard to the health of the troops. There had been a strange discrepancy between the official Reports as to the amount of sickness at Cyprus. It would be in the recollection of the House that, in August last, report after report appeared in the daily Press, stating that the health of our troops in Cyprus was deplorable. On several occasions the Secretary of State for War denied the truth of those reports, on the faith of despatches and telegrams from Sir Garnet Wolseley himself. On the 14th of August he (Mr. Monk) inquired what truth there was in the alarming report that had appeared in The Daily News as to the enormous increase of fever among the troops, as well as among the sailors and marines. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman replied that he had received the following telegram, on the 12th, from Sir Garnet Wolseley:—

"There is no serious illness among the troops. Some six cases are in hospital from the mild fever of the country."

Nothing could be more satisfactory or re-assuring than the reply of the Secretary of State. What, then, must have been the astonishment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman when he received the official Report of Surgeon General Sir Anthony Home, which stated that 25 per cent of the whole of the troops in Cyprus were either in hospital, or stricken down with fever or dysentery. Now, if the latter Report was correct, and there was no doubt it was, it was difficult to understand how Sir Garnet Wolseley could have made the statement he did. He could hardly have been so entirely misinformed as he appeared to be, and if he was not, what were they to think of the Governor who, at a time when the country was anxious as to the health of the troops, kept back those facts from the Department at Home? Sir Anthony Home said—

“The prevalence of fever augmented daily until in the week ending August 16th, the attacks were 372 in a strength of 2,366 men.”

It was not to be wondered at that the Secretary of State for War, who had been, from the first, most anxious to give all the information in his power to the House, and whose candour was above all praise, should have said that it was as much a puzzle to him as it was to some hon. Gentlemen, the discrepancy between the official accounts which he received and the accounts which appeared in the Press. He (Mr. Monk) awaited, with some curiosity, the explanation which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman might deem it his duty to give. He had much pleasure in seconding the Motion which had been moved by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke).

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Ordinance No. VIII. of 1879, giving power to the Government of Cyprus to exile persons without trial:

“Of the Ordinance No. VI. of 1878, prohibiting the sale of land to any but British or Turkish subjects:

“And, of the Ordinance No. XVI. of 1879, confiscating uncultivated lands,”—(Sir Charles W. Dilke,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

COLONEL STANLEY said, he did not propose to address himself to the general question which had been raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke); but he wished to make a few remarks with reference to the observations which had been addressed to the House by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). There was an undoubted discrepancy in the statements which had been made as to the health of the troops in Cyprus, which it was desirable to clear out of the way; but he had not been able to make himself fully acquainted with the facts of the case at present. At the same time, he wished to say that he was anxious to lay before the House and the country, at the earliest possible moment, all the information in the possession of the Government as to the health of the troops in Cyprus, and the hon. Gentleman had done him no more than justice in referring to his willingness to do so. In fact, many people blamed him last autumn for sending to the Press reports which were not favourable to the state of the health of the troops at Cyprus, but which, notwithstanding, he thought it his duty to lay before the public. In answering the Question of the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd), he admitted he could not deny that there was some discrepancy between the earlier telegrams and the Returns which were subsequently laid before the House; but from his knowledge of the character and antecedents of his gallant friend, Sir Garnet Wolseley, he could not for a single moment doubt that the telegrams forwarded were believed to represent the actual state of the facts as they existed. He had had no opportunity of asking his gallant friend what was the cause of those discrepancies; but he would, if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monk) wished, confer with Sir Anthony Home, who was now in this country, and who, it was possible, had with him the original notes from which the telegrams were framed. The earlier telegrams and letters were clearly sent home based upon the best information that could then be procured; but whatever he could further learn on the subject he would willingly communicate to the House. In the meantime he would refer those who required information in respect to the sanitary condition of the Island to Sir Anthony Home's Report, which showed him a man of science.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thanked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman for the candid statement he had made, and was of opinion that the House might implicitly rely upon his assurance that searching inquiries should be made with regard to the discrepancies. On the general question, he thought the despatches which had been produced proved that the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was right in bringing this question under the consideration of the House; and that he (Mr. Forster) was justified in giving to the Government the information he had received from gentlemen connected with Cyprus. That information was to the effect—Firstly, that our rule was conducted in a high-handed manner; secondly, that slavery still existed in Cyprus; and, thirdly, that we had introduced forced labour into that Island. In regard to the first point, he thought no one could read the defences made by the different Commissioners without seeing that there had been to some extent high-handed action; and, admitting that our officials had a very difficult duty to perform, he thought there was a great advantage in having the public opinion of this country brought to bear on the subject. If such things could happen, even with officials who wished to do right, it only showed how necessary it was to bring the question before the House. The treatment of the two priests was enough to show that great care was required in the administration of the law. As to slavery in Cyprus, it was remarkable that no attempt had been made to show that slavery did not exist. But the hon. Member for Chelsea's statement, which was from a credible source, showed that there was slavery in Cyprus, as there was in every country under the rule of the Turk. It was a matter which the Government ought certainly to look to. Had the Government published an Ordinance abolishing slavery, and if not, why not? If they had not done so, they ought not to lose a post in letting it be known that slavery was no longer legal in Cyprus. Again, why had the Government allowed the authorities in Cyprus to act in opposition to the Ordinance with respect to forced labour, which stated that there should be no punishment of the individual, while a fine had been imposed on individuals? The Government of Cyprus had also disregarded the instructions of Her Majesty's Government in other matters, and especially with regard to punishments; and he thought some explanation should be given as to why such things had been permitted. The fine imposed for the purpose of enforcing labour on the roads in Cyprus was clearly in opposition to the orders sent out by the Government; and he would likewise ask the Government why it had allowed its orders to be violated, and, more than that, whereas the old Turkish law required four days' labour on the roads, 30 days' labour was now exacted? There was no need of forced labour, and he trusted that the example set to the Turks and Egyptians in the English Government of Cyprus—and which was the only motive for its acquisition—would not be that of employing forced labour at less than the market price. He was glad to think that the Government had sent out as Commissioner to Cyprus a humane and efficient gentleman (Colonel Biddulph), and that they might take courage from what had occurred in India, and instruct the new Commissioner to abolish forced labour altogether.

Mr. GOLDNEY thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) could not have read the Ordinance referring to enforced labour; for anyone who did read it would see that the forced labour was practically an optional matter. If a man did not wish to serve, he was entitled to exemption on payment of 2s. a-day for a substitute, which meant practically the payment of half that sum, as the Government allowed 1s. for the labour performed. The labour that was enforced was for the construction of the necessary public works required for the protection of the Island, and the removal of causes of unhealthiness. If they did not enforce that labour, they would have to exact money in the shape of taxes for these works. The substitution, therefore, of labour for taxes was a benefit to the population. The town of Nicosia, where, a short time since, the drains were in a shocking state, had been made habitable by the labour of the people, whom the High Commissioner had caused to save themselves. He had himself been in Cyprus, attended by an interpreter, and had there learnt that, so far was it from being true that the people felt the present arrangement burdensome, in certain cases three and four times as many people applied for work at 1s. a-day as were required. He had an opportunity of visiting four of the six departments into which Cyprus had been divided; he attended the Courts; and in no country had he seen the administration of justice presided over by more excellent men than the Commissioners. He was astonished that they were able to combine so well the strength of military discipline with the qualities required in the administration of justice. The people seemed so contented that he was curious to ascertain how complaints could have arisen. An intelligent Greek told him that under their past government it had been the practice of the rich to oppress the poor, and of the poor to cheat the rich; that the taxes were assessed by oppressive Pashas, but payment was evaded by bribing the Pashas or their officials, and now the English made a direct and equal charge, the payment of which could not be evaded by bribery. Many said they were worse off, as regarded the amount paid, than they were under the oppressive Pashas. As to forced labour, he could not learn that there was any complaint of unfairness on the part of the Commissioners. The administration of the Post Office appeared to be efficient. At all four places he visited, he saw at the Courts petitions in Greek, as well as in Turkish and English. He was told that no petition was refused because it was in Greek, and that all Petitions, in whatever language they were presented, were translated and considered, and he could hear of no complaint on that subject. On the whole, the Zaptiehs were regarded as an excellent body of men; and it had transpired that one to whom he gave 1s. on leaving the prison at Nicosia, he believing that he ought not to have received it, had taken it to his commanding officer. There was no prison at Famagosta, and, therefore, use was made of a mosque, in which he found two prisoners who were not manacled. At Nicosia the prison was a large, well-built khan, but still not of sufficient space to confine all prisoners separately; and, therefore, in some of the cells or divisions two prisoners were chained together, but without any pretence of torture, and simply with a light chain, which was removed at night. When Sir Garnet Wolseley took charge of the Island, a number of Turkish prisoners were removed, and they were chained together as they walked down to the place of embarkation. He had a conversation with an intelligent Greek who had come over from Athens for the purpose of settling in Cyprus, and the Greek told him that the accounts which reached Athens of the condition of the Island under British administration were such that a great many Greeks were about to go over. One of the objects was to place the clergy on the same footing with regard to the laws as other people. With regard to foreigners not being allowed to purchase land, the law in Cyprus was the same as it had been in England. ["No!"] No alien, until the Act passed a few years since, could hold land in England, and now only by complying with the provisions of that Act. He believed that the Cypriotes were not dissatisfied with our administration of the Island; and he was satisfied that under our administration the country would flourish, and the acquisition of it would be, not only a great credit to this country, but of the greatest benefit to the welfare and prosperity of the people.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Goldney) has drawn for us a charming picture of Cyprus. According to his account, there are no grounds of complaint. Everybody is equal before the law. The Commissioners are unrivalled, and the people contented. That is a very interesting statement. It would have been more interesting still, considering the conditions which attend such an inquiry, if the hon. Gentleman had told us within what time it was that he was enabled to commence this inquiry, to conduct it, and to bring it to a close. That is a fact of very great interest to us, and I hope that, without breaking the Rules of the House, he will put us in some way in possession of that very important fact. The question whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Island for six months, or three months, or thirty days, or three days, has a very considerable bearing on the value of his information. There is another point on which I should like information. Who were the persons from whom he obtained his information? We have heard of an Athenian merchant who was on his way to Cyprus, and who expected—

MR. GOLDNEY begged pardon. He met him in Cyprus, and travelled with him from Nicosia to Cyræne.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am obliged to the hon. Member for his information. The hon. Member has told us, then, of one Athenian who had arrived in the Island, and of a great number of other Athenians who intended to go to Cyprus. What would be the opinion of these Athenians, when, upon arriving in Cyprus, they found that after the perfect system of law and administration which had been established there, they would not be able to hold a single inch of land in the Island. That is the state of things the hon. Gentleman admires. He may say that these Athenians ought not to come over to Cyprus without having ascertained the state of the law in the Island with regard to the land. Still we ought to have a little feeling for them. They would be aware that certain laws had prevailed under the Turkish Government; they would be aware that under that Government there was nothing to prevent them from holding land in Cyprus; they would be aware that England had gone to Cyprus, trumpeting forth her intentions to set an example of progress, advancement, and enlightenment, and I know not what else besides. We were to abolish all the abuses of the Turkish Government, to establish an enlightened rule, and to convert Cyprus, as far as possible, into an earthly paradise. How justly, then, would this Athenian, who was under the special patronage of the hon. Member opposite, be astounded to find not only that we had not converted Cyprus into this abode of felicity, although the Island had enormous natural advantages and resources, but that we had actually gone back upon the legislation of Turkey, and had taken away even what was good in her legislation. The very barbarism of Turkey led, in some instances, to the people having a good government. The Turks did not interfere to create a bad government when they found a good system—as with regard to the holding of land; but that good system we had abolished before we had been 12 months in the Island; yet the hon. Gentleman comes back here to assure us that everything is perfect. I should like, further, to inquire of the hon. Member in what language he conversed with the people of Cyprus?

MR. GOLDNEY: I said that I had an interpreter; but this Athenian spoke English as well as I did.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the hon. Gentleman spoke through an interpreter, it is still more important that we should know also how long was the time he employed in making these inquiries?

MR. GOLDNEY: I am quite willing to say. I was there four days, with every facility for travelling about.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman is most ingenuous, and I will not venture to say a single word further.

He has spoken most frankly and fully. I am perfectly satisfied with the reply, and I will not say another word upon the subject which does not bear on the nature of the inquiry, or on the conclusion to which he has come. The hon. Gentleman apologizes for a Government which confiscates uncultivated lands, giving as a reason that there is a great deal of land uncultivated. That is what I continually hear about the Highlands of Scotland. Districts there are continually pointed out which were inhabited by a considerable number of men and were cultivated until the last few years, but are now remaining entirely uncultivated, given up in some cases to sheep, in some cases to grouse—in more cases, still, to deer. Does the hon. Gentleman propose to introduce an Ordinance into this House for the confiscation of those lands? What sort of equality is that? He says all men are to be equal before the law. But what sort of equality does he mean? Does he still think this confiscation of land—[“No, no!”]—it is a confiscation; I am correct in saying that according to the words of the Ordinance—that this confiscation of land is really a liberal or an English method of legislation. Some distinction is to be drawn between Executive and Legislative proceedings. I am sure it is painful to think that with regard to the Executive proceedings there should have been such reason to complain in the case of the two Greek priests and the great Christian holidays of Christmas Day and Good Friday. I think my hon. Friend mentioned twice that a very solemn day with them is Good Friday. It is the old story. The English authorities go into a country possessed with the idea that there is no land in the world like England, and that the people of all other countries ought to conform to English customs, and that if they do not conform, so much the worse for them. This hunger for conforming the world, and the manner in which it is brought about, is, to me, a very serious matter. I will not dwell in detail upon the treatment of the Greek priests, because the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke) has been so good as to intimate to me that the Correspondence will be produced. It will be much better to wait until I see precisely what has taken place before making this a matter for comment. I also thank him for informing me, what has been publicly stated, that a reprimand has been administered to the person who was guilty of what was called in "another place" by the very mild name of a "miscarriage," but what I should call an outrage. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goldney) says this is really the old story of the claim of the Greek clergy to be tried by a tribunal of their own. Well, Sir, the hon. Gentleman, in those four days which he employed so well, had time to learn, if he was not aware of it before, that this exemption of the clergy is essentially a part of the Turkish Constitution under which these people have lived during all the long centuries that they have been a subject race. It is not the assertion of a claim against the law; it is the law, as made by the Turks. This is to save themselves from the trouble of civil government, for which they felt themselves to be not the most qualified race in the world. If you abolish that; if you bring the priests under equal laws—and I quite agree that this is a object to contemplate—you should take care what kind of laws they are under which you bring them, and you should be quite sure that you do not begin to act in total ignorance of the feelings and the customs of the country, and the condition and views of the priests; and, secondly, that you do not inflict upon them a wound in their tenderest feelings, their sense of honour and of shame, under cover of this general doctrine of equality. In your zeal for improvement, you are going to establish perfect equality before the law. But what is the system established in Cyprus? I am not going to pronounce a censure upon anybody in particular, for I do not know enough of these proceedings, or who is responsible for them, to be at all able to pronounce upon the degree of merit or of blame that may be due to any of the different persons who have been engaged in the government of the Island. So far as Sir Garnet Wolseley is concerned, I think in sending him him there, so far as I may judge from my intercourse with him six or seven years ago, that Her Majesty's Government made a choice as fair and judicious as could have been desired. Nevertheless, we must look at these things as they are in themselves. I entirely disclaim entering into the question of the merits of individuals; but I must point out to the Government that the state of things there is one which cannot be endured in silence, either by the people of this country, or by a large portion of the Members of this House; and unless a very different system is pursued from that which is represented to us to-night, or unless it can be shown that that representation has been a very mistaken representation, the subject of Cyprus will simply be another subject thrown into the cauldron of our political troubles, like many others recently forced upon our notice. It will make further and urgent demands upon the time of the House, and will be a matter of anxious and complicated contention until a great change is established. What appear to be the main facts of the case as far as they are at present before us? In the first place, it does not appear that slavery can be asserted to have been abolished in the Island, and that is the contention of my hon. Friend. I do not understand that that contention has as yet been distinctly and intelligibly denied. Recollect, the whole justification of your taking Cyprus, in the eyes of the world, if you have a justification for it, rests upon your own determination and your power to make it an example of good and rational government. Let us test your proceedings by that rule. You have not, so far as we are aware, abolished slavery. I come, then, to the point of forced labour. How does that stand? The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goldney) says that he found in Cyprus that there was no forced labour. But what is the use of debating about terms? Why, if there is none, are you obliged to resort to positive enactments of law to get labour at all? If you build Houses of Parliament in this country, you do not resort to law to get the labour; while you tell me that you can get nobody to work in Cyprus, without a law to make him do it. Why, then, do you do it? Why do you come down upon the individual and fine him in order to make him apply for the work? There is no doubt about it. I will appeal to the candour of the Under Secretary of State, and he will correct me if I am wrong; for I do not want to exaggerate in the least, and the matter, as I understand it, is a little complicated. You make a list of the able-bodied men in the Island, and to them you say by law—"Either you must present yourselves at a certain time to give your labour upon public works, and be paid for it at 1s. a-day"—[Mr. GOLDNEY: Not less than 1s. a-day.]—The law is satisfied with 1s. a-day, and, therefore, I put it so. "You must either appear and work and receive"—I will put it in that way—"1s. a-day, or send a substitute, or pay a fine of 2s. for not coming. If you do not come after being duly summoned, you must pay 5s.; or if you come and go away, you must pay 25s." It is a little complicated, but the essential point of it is that there is now plenty of labour in Cyprus, but its value is more than 1s. a-day. [Mr. GOLDNEY: No!] The resources of information of the hon. Gentleman have reached such a point that it is not for me to suppose that any information coming from my correspondents, although they have lived very long indeed in the Island, and know all the circumstances, can compete with his marvellous four days' sojourn. I am told that 1s. a-day does not come up to the value of wages—

Mr. Gladstone

MR. GOLDNEY: I do not think the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) quoted from more than one district; I quoted from four, and saw people who were anxious to get work at the price.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir Garnet Wolseley's own statement is that the average is 1s. 3d.

MR. GLADSTONE: The average stated by Sir Garnet Wolseley is 1s. 3d. If that is so, what is the wisdom, the policy, the necessity of interfering with the free sale by each man of the only commodity many of them have to dispose of—their labour—in order to gain to the extent of 3d.? Is that the example of the enlightened legislation which is to make Cyprus the envy and pattern of the East; and to add to the glories of England in that quarter of the world? So much, then, for forced labour. I will not dwell upon that any more. Evidently, it is a penal interference, to a certain extent; to the extent of a fine and to the difference between the shilling which a man can claim and the average rate paid. That constitutes a very severe law, which, in this country, would not be a law to be dreamt of, certainly not to be endured for a single moment. Then, as to a very important point—the holding of land. We have actually gone back upon the Turkish system. Before we came to the discussion of this matter, it was always supposed that, however objectionable the acquisition might be, yet, that it would be attended with one advantage—namely, that the people could not possibly get anything but benefit from the change; that nothing could possibly be worse than the system of the Turks. But we have discovered a method which is a great deal worse, and we have introduced a restriction which appears to me quite outrageous. You have here an Island which is inhabited by a population of whom, I believe, nearly four-fifths are Greeks, and to this people you say—"No Greek, none of your blood, none of your race, shall hold land in this Island, unless he be a subject of Turkey." That is a restriction Turkey herself never imposed. It is impossible that these things can stand. They must be the subject of perpetual discussion, and I hope that the warning will be taken in time, and that they will be amended. But I am sorry to say we have not yet mentioned the worst of all—in my opinion, by far the worst. It is that astounding Ordinance which is called an "Ordinance for Promoting Peace and Order in the Island of Cyprus." I really want to know whether I stand in an Assembly of Englishman. [A laugh.] The hon. Member laughs. He has no reason to laugh. It is no subject for laughter. Let him reserve his laugh till he has heard what I am going to say. I want to know whether I stand in an Assembly of Englishmen—within the four walls of the British House of Commons, the highest and the noblest of all temples of liberty, when I am called upon to examine this Ordinance. This is no new subject. This is the old shame, scandal, and disgrace of the English Protectorate in the Ionian Islands again revived. Every man in the Island of Cyprus is to hold his liberty and his property at the absolute mercy and discretion of what is called the Governor in Council. Is it possible to conceive a more complete destruction of personal liberty? I was a great deal more than four days in the Ionian Islands, and I know what the result of this system was there. One would suppose, when we hear of a law of this kind, enabling the Governor, by a secret proceeding, and not only by a secret proceeding, but, if my hon.

Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) is right, by an Ordinance which was, itself, kept secret—I hope that that, at least, will be denied and refuted—to remove from the Island for any time he pleases, for any cause he pleases, under any circumstances he pleases, without warning of any kind, any inhabitant of the Island. We know the history of this in the Ionian Islands. The system there went under the name of “the Power of High Police,” and it is precisely this power which is now revived. It is true that there was this to be said of Sir Thomas Maitland, the first Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, that he never passed an Ordinance upon the subject. He had such a sense of liberty that he would not embody in the terms of a law provisions so adverse, so contradictory, and so destructive of the first element of British liberty, or of liberty anywhere in the world. Go to Russia, of all places, with your Ordinance. Ask Cetewayo to approve it, for it is worthy of him. Is it possible that any hon. Gentleman, though sitting upon that front Bench, can think it a matter to be treated with ridicule that an Executive officer in the Island as the Representative of a foreign Power, on his appointment to that Island, is to be entitled to banish whom he pleases, to remove a man from his property, and his occupation, and to send him where he chooses. Is this to be treated with laughter and derision? It may be so. But these are matters which will have to be considered by the people of this country, for whom the question will be, whether the principles of liberty are not violated by such proceedings as these. One would suppose that we were dealing with a population of a most formidable description; that they are people given to plotting; that the whole history of their subjection to Turkey has been marked by a series of bloody revolts; and that nothing but the exercise of a despotic and violent tyranny can possibly preserve the peace of the Island. Is that the case? On the contrary, these people are among the most peaceable and easily-governed people upon the earth. I say, in some sense to their credit, in some sense to their shame, that they never have had enough of the spirit of manhood to rise even against the grossest oppression. But this is again the old game of the Ionian Islands played over again. There we had to govern a set of the most pacific and peaceable human beings. [“No, no!”] The hon. and gallant Admiral does not know those persons as I have done. I have been responsible for the management of their affairs; I have had an opportunity of examining them minutely; I have reported upon them fully to a British Government, which was also a Conservative Government; and the views I reported to the Government were adopted, both by my excellent Friend Lord Lisgar, who preceded me, and my distinguished and gallant Friend Sir Henry Storks, who followed me in that government. The people of this Island, I repeat, are the most pacific, the most contented, the most easily-governed people in the world. There is no county in England more easy to govern, so far as the government is concerned. I do not mean to say that they are a people advanced in all respects. In some respects, undoubtedly, they are wanting; but they are a most peaceable people. What happens? When we go into a country, the very worst of the Natives make it their business to form a ring round us to flatter us, to give us pretended information, and to malign their country for their own convenience and advantage. They take advantage of the little aptitude possessed by Englishmen for considering the feelings of foreign nations, and of travellers who go among them for three or four days, and they fill their minds with ideas most honestly sought, no doubt, and most honestly received, but ideas coloured according to the prejudices of those informants. They take advantage, also, of our ignorance of the language, and of the very great difficulty in holding full communication with the people, even when more than four days are given to the work. And in that way we have had in the Ionian Islands extreme severity, I will even say cruel and shameful severity, marking the proceedings of the British in the exercise of their Administration. For God’s sake, do not let us have that experience over again! Why do we begin our government here by destroying the safeguards of liberty? [“Oh, oh!”] You cannot surely deny that you do destroy the safeguards of liberty when you enable the head of the Executive, on his own responsibility, to destroy a man’s occupation and to banish him from his country. You may tell me that power will be mildly exercised. That is what the Emperor of Russia and every man in Russia tell us of their system—that it is mildly exercised. At any rate, in Russia I know this—that the power is exercised by a Native Governor, endeared, in some sense, to the people; at any rate, habituated to the ways of the people by the association of many centuries. But we went to Cyprus by force. No man belonging to Cyprus was consulted on the question whether we should come there or not. The bulk of the inhabitants belonged to a race proud of its traditions, though it has not the same manhood to enforce their ideas that we have. Therefore, we should treat them tenderly, delicately, and with consideration. Do not destroy the safeguards of their liberty. I can only say that I wait, with the greatest interest, to know whether the Under Secretary of State will defend this Ordinance or not. It appears to me that there are no words to be employed which are too strong for its condemnation. It is by judicial trial in Cyprus, as in England, that private liberty ought to be sustained. You are not in a state of war, or in danger of war. You can say you are in danger there. There is nobody to molest you. You are omnipotent, so far as brute force is concerned. You have not a tittle, or a rag, or a shred of title to resort to measures of that class, which may, perhaps, be justified under extreme circumstances and in extreme contingencies. I do entreat the Government not to allow this state of things to be established. Unfortunately, we have known in our Ionian experience what the consequence was, when a spirited foreign policy induced some Foreign Minister of England to reproach Austria with her proceedings in Italy. Austria had a ready and stereotyped reply. It was, "Look at the Ionian Islands!" and it was very difficult for the Foreign Minister of that day to make a severe rejoinder to that reply. We have atoned for our miscarriages and our misdeeds in that country by giving to the people, in the fullest and freest manner, what they think to be the full and adequate blessing of liberty. Do not let us raise anew, in this country, which, although it be small, and although it be feeble—aye, absolutely powerless—is yet a country, our assumption of a Sovereignty over it which has attracted the notice of the world—a treatment which will have much to do with the future name and fame of England in the East.

MR. BOURKE thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had been somewhat hard upon the hon. Gentleman the Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), who had made to the House a statement based upon his short experience in Cyprus. It was true that the experience of the hon. Gentleman was short; but it was not fair to suggest, in terms of passionate invective, that the statement of the hon. Member was one which had been carefully fabricated, in order that it might be imposed upon the House. The hon. Gentleman had made his speech in good faith, and the statements he had put forth were just as reliable as those contained in the Blue Books, inasmuch as they were the statements of a Gentleman who had carefully guarded himself against making any statement which could not be supported by evidence based upon facts within his own knowledge. He (Mr. Bourke) did not think that his hon. Friend had said one single word which anyone, having had an experience of four days, was not entitled to say, and he was as entitled to give his opinion on matters which had come to his own knowledge as anyone having an experience of four years. With regard to the general question before the House, he was extremely anxious not to say one word which, if reported in Cyprus as coming from a Representative of the Foreign Office in that House, could have the effect of embittering the feelings which already existed between the Governors and the governed in that country. He believed that a great deal of mischief had already been done by statements which had received an exaggerated colour in this country, and which had, to a certain extent, disturbed the relations existing between the persons in the Island of Cyprus, relations which, on all grounds, it was desirable to leave upon as friendly a footing as possible. He did not, for one moment, complain of the various charges and statements which had been from time to time brought forward in that House. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had, as they all know, paid great attention to this subject, and he had brought forward his case from time to time with very great skill, and he (Mr. Bourke) might say, with the skill of a practised advocate. No doubt, he had made the very best of his case. To put the whole case in a few words, as it had been presented to the House from time to time by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, he thought it was simply this—that he had taken isolated facts from time to time, and had put these isolated facts before this House and the country, as representing the general state of things in the Island of Cyprus. Isolated facts formed the whole justification for the hon. Baronet's speech, for he said that all his statements were borne out, if they would only take one case and another; because, by taking a few cases, there was hardly a statement that had been made in that House that had not been completely admitted either by the Deputy Commissioners or by the Commissioner. Therefore, the hon. Baronet justified the whole of the charges made against the Administration of the Island, simply because, in various cases, some very small and isolated matter had taken place. With regard to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich upon the Ordinances, the most convenient course would be for him (Mr. Bourke) to take the cases he had put. He had to complain against the right hon. Gentleman, for he had not quoted the Ordinances to which he had referred correctly, nor had he given the House to understand accurately what he described. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would admit that he said that it was in the power of the High Commissioner, after consultation with the Executive Council in the Island, to exile any man without trial. To that, he (Mr. Bourke) would reply that it was not so. The Ordinance to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded, as having been in force in the Ionian Islands, was very different. The Ordinance in Cyprus gave the power in question to the Legislative Council of Cyprus. That was, the Legislature had power to exile any man; but nothing of that kind could take place unless the Council passed a resolution to that effect, and that resolution must be sent to the Secretary of State. That was a very different description of the Ordinance from that given by the right hon. Gentleman. That Ordinance was passed by Sir Garnet Wolseley, because he had been given to understand that, in all probability, there would be a rush of all sorts of bad characters from every part of the Levant the moment it was known that Cyprus was about to be occupied by the English. Sir Garnet Wolseley considered that the Legislature ought to be given that power, for the purpose of securing peace and good order in the country. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that the Government had made the mistake of trying to govern Cyprus in accordance with British ideas. That was exactly the reverse of what the Government had done. The Government had given a Legislative Council to Cyprus. Although they had not agreed upon every particular connected with the occupation of Cyprus, they had thought it better, considering the novelty that must attach to all that was done in the Island, to allow laws to be passed; although, at first sight, they might appear to be different to such as would have been initiated in this country. But, having given legislative power to the Council in Cyprus, the Government thought it desirable not to interfere, at any rate, for the present, with the laws that might be passed, although the laws would not have been initiated by Her Majesty's Government in this country. That was the real reason, if he might say so, for these Ordinances. The laws with respect to waste lands had been passed under exactly similar circumstances. When Sir Garnet Wolseley had his attention turned to the waste lands of the Island, he perceived that, owing to the lazy way in which the inhabitants were allowed to live, and the lazy way in which they cultivated their land, a vast quantity of land in the Island was left in a totally uncultivated condition. He endeavoured to discourage that plan, and passed an Ordinance with the object of encouraging the cultivation of waste lands. As respected the law relating to the non-purchase of land, it was due to a belief by Sir Garnet Wolseley that a vast number of land speculators would, unless prevented, rush upon the Island and purchase property. There were many reasons why it was thought desirable that the land should not fall into the hands of land speculators, particularly as Sir Garnet Wolseley considered it very desirable that public works should be carried on on such land, which might fall into the hands of speculators, and which would have been impossible had the speculators to whom he had alluded not been checked. It would be a mockery for the House and for the Government to give a Legislative Council to Cyprus, and then step in and take the power of legislation out of the hands of the Council. He thought, however, that it was right and proper, and very likely it would be quite necessary, for the Secretary of State, when a more extended experience had been gained, to repeal many of the Ordinances relating to Cyprus. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen cheered ironically, as if he had ever said the contrary. He had always given the House to understand that that was his opinion, and that opinion he had always entertained. It was impossible, in governing in Cyprus, to introduce laws at once which would be suitable for all circumstances of the population. They had given to the Legislative Council a power of initiating legislation, and it was quite possible that the Secretary of State might think it advisable to repeal some of these Ordinances; but, if so, there would be no difficulty in doing it. The attention of the Secretary of State would, no doubt, be called to those Ordinances, particularly by the debate that had taken place that night. The attention of the new Commissioner would also be called to the question raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, and the Government at Home would, in a great measure, be guided in their action by his Reports. Sir Garnet Wolseley held such strong opinions upon the Ordinances that the Government did not think it desirable at once to do away with them. The hon. Baronet had drawn attention to certain statements, which he quoted at very great length. He would not detain the House by going over the ground traversed by the hon. Baronet, when he complained of Sir Garnet Wolseley's despatch; but he ought to have remembered the circumstances under which that despatch was written. Nothing could be more offensive to Sir Garnet Wolseley, or more hurtful to his feelings as an honourable man, and nothing could be more injurious to his reputation as a great administrator, than the allegations that had been brought forward in that House by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea. But he (Mr. Bourke) knew the hon. Baronet too well to think that he would have made one single statement upon that occasion without being impressed himself with the belief that it was true. He was sure that the hon. Baronet was convinced that everything he stated was justifiable; but he would ask any calm mind to read those despatches which had come home in answer to the speech of the hon. Baronet, and he did not think it could be doubted that the substance of those charges which had been brought against Sir Garnet Wolseley's administration had been altogether rebutted. Then, again, the hon. Baronet had alleged that all his statements were justified, because of the action of the Deputy Commissioners. In particular, he had singled out Colonel Warren for his attacks. Well, considering the arduous duties that that gallant officer had been called upon to perform, and the manner in which he had discharged them, he (Mr. Bourke) was not surprised that Colonel Warren had warmly resented what had been publicly stated of him. He thought he should be justified in taking that opportunity of stating what Sir Garnet Wolseley said about Colonel Warren. He said—

Mr. Gladstone

"Before quitting this part of the correspondence, I wish to put on record my high appreciation of the manner in which Colonel Warren has carried on the difficult duties of his office—duties rendered all the more difficult through the conduct of the Bishop, who, instead of setting the people an example of obedience to the law, as their spiritual head, seems to have taken pleasure in breaking it, and in endeavouring to place itself above its power. I know that Colonel Warren's exertions to improve the sanitary conditions of Limasol, to supply its inhabitants with good water, to protect the poor from the exactions of the rich, to administer the law impartially to all classes irrespective of race, religion, or position, to make all respect it, by showing that the rich Bishop as well as the poor workman must obey it, and that the rich Bishop should pay his taxes as well as the humble shopkeeper—I know well that all this which Colonel Warren has done is highly appreciated by the great bulk of the people of his district."

Now, was that true, or was it false? If it were false, it was as black a falsehood as was ever penned by any man; but, if true, it substantially refuted the imputations that had been made, and made not in a fair or candid way, against Colonel Warren. The explanations that had been brought forward, to his (Mr. Bourke's) mind, amply proved that this was the case, and he thought that those explanations had been admitted by the hon. Baronet. There were several other charges made, which were not exactly in the same way. It was said that the taxes had been paid twice over. This was put forward as being quite the usual thing in Cyprus. The hon. Baronet alleged that taxes were usually paid twice over; and he justified his assertion, because in one case double taxes were demanded—and in respect of that case the tax collector had been punished. That was an example of the whole way in which this case against the administration of Cyprus had been got up. Then, with regard to barristers not being allowed to practice in Cyprus. The hon. Baronet had stated that no English barrister was allowed to practice in Cyprus. That was not exactly the case.

Mr. Bourke

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE remarked, that he said they were not allowed to practice before the district Court.

MR. BOURKE said, that made all the difference in the world, because there were two reasons why Sir Garnet Wolseley did not think it desirable to allow English barristers to practice. It was only in the district or local Court, to which the prohibition extended; they were Courts found in the Island, and the only difference made in them was to appoint an English assessor. The administration of the law in those local Courts was continued together with the law which was formerly administered, one of which laws was that a barrister was not to be allowed to practice without the leave of the superior authority. English barristers had not obtained the leave of the superior authority, and, therefore, they could not practice. These were not Turkish Courts now; but they were local Courts continued under British administration. Besides which, as the Judges could not understand English, and the English advocates did not understand Turkish or Greek, it did not appear to Sir Garnet Wolseley that the interference of English advocates would contribute much to the due administration of justice. With regard to the petitions, the hon. Baronet had made a great deal that night, as he had done on previous occasions, of the question of petitions. The allegation of the hon.

Baronet was that petitions were refused if they were not in the Turkish tongue; and he had mentioned one or two cases in which Greek petitions had not been received, and the Judges had been reprimanded for refusing them. On the other hand, it had been shown that Sir Garnet Wolseley had received thousands of Greek petitions. He had nothing to complain of with regard to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). He entirely agreed with him in thinking that he was fully justified in bringing the questions he had under the notice of the Government. The Government were very glad to have those questions brought to their notice; but discretion ought to be exercised in making charges in that House against officers performing difficult duties in Cyprus. It should be remembered that those gentlemen had not the power of answering these charges; and they all knew that in that country the population had a talent for intrigue, which it was extremely injudicious to foster. Nothing would tend more to disturb the relations between the races of the people and the persons who governed in Cyprus, than to foster their intrigues in that House. It could do the population of Cyprus no good, and would do a great deal of harm. Something had been said that night with regard to slavery. There was no need for him to stand up in that House and say that the Government would not countenance slavery in any shape or form. The right hon. Gentleman had done them the justice to say that they had done a great deal in different parts of the world in the suppression of slavery; and, therefore, there could be no doubt of the feeling of the Government generally on this subject. With regard to slavery in Cyprus, there could be no doubt that slavery existed still in the Turkish Dominions, and Cyprus, until the other day, was a Turkish possession, and there could be no doubt that slavery existed there. There was, also, no doubt—and he was quite ready to answer the question put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich on that point—that no Ordinance had been passed to abolish slavery. But there had been no single attempt, directly or indirectly, to give legal effect to the status of slavery in the Island. He knew of no law with regard to it; and he should be surprised to hear of any court, local or otherwise, in which an English assessor was sitting, which had permitted the process of the court to be used to give effect to slavery in any shape or form. If that were the case, nothing was to be said against Sir Garnet Wolseley. The Government had not been asked by the Legislative Council to pass any law with regard to slavery. If they had been asked to pass one for the repression of slavery, no doubt, they would give a hearty assent to it. But, like all other laws, the Government would like it to be initiated there. At present, no grievance had been shown to have arisen from slavery; but it was for that House to consider whether any grievance had been shown. He did not think that a single syllable had been said to show that any law of this kind was necessary. One or two remarks had been made by the hon. Baronet with regard to the Council. There were questions between foreign Governments which made it desirable that Cyprus should, for the present, remain under the Foreign Office; but he did not know that at the present moment the Colonial Office was not as well able to manage it as the Foreign Office. But that was a matter of very small moment. With regard to Good Friday, there had been but one Good Friday since we took possession of the Island, and he hoped that before the next had arrived the cause of complaint would be removed. He quite agreed that what occurred was a scandal, and nothing could be more impolitic than giving rise to it. It was a great pity that the scandal had arisen. With regard to the two priests, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had truly stated that he (Mr. Bourke) had informed him that the officer had been reprimanded for not taking care that the priests were not shaved. He might mention how the thing happened, not by way of palliation, but as some excuse. It happened in this way. One priest was sentenced to seven days' imprisonment, and the other to imprisonment for a month. He did not think that the justice of the sentence was in question, but the prison regulation permitting shaving. A rule had been laid down by Sir Garnet Wolseley, with regard to prison regulations, that no priest should be shaved who was not imprisoned for a period of more than three months. That was very creditable to the Government of Cyprus, for it showed plainly that they had some regard for the feelings of the priests. The regulation, however, was one which, of course, was subject to consideration. There was only one more remark that he would wish to make. The hon. Baronet seemed to have implied that there were some doubts in the minds of Her Majesty's Government as to the wisdom of retaining Cyprus. Well, all he should say upon that subject was that he had not heard of those doubts, and he had seen no signs of them. He thought that Her Majesty's Government were quite as determined as ever they were to do all they could to improve the condition of, and give good government to, Cyprus, and to maintain it in the position in which it was at present. He had the same sympathy as some other hon. Members for the Hellenic race; but he did not think that having such sympathy was any reason whatever why Her Majesty's Government should throw over Cyprus. He was glad to inform the House that Her Majesty's Government had not the slightest intention to allow Hellenic intrigue to take root in Cyprus. They thought it was desirable for the good government of the Island that no such intrigues took place, and the Government would do its best to prevent them occurring. Having said this much, he hoped that the House would excuse him from entering further into the speech at that hour of the night; but he could assure the hon. Baronet, in conclusion, that if he had, from time to time, any complaint to make with regard to the government of Cyprus, either in general terms or in detail, the Foreign Office would be happy to receive any information which he could give. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Baronet, Her Majesty's Government did not make a practice of laying Ordinances before the House. They thought it would be better for the management of the Island that the Papers should not be laid before the House; but if the hon. Baronet was anxious to obtain them, the Government had no objection that the Ordinances referred to should be printed and put in the Library. At present, the Government had not arrived at any conclusive opinion as to the justice of those Ordinances. He would remind the House that those Ordinances had been passed by the Legislative Council; and what was passed by it was law, until it was rejected by Her Majesty's Government. All Ordinances passed were law in Cyprus, and it was impossible to do away with those Ordinances until experience had proved that they were inexpedient. At the same time, he had no objection to those Ordinances being made into a Parliamentary Paper.

Mr. Bourke

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that it was a long time since any English Government had used such language as the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had used that night on the subject of slavery; and the people of England would be astonished at such language being used on behalf of the Government with regard to slavery. The hon. Gentleman had said that he thought it possible that slavery existed in Cyprus, and that he had no doubt it did. He (Sir William Harcourt) should have thought that such a statement would have been followed by an assurance that Her Majesty's Government had taken the earliest step possible to do away with it. Not at all. The hon. Gentleman went on to say—"There is not much harm in it; it has not come to my knowledge that a case has come before the Courts." Was that the sort of thing that they had been used to hear in this country for the last 50 years on the subject of slavery? All the hon. Gentleman said was that the Legislative Council had not proposed to abolish it. The English Government was waiting for the Legislative Council of Cyprus to deal with such a matter as that. All the hon. Gentleman said was that the Government could not take the initiative, and would not send instructions to the Council of Cyprus to abolish slavery. The Government would not interfere with the initiative of the Legislative Council of Cyprus, but would wait until it thought proper to abolish slavery! It seemed to him (Sir William Harcourt) that that was a most extraordinary statement for the Government to make. First, it was said in that House that slavery existed in Cyprus, and then the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs followed it up by saying that the Government waited for the initiative of the Legislative Council to abolish it. Why did the Government not put the matter in hand at once, and abolish slavery, if such a thing as slavery existed? He said it was very probable that slavery did exist; but he did not think the Government should interfere to abolish it until the Legislative Council took some view in the matter. He (Sir William Harcourt) would venture to say that the English nation would be extremely surprised to find that such language as that was held by the English Government. For the first time for the last 50 years had such language as that been used. There were various observations with regard to Cyprus as to which the Under Secretary of State had given no reply. Upon the question of forced labour he had not said a single word. What did the right hon. Member for Bradford point out upon that subject? He pointed out that the Secretary of State had permitted the Governor of Cyprus to put penal liabilities upon the inhabitants in respect of forced labour. Although such a question as that demanded an answer, no reply to it had been given by the hon. Gentleman. As to the question of forbidding people who were not born Natives of Cyprus to hold land, perhaps the Government relied for its legal defence upon the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney). That hon. Gentleman was four days in Cyprus, and having spent four days in Cyprus, and having studied law, he made this monstrous assertion—that in that country foreigners could not hold land. Perhaps the hon. Member did not know that an Act of Parliament was passed some years ago permitting foreigners to hold land in England on the same terms, and in the same manner, as English subjects could do. Well, the hon. Member got up and defended this Ordinance in Cyprus, on the ground that the same law prevailed in England. That was all the explanation that had been offered upon this subject. With regard to the Ordinance to which his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had referred, as to exiling persons, what explanation had been given? It had been said that there was a perfect safeguard, because the Commissioner only had power to do it with the assent of the Legislative Council. What was the Legislative Council? They might just as well defend an act of Charles the First, because that King did it with the advice of the Star Chamber. The Legislative Council was nothing more nor less than a Court of Star Chamber. There was no Representative Council, and it had no judicial character. It was not necessary that the Ordinance should have the slightest sanction; so long as the Council nominated by the Governor chose to agree with him these Ordinances might be passed. The explanation offered by the Under Secretary of State upon this subject had not removed one single objection to the Ordinances. The action of the Legislative Council was nothing more than that of a Star Chamber, proceeding conjointly with the High Commissioner; and he agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that it was necessary to have debates upon that subject, in order to compel the Government to take proper views upon this question. The Government had had these Ordinances before them for many months. The question of slavery, and the question of forced labour, and the character of the Ordinances with regard to exile at the instance of the High Commissioner and the Legislative Council, had all been before them. But justice was not to be obtained in these matters from the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and was only to be obtained by debates in that House. It was plain that, so long as Ordinances of this kind were made, the only thing that could be done was to have discussions of that kind, as that was the only way they could force Her Majesty's Government to give some consideration to these matters. It was clear that not one single word of these Ordinances which had been passed could be possibly retained. The policy of the Under Secretary of State would not hold water, when he stated that if there were bad laws in Cyprus it was not the fault of the Government, but they would be dealt with when occasion arose. He admitted that good laws must be more or less a question of time. But the worst laws were not those which it was necessary to abolish in Cyprus, but those which had been made for it. The complaint was that the Government were instituting laws which were worse than those which they abolished. That was the charge which was brought against these Ordinances and against the Government. These Ordinances, which his

hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea wished to have laid upon the Table, existed by the authority of Her Majesty's Government. No doubt, no Ordinance had been made upon the subject of slavery; but that was a question which could not be allowed to rest for one single day. He could not admit that the law which existed was right, and that it was possible to temporize with the matter. It was a shame and a scandal to the English Government that, as soon as their occupation of Cyprus took place, they did not put an end to slavery. Everyone remembered the manner in which Lord Palmerston made an impression upon other Governments in respect of slavery. What could England say in the face of another Government, after what had been stated by the Under Secretary of State, that they did not care much about this subject of slavery, and that the initiative of the abolition of slavery in the Island had been left to the Legislative Council? Then, with respect to the land laws, the Under Secretary of State stated that foreigners had been prohibited from holding land in Cyprus owing to the fear of land speculators. They had excluded foreigners from the Island; but he would venture to say that no land speculator would venture there. After the wretched experiments they had made in Cyprus, there would be very few land speculators venture there. It was plain that they would not go there, and the only residents that were remaining in Cyprus were the soldiers and officers and persons employed. The very last place that persons wishing to speculate in land would go to was Cyprus. He did not think that the defence which had been raised by the Under Secretary of State on that point was worth anything. With respect to the uncultivated land, the hon. Gentleman did not say much more than he had upon the question of forced labour. There were particular charges which had been brought against the Government; and as the Under Secretary of State had not answered them, he must be taken to have admitted them. In the same way, as Her Majesty's Government had not repealed these Ordinances, they must be considered to have approved of them. He hoped that they might gather this much consolation—that, at all events, his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea might have the satisfaction of feeling that the result that he had brought about had been to put an end to the mystery which had been maintained about these Ordinances to which he had objected.

Sir William Harcourt

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had never heard a more extraordinary misrepresentation of a speech in that House than that which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had made of the speech of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Under ordinary circumstances, it would be worth while to pass by such statements with comparative indifference, because the House knew what such charges were worth. But, in the present case, it was important to notice what the hon. and learned Gentleman said, because it was calculated to produce a false and mischievous impression in this country, if it went forth, upon the authority of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the effect of the observations of the Under Secretary of State on the part of the Government was that the Government tolerated slavery. He thought such a statement would be calculated to produce a very false and mischievous impression. There was no justification for the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman in anything. What his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State had said was what the Government had done upon this question. What his hon. Friend had stated was this—that if slavery had hitherto existed in Cyprus, no effect would now be given in the Courts of Justice to anything in the nature of a claim for the exercise of the right of a master over a slave. Did that show that the Government was indifferent to the existence of slavery? If slavery was not to be enforced, the power of a master over a slave came to an end. Whether it was necessary to pass any special Ordinance upon the subject was a question of a different character. He believed that it might very probably be thought right to pass such an Ordinance, as his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State had already said. If that course was considered desirable, he had no doubt that it would be adopted; but as the matter at present stood, if no legal authority was given to enforce the rights of a master over his slave, slavery, for all practical purposes, came to an end in Cyprus. That was very different from the statement which had been made, that the Government was indifferent to the existence of slavery. They wished to say, with regard to these matters, that the main considerations which hon. Gentlemen entirely left out of sight, in speaking of Cyprus, were these. The Government had come within a very short period—less than a year—into the administration of a country in which there were difficulties of every sort, and maladministration of every kind, to be dealt with and corrected. In order to bring the country into a proper condition it was absolutely necessary to exercise discretion, and to proceed with consideration. Many remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) were made without taking these facts into consideration. The Government, above all things, considered that they ought to proceed carefully and tenderly in this matter. The Government, taking into account the difficulties of the situation, felt that it would not do instantly to disallow Ordinances with which they might not entirely agree. In all these matters consideration ought to be had for the men who had been working in the greatest difficulty, and who had introduced, he believed, more improvements in the government of the Island within the space of the last 10 or 11 months than had ever been applied to any other country in a similar space of time. But the Government was censured, not only for what it had done, but for what it had not done. It had been said that some of the Ordinances which had been introduced were very objectionable. But it should be remembered that in introducing a new system in circumstances of difficulty, it might be—as in this case it was—necessary to have recourse, for a time, to exceptional measures. With respect to the power of foreigners to acquire land, and matters of that sort, they were of a temporary character only. And he believed that they were calculated to prevent mischief being done, and were justified in that view. He thought that the spirit in which the Government had proceeded, and in what it would continue to proceed, was one which in its results could not fail to be beneficial and satisfactory.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL expressed his surprise that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not used more decided language with regard to slavery. With regard to that part of the subject, there was no place for discretion, no time for consideration. He understood his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke) to state that the Government would consider whether it was necessary to pass an Ordinance to abolish slavery; but that, in the meantime, the Courts would not recognize its existence. Why should not the Government instantly pass a law in Cyprus, as they had passed in India 40 years ago? He could not understand the hesitation of the Government in giving the House an assurance that this should be done. The result of the debate seemed to him to be, in effect, that they had to give up a military government of this Island to a military man, and to allow him to enforce his own ideas. That might be very right in Africa; but in a place like Cyprus he thought it was a mistake; but as the Government consented to give Papers on the matter, it was unnecessary to continue the debate longer. On the question of slavery, however, he did not think that the British Government had any discretion, or should take any time for consideration, but should give an assurance that no laws should be passed by which slavery should be totally done away with in Cyprus.

MR. GILES said, that, after the disfavour with which the occupation of Cyprus was received by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), it was not a little amusing now to witness the hon. Baronet's great anxiety for the welfare and good government of the Cypriotes. If one-half of the charges that he brought against the Government could be proved, it showed that the English were guilty of the greatest cruelty and tyranny; but that did not accord with the written testimony of Sir Garnet Wolseley; and he (Mr. Giles) would rather believe a high-minded gentleman like Sir Garnet Wolseley, than he would a zaptieh or a Greek priest. He had been a good deal abroad, and he had not failed to observe, in his converse with foreigners, that if there was one thing that struck an Englishman more than anything else, it was the feeling of respect that foreigners generally had for the just and honourable dealings of the English. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had been very hard upon the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), because he gave the House his experience of Cyprus, after having been there only four days. The right hon. Gentleman did not believe the testimony of an eye-witness; but he was ready to believe any charges in letters made by unknown correspondents; and as the conflict of testimony was so great, he (Mr. Giles) would suggest that the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea should himself go to Cyprus; and if four days were not long enough to enable him to get all the necessary information, let him remain there four weeks, and then come back and report to the House the results of his experience that day three months.

Sir George Campbell

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of the Ordinance No. VIII. of 1879, giving power to the Government of Cyprus to exile persons without trial:

Of the Ordinance No. VI. of 1878, prohibiting the sale of land to any but British or Turkish subjects:

And, of the Ordinance No. XVI. of 1879, confiscating uncultivated lands.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution [June 19] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBRETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 23rd June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Marriages Confirmation (Her Majesty's Ships) * (124).

Committee — Report — Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment * (115); Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common) * (107); Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons)* (109); Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common)* (108); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford)* (112); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.)* (111); Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.)* (114); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.)* (110); Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders* (96).

Report—Supply of Drink on Credit* (84); Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.)* (94); Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.)* (103).

Third Reading—Prosecution of Offences* (121); Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland)* (90), and passed.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL. STATEMENT.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, before the Business of the House commences, I am very anxious to make a short statement with reference to the sad and painful circumstances connected with the death of the Prince Imperial, that we have all been deploring for the last few days. It is a subject on which I am sure there is but one feeling of sympathy for the illustrious Mother who has lost so much in losing her son, and of deep respect for the gallantry of that young man who unfortunately has come to this, I may say, untimely end. There is very great doubt as to the circumstances in which the Prince Imperial went to South Africa; and I think it is much to be deplored that that doubt should remain for a moment longer than necessary. Indeed, it seems to me that I should be neglecting my duty if I did not read to your Lordships two private letters which the unfortunate Prince took out with him as letters of introduction to Sir Bartle Frere and Lord Chelmsford from myself. They are private letters, and are the letters under which the Prince attached himself to the Army in Zululand—

“February 25, 1879.

“My dear Chelmsford,—This letter will be presented to you by the Prince Imperial, who is going out on his own account to see as much as he can of the coming campaign in Zululand. He is extremely anxious to go out, and wanted to be employed in our Army; but the Government did not consider that this could be sanctioned, but have sanctioned my writing to you and to Sir Bartle Frere to say that if you can show him kindness and render him assistance to see as much as he can with the columns in the field, I hope you will do so. He is a fine young fellow, full of spirit and pluck, and having many old cadet friends in the Artillery, he will doubtless find no difficulty in getting on, and if you can help him in any other way, pray do so. My only anxiety on his account would be that he is too plucky and go-a-head.—I remain, my dear Chelmsford, yours most sincerely, GEORGE.”

That is the letter to Lord Chelmsford; and I should also like to read to your Lordships that which was addressed to Sir Bartle Frere in order that there may be no mistake—

“February 25, 1879.

“My dear Sir Bartle Frere,—I am anxious to make you acquainted with the Prince Imperial, who is about to proceed to Natal by to-morrow's packet to see as much as he can of the coming campaign in Zululand in the capacity of a spectator. He was anxious to serve in our Army, having been a cadet at Woolwich; but the Government did not think that this could be sanctioned. But no objection is made to his going out on his own account, and I am permitted to introduce him to you and to Lord Chelmsford in the hope and with my personal request that you will give him every help in your power to enable him to see what he can. I have written to Chelmsford to the same effect. He is a charming young man, full of spirit and energy, speaking English admirably, and the more you see of him the more you will like him. He has many young friends in the Artillery, and so I doubt not, with your and Chelmsford's kind assistance, he will get on well enough.—I remain, my dear Sir Bartle, yours most sincerely, GEORGE.”

My Lords, all I can say is, after having read these letters, that I think, so far as the authorities at home are concerned, everybody must feel that nothing has been done by them to place the unfortunate Prince in the position which, unhappily, resulted in his death. We all deplore, deeply deplore—I am sure that everyone in this House, every man, woman, and child in this country, everyone, from the Queen on the Throne down to her humblest subject, must feel and deeply deplore—what has occurred; but certainly, as far as the authorities are concerned here, I feel that nothing has been done to produce such a catastrophe as that which we now all so much lament. I have already said how deeply I sympathize with the bereaved Mother, and I am sure your Lordships fully share in that feeling.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I am sure your Lordships have listened with much interest to the letters which have just been read by the illustrious Duke which he has thought it desirable to place before your Lordships' House, and which refer to a deplorable calamity. Your Lordships must share with the illustrious Duke the regret which he expressed, and was experienced be the nation, when we heard of the death of a young Prince—and that, too, a foreign Prince—anxious to serve with Her Majesty's Colours in a distant land, and whose life has been, in my opinion, so cruelly and—I cannot help expressing my opinion—so needlessly sacrificed. Prince Napoleon, my Lords, lived long in this country. He was known to your Lordships and to the country generally. He received his military training at our institution at Woolwich, and he left behind him there a memory of bravery, of probity, of ability, of many virtues, and of many endearing qualities. I feel confident that, had opportunity been afforded, he would have shown the hereditary courage of the gallant nation of which he was a member. It is impossible, at a moment like this, that the thoughts of men should not be directed, as those of the illustrious Duke have been, to one who was the most deeply interested in the life of this young man so prematurely cut off. My Lords, I feel that on an occasion like the present any attempt at consolation must be fruitless; but the day may come when the sympathy of a free and great people may be appreciated by a desolate parent.

EARL GRANVILLE: I may be permitted to say one word on this very sad case. I think your Lordships will be glad that the illustrious Duke did what he has done on the present occasion. It must be a source of melancholy satisfaction to him to have proved the interest which he felt in the young Prince whose death we so greatly lament, and to have had the opportunity of paying a high tribute of praise to his personal character and qualities. I thoroughly agree with the noble Earl the Prime Minister—at all events, until we have some further explanation of the matter—in what he said as to a person of the young Prince's position and his youth having been placed in the circumstances which, unhappily, have proved fatal to him. I will only add that I entirely concur in the expression of opinion that, absolutely apart from any political feeling, the sympathy of this country is extended in the strongest manner to the illustrious Mother of the young Prince in her almost unparalleled affliction.

The Earl of Beaconsfield

EGYPT—ABDICATION OF THE KHE-DIVE.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: Before your Lordships proceed to the Orders of the Day, I should wish to put to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice, and which refers to a subject which has been of great interest to Europe during the last six months. It is—Whether it is a fact that Her Majesty's Government have made to the Khedive any proposal that he should abdicate; and, if so, what answer was returned to that proposal?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The negotiations are still going on, and I cannot give the noble Earl at the present moment any details on the subject; but I may say that England and France have advised the Khedive to abdicate in favour of his son, and that Germany, Austria, and Italy have supported that recommendation. No answer has yet been given by the Khedive.

THAMES RIVER (PREVENTION OF FLOODS) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."

LORD TRURO rose to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill, that they have power to alter the Bill so as to charge to the rates of the Metropolis the cost of all works carried out on public property and the expense of works of exceptional character and cost that may be ordered to be executed on private property."

The noble Lord said, the Bill deserved special consideration for three reasons. Its leading principle was that the owners of river-side property were to be legally bound to prevent tidal overflow; and that was a reversal of the Common Law, as laid down by the High Court of Justice in 1876. The indiscriminate application of that principle would operate unequally upon private owners; and its application at all, in respect of public streets and places, to local vestries and district boards, would operate very unjustly, because so large an extent of river frontage was already protected by embankments which had cost millions, and which had been paid for out of taxes and rates levied upon the whole Metropolitan area. Assuming the principle to be maintained, it ought to be applied so that no injustice was done either to individuals as owners, or to parishes and districts as parts of the Metropolis. The Bill introduced by the Metropolitan Board in 1877 went upon a different principle—that of throwing the responsibility for all property on vestries and district boards, and the cost on the local rates, unless the vestry or district board chose to lay a special rate on the property liable to be flooded, whether on the river-side or not. The Bill was opposed before a Select Committee of the other House, which, after an exhaustive inquiry, resolved that the works ought to be executed by the Metropolitan Board at the cost of the whole Metropolis. The Metropolitan Board refused to accept that conclusion, and sought to throw both responsibility and cost on river-side property, whoever might own it. If the compulsory execution of any works was a permanent injury to any owner, he might claim compensation, and whatever was awarded the Metropolitan Board would pay. It was, however, exceedingly improbable that compulsion would have to be resorted to on valuable property where heavy claims for compensation could arise; while it was certain that the cost of the works would be heaviest where the property was least valuable. The offer of the Board to pay compensation for permanent injury was, therefore, a shadowy, rather than a real acceptance of the Resolution of the Select Committee of 1877. The present Bill had passed the ordeal of another Select Committee; and that Committee had not thought it right, considering the changed character of the Bill, to support the finding of the previous Committee. But, except before the Committee, no attention had been directed to the new principle of the Bill, which was obviously capable of application to every tidal river in the country. Whether it was expedient or not to adopt that new principle, it was certain that so important a change ought not to be made in the law without a word being said on the subject in either House of Parliament, and the Members of that House would be glad to hear what noble and learned Lords had to say on the subject. So recently as January, 1876, a judgment was delivered by the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Mellor in "Hudson v. Tabor," which was an action by an occupier against a proprietor of adjoining lands fronting to a creek communicating with the sea, and in which the tide flowed and re-flowed. A high tide occurred in March, 1874. The water flowed over the defendant's wall upon the land of the plaintiff, which was on a lower level, doing considerable damage, and it was to recover compensation that the action was brought. The question was whether the defendant was bound to maintain the wall, not only for his own protection, but for that of his neighbours. There was no evidence of prescriptive obligation; and the Court held there was no obligation upon a proprietor to maintain a dam for the protection of the occupier at Common Law. If that judgment be right, this Bill must be wrong; at all events, it ought not to be silently reversed in a Private Bill affecting the frontage of the Thames in the Metropolis. It was, of course, open to contention that, in some parts of London, there was a beneficial occupation of the river bank for the purposes of trade, and that the improvement of the navigation increased the value of river-side property. That argument was assumed as a possible justification for imposing a new obligation by statute. It was, perhaps, a consideration which weighed with the second Select Committee in accepting the principle of this Bill. Assuming that House to endorse the principle, the arguments of the Lord Chief Justice against it were equally strong as against its indiscriminate application. As was well known, property liable to be flooded had been in many places protected by Commissions, and the Lord Chief Justice said—

"Under those Commissions everyone is to contribute who may receive benefit or suffer loss, obviously a very different thing from throwing the whole burden on the frontager and making him liable for all the damage that may result from his own omission to keep up the sea wall. The equitable principle on which the assessment under such a Commission is made is in itself a strong argument against the position that the frontager is liable at Common Law. He may have only a narrow slip of land of comparatively little value; while behind him may be a proprietor having much more land and of greater value lying on the same, or on a lower level, and liable to be overflowed if the sea wall is imperfect. It is obvious that the last owner ought, to some extent at least, to bear his share of the cost of maintaining defences against the sea. I think, therefore, the fact that the owner of land fronting the sea might be made liable under a Commission, by no means shows that, independently of a Royal Commission, such liability existed at Common Law, and we see nothing to warrant our holding it to exist. The proper remedy in such a case as this is to procure the issuing of a Commission in which, by an equitable adjustment, the interests of all parties may be secured."—[Hudson v. Tabor.]

This judgment had a most important bearing on the questions raised by this Bill, even assuming the judgment itself to be set aside in respect of the majority of private owners. The practical issue was, who was to stand in the place of a Commission in respect of public property? Who was to undertake whatever exceeded private obligation? The Metropolitan Board said—Itself for compensation; the local vestries and district boards for everything else. The Metropolitan Board relied on a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench of June, 1877, in a case between one of these Commissions for Kent and the Plumstead District Board. The judgment was that, under the Local Management Act for the Metropolis, the district board might be held to have superseded the Commission in the district of Plumstead. The Committee of 1877, knowing of this judgment, and also of that in "Hudson v. Tabor," and conscious of all that had been done in London since 1855, and of the causes of the higher tides, said, substantially, by its Resolution, that the time had come when the Metropolitan Board must be regarded as the Commission for the Metropolis. The Board admitted that it ought to be for compensation. Then, on what principle could it make a distinction between compensation and any other charge in excess of private obligation? The words of the Lord Chief Justice had a special application to private owners in the districts of Fulham and Wandsworth, and still more to the districts themselves, where the works required were costly out of all proportion to the value of the property as compared with the cost and value in the centre of London. It was said that special rates might be levied on the property within the range of benefit; in other words, that little local Commissions might be formed. But the localities and their districts were all parts of the Metropolis, and had contributed to defray the cost of all Metropolitan improvements for 25 years. And these higher tides were admittedly caused by Metropolitan improvements. Old London Bridge was a dam which kept back the tide; the water fell in cataracts beneath its arches, one way with the rising, and the reverse with the ebbing tide. The dam was removed; the river had been dredged and deepened for the improvement of the navigation; the embankments increased the momentum of the tide; a greater volume of water came up; improved agriculture expedited the descent of the land floods, which found no storage where the mud banks had been reclaimed and superseded by embankments; all these things had been done out of funds provided, in one way or another, by the Metropolis, to improve its communication by bridge, by street, by river; to improve it as a port; to improve its sanitary condition by relieving the river of its drainage; and, in the case of the embankment opposite that building, to protect that part of Lambeth from inundation. And yet it was now proposed that the local rates should bear all the expense of works that did not fall on private owners. Could anything be more inequitable? Nothing was professedly contemplated, but works sufficient to prevent overflow. Last year their cost was estimated to exceed £62,500. Of this, £12,500 had to be spent in Fulham; £14,200 in Poplar, including £8,400 on Bow Creek; £9,000 in Wandsworth, including £4,800 on the Wandle; and £11,400 in Greenwich, including £8,400 on Deptford Creek. Of course, no expenditure was required where the Victoria, the Albert, and the Chelsea Embankments now were. It was unnecessary to quote figures relating to their magnitude and their cost. Fulham, Wandsworth, Poplar, and Greenwich had already contributed to defray their cost. It was perfectly immaterial whether the embankments alone had, or had not, contributed to the floods—it required engineering subtlety to show that they had not—grant that they did not, was not their existence and history conclusive proof of the inequity of saddling local rates with the cost of any embankment, however partial? Was it not clear that the Me-

Metropolitan Board ought to constitute itself a Commission for this purpose for the whole Metropolis? It was the mere accident of possessing public streets and places by the river-side, which would make that Bill operate so oppressively upon the district of Fulham. It was the accident of having none, and the good fortune of having secured the Albert Embankment, that made the passing of this Bill immaterial to the vestry of Lambeth as representing the ratepayers. But, for all that, the vestry was not so selfish as to support the Bill as it stood. At a meeting last week, it passed a resolution, under seal, in favour of justice to Fulham and Wandsworth, as follows:—

“That, assuming the principle of the Thames Floods Bills to be maintained, and the responsibility of preventing overflow to be thrown upon the owners of river frontages, this vestry is still of opinion that the principle will operate very inequitably in respect of all frontages which, not being private property, are vested in vestries and district boards; therefore, this vestry, representing a parish which is already protected by the Albert Embankment, constructed at the cost of the Metropolis, as so large a portion of the other side of the river is by the Victoria and Chelsea Embankments, is strongly of opinion that all works exceeding the obligations of private owners ought to be executed by the Metropolitan Board of Works at the cost of the Metropolis, in accordance with the Report of the House of Commons' Select Committee of 1877.”

It was for their Lordships to say whether, under all the circumstances, so far as the prevention of floods was concerned, all streets and public places by the river-side ought not to be vested in the Metropolitan Board. That principle had been strongly supported by The Times and by nearly the whole Metropolitan Press. It involved nothing inconsistent with the principle of private responsibility for private property, should the House think fit to change the law in that respect. There remained the third question of the compulsory improvement of private property—or, rather, the compulsory expenditure of money upon it, and making the capital and interest the first rent-charge for 30 years. Even should the property increase in value, it did not follow that an increased rent would be obtained during the continuance of an existing lease. It was taken for granted that the particular property upon which the expenditure was incurred would be proportionately increased in value, which by no means followed in some cases; and if it were, it did not follow that an increased rent would be obtained during the continuance of an existing lease. But the rent-charge must be paid, whatever became of the owner; so that, if he could not bear the yearly charge, the property would be confiscated. Was it not obvious that if the main principle of the Bill be sustained, and if the responsibility of river-side owners was to be established, there ought to be some limit to the burden put upon a private owner for the protection of his neighbours? At all events, property ought not to be subjected to an annual charge, unless an obvious addition was made to its letting value, and that addition could be realized by the owner. If the expenditure must be incurred and the private owner ought not to bear it, it would clearly come within the same category as compensation, and be payable by the Metropolitan Board. Arbitration might also be extended to these cases. Without some further provision the door was left open to a serious invasion of the rights of private property. The noble Lord concluded by moving the Instruction to the Committee.

LORD SUDELEY supported the Bill, the principle of which, he said, had been acknowledged for the last 300 years. He would also point out that the principle of throwing the taxation on river-side owners had already been exhaustively dealt with by a Committee in the other House, which had come to the conclusion that as the Thames was a great navigable river, the navigation of which had been improved by dredging and other works, those who were chiefly benefited, and whose property had thus been materially improved, were those who should chiefly bear the cost. The cost of the works contemplated would not exceed the trifling sum of £55,000—a very different amount to what had been stated by the noble Lord, who appeared to think that it would cost many hundred thousand pounds. The Committee felt that it would not be just to spread the taxation over a large area; but it was recommended that if an owner, in carrying out certain improvements suggested by the Metropolitan Board of Works, suffered permanent damage to his works, he might obtain compensation; and this might be spread over the whole area. Their Lordships, perhaps, would be surprised to hear that of 1,000 owners of river-side property, 600 had already done what was necessary in embanking the river. Out of 46 miles of river frontage, 27 miles had been completed, and only 19 remained to be dealt with. He utterly denied that the raising of the embankments had caused the rise in the tides. It had been shown conclusively that it was due to dredging. The Bill ought to go before the Committee unweighted with any such recommendation as that suggested; and if the objectors appeared before the Committee, their views would be impartially considered. It appeared to him that this Bill was a fair compromise, and would set aside the objection raised to the Bill introduced by the Metropolitan Board of Works in 1878.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, the issue raised was a very simple one. A large sum had been already expended by the Metropolitan Board out of the funds of the Metropolis in embanking portions of the river on both sides; and the owners and occupiers of the property on the river frontages that were not embanked, having contributed their full share of the expenses already incurred, thought it very hard, now that something was required to be done for the defence of their own property and districts, that they should be compelled to bear the whole expense of the works that the Board thought it necessary to order. The grievance was of two kinds: First, there were the local vestries and district boards representing ratepayers, who had contributed to the Metropolitan expenditure on its embankments, and who were now called upon, as local ratepayers, to bear the expense of protecting any public streets or footpaths by the river-side. The contention of these parishes and districts was that, at all events, all streets and public places should be taken charge of by the Metropolitan Board and protected at the expense of the Metropolitan ratepayers—that, in fact, the whole river-bank should for this purpose be vested in the Metropolitan Board. Next there were the private owners, who, as taxpayers and ratepayers, had already contributed to the cost of the embankments, and were now called upon to pay all the cost of preventing the tide overflowing their property, if not for their own protection, at least for that of their neighbours. This might be a trifling matter in some cases; but in others it would be a very serious one, and would involve a cost disproportionate to the value of the property. In these circumstances, the claim that was made in the proposed Order of Reference was most reasonable. In some cases protection of public property had been effected by private owners; but it was not just to ask that it should be continued at private expense for public benefit. It was most unfair to urge that what had been done in some cases pending the tardy action of the Metropolitan Board of Works furnished an argument for imposing a permanent obligation. He himself had done all, or more than all, that had been suggested by the Metropolitan Board; but what had been done would be required to be maintained and repaired, and this would be necessary on public as well as on private grounds. Therefore, he hoped the proposed Instruction would be allowed to go to the Committee, and that it would receive their best attention.

Lord Sudeley

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, his opinion from the first was that the Bill ought not to have been made a Private Bill. When the Bill came before him he expressed that opinion; he also inquired whether the usual Notices had been served, according to the practice in Private Bill legislation, and was surprised that they had not. However, as the Bill had been introduced in the other House and had passed through a Select Committee, he should rather object to the proposed Instruction, because it would be like telling the Committee what to do before both sides of the case had been fully heard. At the same time, the Bill was one which would require great care and attention. He thought it would have been far better had the Bill been introduced as a Public Bill.

The Instruction was not pressed.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed; The Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—NOTICE OF QUESTION—ORDERS OF DAY AND NOTICES.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE: To call attention to the continued disturbed state of parts of Ireland; and to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government deem that the time has arrived when measures should be taken to assert the supremacy of the law? and to move for a Return of all persons now receiving police protection in Ireland, and of police posts of constabulary located in disturbed districts; and a Return of farms now unoccupied from intimidation.

[Lord ORANMORE and BROWNE not being in his place when the Order was read,]

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he wished to draw attention to the fact that the noble Lord who had placed this Notice on the Paper, and who, the other evening had voted in the minority on the Motion that the House should commence its sittings at 4 o'clock, was absent from his place, though it was only 20 minutes past 6. The noble Lord, he supposed, had not thought fit to bring on his Motion that evening in consequence of the time occupied by the discussion on the Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill. He mentioned this to show how easy it would often be for the House, even under the present arrangements, to transact more Business than it sometimes did.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow,
half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 23rd June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Omnibus Regulation * [217].

Second Reading—*Consolidated Fund (No. 4) ; Spirits * [203], *Inclosure Provisional Order (Whittington Common)  [207]

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [98]—R.F.

Committee—Report—*Artizans' Dwellings Act (1868) Extension  [31-216].

Considered as amended—Third Reading—*Salmon Fishery Law Amendment (No. 2)  [188], and passed.

Third Reading—*Wormwood Secubs Regulation  [205]; *Sale of Food and Drugs Act (1876) Amendment  [139], and passed.

NOTICES OF QUESTIONS.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER: I beg to give Notice that, on Thursday next, I shall ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay on the Table of the House a Copy of the Correspondence relating to the late Prince Imperial leaving this country for the seat of war; whether he will state the precise position of the Prince in, or in connection with, Her Majesty's Army; and, whether he will give at once, or so soon as they can be ascertained, the name and rank of the Officer by whom the Prince was put in orders on the 1st of June for the specific duty in the performance of which he lost his life?

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK: I will, to-morrow, ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the circumstances attending the lamented death of the late Prince Imperial, Whether he can inform the House what special instructions, if any, were issued by Lord Chelmsford on the occasion of the Prince leaving his head-quarters to join those of Brigadier General Wood; as to the particular duty on which the Prince was, or was not, to be employed; also, what instructions were issued to those under whom he was serving as to the precautions to be taken to prevent his incurring unnecessary risk, not called for either by his position or the circumstances of the Service; and, if he is unable to give the House any information on these subjects, whether he will cause inquiries upon them to be addressed to Lord Chelmsford, with a view of eliciting facts with regard to which a deep interest is felt in this House and the Country?

QUESTIONS.

EXPLOSIVES ACT, 1875—IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has taken into consideration the statements contained in the Petition of the Londonderry Board of Guardians, a copy of which was presented to him on the 11th February, as to the expensive mode of carrying out "The Explosives Act, 1875," in the rural districts, five inspectors in the area of that board having been appointed at the aggregate salary of £47 10s. per annum, whose duties are confined to the inspection of (in all) four retail shops registered for the sale of gunpowder, having a probable sale of £10 worth of gunpowder in the year only; whether similar representations have not been made by other Boards of Guardians in Petitions and otherwise; and, whether the Government is prepared to take steps to remove such grievance by transferring the duty of inspection to the sanitary officers of the Union or to the constabulary?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the Government have received the Petition from Londonderry, to which the hon. Gentleman refers, on the subject of the manner of carrying out in Ireland the Explosives Act of 1875, and they have also received communications from other quarters which have their careful attention. On the whole, I am disposed to concur with the hon. Gentleman in thinking that the constabulary would be the best authority to carry out the duty of inspection. If, therefore, there is a general concurrence of opinion in that direction, I should be prepared to introduce a Bill upon the subject; but if it is to give rise to controversy, I should hesitate to embark upon the question at this period of the Session.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— ASSISTANT TEACHERS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he is aware that the notice recently issued by the managers of national schools in Ireland by the National Board, whereby the services of an assistant teacher in any school is made dependent upon an average attendance of at least seventy pupils, is regarded generally by the managers of those schools as detrimental to the interests of education; if he will state what object the Commissioners have had in augmenting the amount of attendance required in these cases from fifty to seventy in female schools, and from sixty to seventy in male schools; and, whether the Commissioners are legally empowered to make the foregoing alteration?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir; I am aware of the circular referred to, and, in my opinion, it is decidedly a step in the right direction. In England, one assistant teacher is allowed to each 100 pupils only; and, therefore, at a time when additions to other branches of educational expenditure in Ireland are being urged upon the Government, it appears especially necessary to take advantage of legitimate opportunities for effecting corresponding retrenchments. I am not aware of any legal impediment to the action of the Commissioners in this matter.

FISHERIES (IRELAND) — THE SLIGO AND BONET FISHERIES.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he would cause an investigation to be held into the manner in which the fisheries of the Sligo fisheries and the Bonet river, county Leitrim, have been managed by Mr. Brady, Inspector of Fisheries, having regard to the fact that it has been shown by a Return furnished to the Government at an inspection ordered by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the quantity of salmon taken in these fisheries has considerably diminished since the year 1862 up to the present date in consequence of bye-laws enacted by Mr. Brady?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I see no occasion for any special inquiry into these matters. Inquiries have, from time to time, been held, not by Mr. Brady alone, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman appears to think, but by never less than two, and usually by three, Inspectors of Fisheries. Any person desiring to call in question the decision of the Inspectors has the right of appeal to the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and, in certain circumstances, to the Court of Queen's Bench, so that there appears to be no necessity for any further action on the part of the Government.

POST OFFICE—POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.—QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Postmaster General, When he will be prepared to introduce his promised Bill respecting Postal Savings Banks; and, whether it is intended in such Bill to enlarge the powers of these useful Banks, especially in the direction of extending the present very limited amount allowed to stand in each depositor's name?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, in the present state of Public Business, I fear I could not name any time for the introduction of this measure, and it is a measure which it is not worth while introducing unless there is a prospect of its passing into law. With regard to the second part of the Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that I have already replied to a similar interpellation in the affirmative.

Mr. Charles Lewis

COLONIAL DEFENCES—LOANS.
QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any and what sums have been issued by the Treasury to the account of the Admiralty for Colonial Defence under the powers of "The Colonial Docks (Loans) Act, 1865," and at what Colonial Ports have such sums been expended; and, whether any applications for loans under the above-named Act have been made and refused; and, if so, by what Colonies such applications have been made, and on what grounds they have been refused?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the Colonial Docks (Loans) Act of 1865 in no way relates to Colonial defences. The Act was passed to enable loans to be made to Colonies in aid of the formation of docks of dimensions greater than would be requisite for private or commercial purposes, and so render them available for men-of-war. Under this Act, £12,000 has been loaned to the Whampoa Dock Company and £20,000 to the Anglo-Maltese Hydraulic Dock Company at Malta. No applications have been received and refused.

ARMY—COMMITTEE ON SERVICE OF OFFICERS UNDER AGE.
QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has yet considered the Report of the Committee which inquired into the question of the service of Officers under twenty years of age and other matters raised in the Debate of the 3rd of March; if he has arrived at any decision on those points; and, whether he has any objection to lay the Report upon the Table?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I have received the Report of the Committee; but my opportunities of considering it have been rather limited. I have, therefore, not arrived at any decision on those points; and, under these circumstances, it would be premature for me to express an opinion as to whether I will lay the Report on the Table or not.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT: If convenient to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, I will repeat the Question a fortnight hence.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—LOANS TO CLARE FISHERMEN.
QUESTION.

LORD FRANCIS CONYNGHAM asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he would mention the date of the request to the Board of Works in Ireland for a Report on the subject of the difficulties which had arisen with regard to loans to Clare fishermen; and, when such Report will be ready, and whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House at the earliest possible moment?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I understand from the Board of Works that they have not received any request for a Report upon this subject, and I fancy there must be some mistake.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— CORONERSHIP OF LIMERICK.
QUESTIONS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If there is any truth in the following paragraph, which appeared in the "Cork Examiner" of the 13th instant, in reference to the Limerick coronership:—

"The Irish Chief Secretary has telegraphed to a prominent Conservative gentleman of Limerick respecting the probabilities of the election to the office of coroner of John Sarsfield Casey, ex-Fenian prisoner. The Irish Attorney General was consulted this evening as to the legality of the candidature, and the possibility of invalidating the election should Mr. Casey be chosen. The delay in filling the office is owing solely to the knowledge that such a candidate would be in the field with the prospect of securing a majority of the votes. Inquiries had been made on the subject, but it is believed the Government were misinformed, or they would have allowed the vacancy to continue still longer."

whether, if Mr. Casey, who possesses the necessary property qualification, should be chosen, his election can be invalidated; and, whether the Irish Government will take the necessary steps to have the election carried out without further delay?

MR. CALLAN: Before the Question is answered, I would wish to ask if it is not a fact that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland is affording every facility for having the writ issued at the earliest possible opportunity?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the newspaper paragraph, which is quoted, I presume, correctly, but which I do not happen to have ever seen myself, has not a word of truth in it from beginning to end. The facts of the case are that the attention of the Government was called to the vacancy by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), and I addressed a communication last month to the Lieutenant of the county, Lord Emly, requesting that the necessary steps should be taken for filling it up. This is all that I can do in the matter. As to the qualification, legal or otherwise, of any candidate, I have no information, and would rather express no opinion at present.

POOR LAW MEDICAL RELIEF (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, In what respects the position of poor law medical relief in Scotland differs so materially from that of England as to justify a smaller proportionate Grant in aid; and, whether, if the Scotch system requires amendment, it may not be amended and satisfaction given to Scotland in the matter without waiting for the Poor Law (Scotland) Amendment Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, in England, the Guardians are required, by the orders of the Local Government Board, made under the Poor Law Act, to appoint a medical officer for every workhouse, and also a separate medical officer for each relief district—of which there may be several—within the Union. Their districts are arranged under the sanction of the Board, and cannot be altered without such sanction. The duties of these officers are prescribed by the Local Government Board under statutory power, and their approval of every appointment is likewise required. The officers hold their appointments for life, and can only be dismissed by or with the consent of the Local Government Board. The only legal provision in Scotland as regards Poor Law medical officers is that every parish or combination is required, out of the funds raised for the relief of the poor, to provide for medicine and medical attendance for the poor in such manner and to such extent as may seem equitable and expedient. There is a grant in aid of £10,000 for medical officers in Scotland, which is distributed by the Board of Supervision, who require that a medical officer should be appointed in all cases where the grant is awarded. The Board of Supervision, however, exercise no control over the appointments, the salaries, or the tenure of office, nor can they prescribe the duties. The Board of Supervision might, no doubt, prescribe conditions under which the grant would be made, and withhold it where those conditions were not complied with; but, without legislation, it is quite clear that medical Poor Law appointments in Scotland could not be put upon the same footing as in England.

SOUTH AFRICA—SIR BARTLE FRERE'S DESPATCHES.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any Replies have been received to his Despatches to Sir Bartle Frere, dated March 19th and 20th; and, if so, whether he will communicate the same to the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, my despatch of the 20th of March to Sir Bartle Frere has been acknowledged; but no reply has been received to the despatch of the 19th of March. It is, perhaps, but right to say that those despatches must have reached Sir Bartle Frere when he was on the point of leaving Pretoria or on his journey to Cape Town, and he might not have had an opportunity of replying until he reached Cape Town.

ARMY—YEOMANRY, &c.—ADJUTANTS. QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Financial Secretary of the War Department, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, while Adjutants of Artillery, Engineer, and Rifle Volunteers, who are Captains in the Army, receive pay at regimental rates, Adjutants of Yeomanry, Light Horse, and Mounted Rifle Volunteers receive pay at ten shillings, in some cases only at seven shillings, a-day, the Adjutants of Mounted Corps, who have numerous extra duties to perform without any assistance whatever, being thus in a worse position than those of other branches?

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY: Sir, the difference in the rate of pay and allowances between adjutants of Light Horse and Mounted Rifle Volunteers on the one side and adjutants of Artillery, Engineers, and Rifle Volunteers on the other side, is owing to the fact that the latter officers have recruiting duties for the Regular Army to perform, and having higher duties, have also a higher rate of pay. The pay of adjutants of the Yeomanry was materially increased in 1876, in accordance with the recommendation of the Yeomanry Committee. The pay is less than that of captains of Cavalry, but the duties are less; and the adjutants of Yeomanry have only to provide one horse, while the captains of Cavalry have to provide three.

AFGHANISTAN—THE TREATY.

QUESTIONS.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether a Summary, or Précis of the terms of the Treaty recently concluded with the Ameer of Afghanistan has yet been received at the India Office; and, if so, whether he will lay a Copy upon the Table of the House; and, when he expects to be able to lay upon the Table of the House a complete Copy of the Treaty in question?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, the Government had not yet received the terms of the Treaty with the Ameer of Afghanistan; but the summary given in the daily papers was substantially correct. He expected a full copy of the Treaty by every mail, and as soon as it arrived it would be laid, with other Papers, on the Table of the House.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked, Whether the Government would also lay on the Table a map showing the extent of territory ceded to England?

TURKEY—CRETE—MURDER OF MR. W. ANDERSON.—QUESTIONS.

MR. G. HOWARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the investigation into the murder of Mr. William Anderson, manager of the Telegraph Station at Canea in Crete, and of his clerk Nicholas Vlackaki, who were shot on December 14th 1878, is now definitely completed; and, if so, whether he will lay the Papers on the subject before Parliament; and, if, however, the inquiry is still open, will he inform the House what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to bring the perpetrators of the crime to justice?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government has felt the deepest interest from the first in this very lamentable affair, and from the information they have received it is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that the local authorities seem to have done their best to discover the perpetrators of the murders, but, I am sorry to say, without success. I do not like to say that the inquiry is absolutely closed. At the same time, there does not seem any probability at present of the murderers being discovered. I have no objection to lay the Papers on the Table of the House?

MR. VANS AGNEW asked, Whether the Government has made, or will make, any demand on the Turkish Government for pecuniary compensation for the family of the late Mr. Anderson?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, that is a very different subject, and one certainly that has not received as yet the attention of Her Majesty's Government.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, CLASS IV. —THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES AND THE QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will furnish the House with the items of expenditure in the Queen's Colleges and Queen's University, Ireland, for which more than £12,000 are annually voted in Estimates, but of which no details have been given to the Committee of Supply?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, I have no objection to give some further details with regard to the Votes for the Queen's Colleges. But with regard to the Queen's University, I think the hon. Gentleman will see, on looking to the Estimates, that all reasonable explanations of that Vote are already furnished.

POST OFFICE—CONTRACT WITH THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL COM-PANY.—QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Postmaster General, Whether, looking to the largely increased subsidy which the Country is to pay under the new Postal Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company for a nominally accelerated service, the stoppage which it is proposed to allow at Hongkong on the homeward voyage will not entirely neutralise the gain in sea and speed; and, whether the practical working of the service will not be that at the season when it suits the Peninsular and Oriental Company to avail themselves of the stoppage, they will remain at Hongkong and other ports to load cargo, to the detriment of unsubsidised rivals; but when it does not suit the Company to remain because there is no cargo to be had, they will obtain the sanction of local postmasters to an earlier start, and make the voyage at reduced speed, with less cost to themselves, while they are all the time paid by the Country for fast speed?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, the subsidy to be paid to the Peninsular and Oriental Company under the new contract will be much less, and not more, than the sum now paid. The period fixed for the stay of the Peninsular and Oriental Packet at Hong Kong under the new contract was stipulated for in the Company's tender. It will not be in the power of the Company to obtain more time for steaming by shortening their stay at Hong Kong, because in reckoning the duration of each voyage the actual stop only, and not the nominal stop fixed in the time-table, will be taken into account.

INDIA—TENDERS FOR SUPPLIES.
QUESTION.

ADMIRAL EGERTON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that in April last an application was received at the India Office from Messrs. Dudley, manufacturers, of Norbriggs Works, Chesterfield, for a form of tender for certain articles required for India, to which for several days no answer was returned; and, whether in the meantime the order for the goods was given to contractors instead of direct to makers; and whether, if so, this proceeding is in accordance with the usual rules governing such matters?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, it is true that an application was received from Messrs. Dudley, in April last, for a form of tender. But the matter was very urgent, the articles being required for the Afghan War. In these circumstances, the usual rule of inviting tenders was departed from, and arrangements were made in a few hours with certain firms who had recently supplied similar articles to the Department, and who could be trusted to supply them at once. The application from Messrs. Dudley was not received until the arrangements were completed; but I have to express my regret at no answer having been at once sent to them.

TURKEY—MURDER OF MR. OGLE.
QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can now state to the House when Her Majesty's Government intend to re-open the inquiry into the murder of Mr. C. C. Ogle in Thessaly, which took place on the 30th of March last year, and to take steps to bring the perpetrators of the crime to justice?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have communicated with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on this matter, and he informs me that he considers the state of the country is at present in too disturbed a state to allow of such an inquiry being instituted.

INDIA—THE COUNCIL OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.—QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he has any objection to give a Return showing the cases in which the Governor General of India has over-ruled the majority of his Council in regard to any measures submitted to them since the passing of the Act 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 35, with the nature of the measure, and the reasons for which the Governor General exercised the extraordinary powers vested in him by the above and succeeding Laws in each case?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, without reference to India, it is impossible to say whether such a Return can be given or not; and, in any case, I am informed that it would give a somewhat misleading idea of the effect of the power of the Governor General to overrule his Council. I could not, therefore, have assented to the Motion for a Return which the hon. Member placed upon the Paper.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, Whether the Under Secretary of State for India will make inquiries as to the possibility of giving some information of the kind referred to?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I shall be very glad to make inquiries in India.

INDIA—THE PORTUGUESE COLONIES— CUSTOMS TARIFF.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he can explain the nature of the Treaty creating a Customs Union between the Portuguese Colonies and British India, and for the concession of a Railway from Goa to Bellary, concluded on the 26th of December last, and just passed through the Portuguese Cortes; and, can say whether these arrangements are to be submitted to this House also, or to the Legislative Council of India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, this Treaty contains many administrative arrangements of an important but complicated character, which it would be impossible for me to explain in an answer to a Question. But I can assure the hon. Member that the Treaty shall be laid upon the Table as soon as official information is received that it has been ratified. The Governor General of India in Council had full opportunity of considering the arrangement before it came before the Portuguese Cortes.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to numerous declarations by boards of guardians and other public bodies in Ireland stating that the extreme agricultural distress menaces large sections of the agricultural population with ruin, unless a generous abatement of rents is granted; whether he has been informed that the Catholic bishops and clergy in Galway, Tipperary, Kerry, Waterford, and other centres of agricultural industry have also declared the inability of the tenantry to pay existing rents in the present severe distress; and, whether the Government propose to take any steps to alleviate the existing distress in Ireland?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, my attention has been called to the various expressions of lay opinion referred to in the first portion of the Question; but with respect to the expressions of clerical opinion alluded to later on, I have no official information, or, in fact, any knowledge at all. I need hardly say that it is a matter of deep concern to Her Majesty's Government that, unhappily, distress exists in agricultural circles in many parts of the United Kingdom; but it is a satisfaction to the Irish branch of the Government that we have reason to believe that this distress, though unhappily prevailing, is less acutely felt in Ireland than in many other parts of the Kingdom. As the hon. Member and the House are aware, an opportunity will shortly occur for the whole subject being fully considered in its entirety by the House, and, therefore, I will not enter into it at present. If, however, I rightly understand the hon. Gentleman in the last part of his Question, to ask whether the Government intend to introduce a Bill for the reduction of rents, my answer is, certainly not.

MR. O'DONNELL: I protest entirely against the implication involved at the end of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, and I think he has treated with very unjustifiable levity a very grave subject. ["Order!"]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD — ANNUAL REPORT.—QUESTION.

SIR UGHTRIED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the President of the Local Government Board, in reference to his recent announcement that the Annual Report of the Board would be published considerably earlier than in previous years, Whether he can state how soon it will be in the hands of Members?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that he should be happy to redeem the pledge he gave on a former occasion. The whole of the Report was in type, or would be so before the end of the week. Some time would be required for its revision; but he hoped it would be in the hands of hon. Members in about three or four weeks.

BRAZIL—BRITISH CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether negotiations are still going on with Brazil for the settlement of the long pending British claims, and what prospects there are of an early settlement?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir; negotiations still are going on for the settlement of these long pending claims. The Commission to which they have been referred has made considerable progress, as we are informed, and I am happy to inform the hon. Member that there is some hope that in a short time a satisfactory arrangement may be arrived at.

NAVY—ROYAL MARINES—OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it be the fact that several officers of Marines on the active list who were selected for service in South Africa were found unfit for active service, and that in some cases the disability was not of a temporary character; and, whether he intends allowing officers unable to go on active service to remain on the active list, and if the effect of doing so would not be very soon to cause other officers, quite able for active service, to be compulsorily retired?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, it is the fact that some of the officers who were selected for service in South Africa were found, on medical examination, to be less fit than others for the peculiar service for which they were designated. The examination, however, was of a very severe character, and I have reason to believe that many of the officers who were passed over in consequence are perfectly fit for the discharge of the ordinary duties of Marine officers. If, however, it should turn out that any of them are physically unfit for general service, they will be retired.

BANKRUPTCY ACT—COMPTROLLER'S REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, in view of the state of things disclosed by the recent Report of the Comptroller in Bankruptcy, and particularly in view of the fact therein stated, that—

"The actual loss by bad debts in cases under the present Bankruptcy Act for the year 1879 (exclusive of losses from Scotch and Irish insolvency, Joint Stock Companies, deceased insolvents, private arrangements, and the many thousands of small insolvencies not dealt with under the present Bankruptcy Law) will be about twenty-five millions sterling," he can hold out any hope to the House that any measure of Bankruptcy reform will be discussed or proceeded with during the present Session?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER), in reply, said, the state of things disclosed by the recent Report of the Comptroller in Bankruptcy was certainly very lamentable, and showed the necessity for legislation. After the Army Bill was disposed of, he hoped there would still remain sufficient time to pass the Bankruptcy Act Amendment Bill, which had already passed through the other House of Parliament.

NAVY—THE ARCTIC SHIP "RESOLUTE." QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Daily Telegraph," that Her Majesty's Arctic ship "Resolute" is to be broken up; and, whether the Admiralty would be prepared to consider an application to transfer the ship to a committee for the purpose of mooring her off the Temple Pier and turning her into a training ship for metropolitan boys?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the Resolute has been ordered to be taken to pieces, and any sound timber that may be found in her will be used for conversion into a piece of furniture to be presented to the President of the United States, as it was by his order that the ship was restored to this country after having been lost in the Arctic Seas. She was a merchant vessel, bought into our Navy for Arctic research. She is now rotten and decayed, and would require a large expenditure to keep her afloat; but, from the condition of her timbers, and her small size—420 tons—she would be quite unsuited for a training ship.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS—THROUGH RATES.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to a decision given in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice on the 18th of June last, in the case of the Warwick and Birmingham Canal Navigation Company and others, the London and North Western Railway Company and others, and the Warwick and Birmingham Canal, &c.; whether, if the state of the Law is such as is therein indicated, one of the main purposes of "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1873," namely, to facilitate "through" rates and "through" traffic on Canals as well as on Railways is not practically rendered nugatory; and, whether, in the event of this decision being upheld, it will be necessary to amend the law in this respect?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Until a decision has been given by the last Court of Appeal, I do not think I should be right in expressing an opinion on this subject, or in saying what course the Government would propose to pursue if the decision of the Exchequer Division is maintained. As far as the interest of commerce is concerned, the matter is certainly a serious one; and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I do not under-rate, by any means, its importance.

EGYPT—ABDICATION OF THE KHE-DIVE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY: I have no wish to repeat generally the Questions which I put to the Government on Friday last as to the state of affairs in Egypt. I desire to avoid anything that can cause embarrassment to Her Majesty's Government in matters concerning which negotiations may be being carried on. I will, therefore, content myself with asking the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is prepared to make any statement or to give any information as to the present state of matters in Egypt, especially of matters relating to the reported abdication of the Khedive, and the concurrence of various Powers of Europe in that step? I will also ask, When the Papers relating to Egyptian matters will be laid on the Table?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I am much obliged to my hon. Friend for asking the Question in the form in which he has asked it. The English and French Governments have recommended the Khedive to abdicate, and that recommendation has been supported by the Governments of Germany, Austria, and Italy. We have not yet received the answer of the Khedive. With regard to the Papers asked for by my hon. Friend, he will see, of course, from the state in which I have described the negotiations to be at present, that I cannot at this moment name any particular day when the Papers will be presented. They will be presented at the earliest time that is consistent with the interests of the Public Service.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: Will the hon. Gentleman say why the Government asked the Khedive to resign?

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Baronet that he is now asking for the opinion of the Government, which goes beyond the limits of a Question.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I wish to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Leader of the House and Chief Minister here of the Party he represents, Whether he will take an early opportunity of telling the House distinctly what is the purpose and policy of the Government with regard to Egypt? ["Order!"] I will not break the Orders of the House, but I wish for information with regard to two points. Some say the bondholder is the object of Ministerial affection, and some say the condition of the population of Egypt excites the Government to interfere in Egyptian matters. I think it will be of great advantage to the House and the country that we should know what is the exact object of the intermeddling which has taken place, and which many of us fear may lead to great difficulty and, perhaps, disaster. If the right hon. Gentleman will give that information now I should be glad. If not, perhaps he will give it on some convenient day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The right hon. Gentleman and the House must perceive that it would be quite impossible for me to answer the Question of the right hon. Gentleman without giving occasion for a debate and a discussion; and I do not think it would be for the convenience of the House that such a discussion should be initiated without some Notice. At the present time, I must say, it would be very inconvenient, and, indeed, impossible, for the Government to enter into such a discussion in the actual state of affairs, although we shall be anxious, as soon as we can do so without getting into complications with other Powers, to make such a statement as is desired by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had just told the House that the Governments of England and France had joined in recommending the Khedive to abdicate. Would the hon. Gentleman further inform the House whether the recommendation was that the Khedive should abdicate in favour of his son, or whether he should simply place his resignation in the hands of the Porte?

Mr. BOURKE: It is impossible to answer that Question at present.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I beg to give Notice that I will, on Thursday, ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can state with whom negotiations, to which reference has been made by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his reply on the subject of Egypt, are at present going on? I will also repeat, in another form, the Question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochester, which I think was not quite understood. On what ground the application to the Khedive to resign has been made? I have not the slightest intention to say anything to provoke discussion at present. In justice to the Government, I think it right to state that, if they are not able to afford more detailed information upon this question to the House on Thursday next, it is extremely probable—in fact, it will be almost necessary—that an immediate, although, perhaps, an irregular, discussion should take place. We cannot, of course, call upon the Government to say anything which, in their opinion, would be prejudicial to the interests of the Public Service; but the Government will have to bear in mind that the House are in possession of information respecting not only negotiations, but also actions, which, although extremely imperfect, are of such a character that many hon. Members feel they would be wanting in their public duty if they were not to take the earliest opportunity of expressing their opinion with regard to what has taken place.

TURKEY AND GREECE—THE PAPERS. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Greek Papers will be in the hands of Members?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, that these Papers would, he hoped, be in the hands of Members on Friday; or, if not then, very soon after.

POST OFFICE STATISTICS—INDIA AND CHINA MAILS.—QUESTION.

Mr. J. HOLMS asked the Postmaster General, What was the amount received for postages to and from India, China, and Australia respectively, during the last year of which the statistics are complete?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, the gross receipts on account of sea postage, to which I presume the hon. Member refers, on mails to and from India and China respectively, for the year ended the 31st of March, 1876, the last year for which statistics are complete, were as follows:—India, £114,401; China and other places served by Peninsular and Oriental packets, £63,534. These amounts, however, are subject to considerable deductions in respect of the share of sea postage due to India. As regards Australia and New Zealand, the sea postage received on the outward mails via Suez for the same year was £30,976, the whole of which was handed over to those Colonies. The amount of sea postage on the homeward mails cannot be stated, as the entire collections are retained by the Colonies.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) —THREATENED EVICTION OF A PRIEST.—QUESTIONS.

Mr. VERNER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to a letter which appeared in the "Freeman's Journal" of 17th June last, from the Reverend Thomas Fenlon, Roman Catholic Priest, Ross-

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

nallis, Queen's County, and headed "Threatened Eviction of a Priest," in which it is stated that in consequence of a possible difference between himself and his landlord he has, to use his own words, brought his "case before the local public from the altar," and adds—

"In fact I am anxious for this case to terminate in my eviction, for I am thoroughly convinced that in good hands and turned to proper account it can be made to subserve the cause of the Irish tenant in a very telling forcible way;"

and, what steps the Government are taking in consequence of the state of affairs, of which the above letter, as well as the violent language made use of at recent meetings in the west of Ireland, afford evidence?

MR. O'DONNELL: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I should like to know, Whether he has inquired of the hon. Member for Armagh why, in referring to the end of the priest's letter, he omitted all mention of accounts of the priest's grievances?

MR. J. LOWTHER: With reference to the Question just asked by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), I can only say that I have not addressed an inquiry such as he suggests to my hon. Friend. In consequence of my attention being called to this letter by the Question of my hon. Friend, I have sent over to Ireland for information upon the subject, which, however, I have not yet had time to receive. Meanwhile, I think it only right to remind my hon. Friend and the House that the action of the Roman Catholic authorities in other parts of Ireland—whatever may be the rights or wrongs of this particular case—has been very different, happily, from that alleged in the case of this gentleman, and calls for recognition at the hands of Government and all lovers of order. With reference to the last matter alluded to—namely, the state of affairs in certain parts of the West of Ireland, brought about by what is known as the anti-rent movement—the Government is fully alive to the necessity of dealing promptly with it. Colonel Bruce, Deputy Inspector General of Constabulary, has been despatched on a special mission to the districts concerned. His duty will be to consult with the resident and other magistrates and the local constabulary, and to report to the Government as to what additional police force and special police stations may be required in order to enable full protection to be afforded to all persons in the exercise of their legal rights. Special police protection will be afforded to process-servers or others requiring it. Considerable reinforcements are being drafted into these districts; and it has been notified to the inhabitants that, in the event of any attempt at outrage, the cost of these measures will be levied off the neighbourhood in which it occurs.

MR. CALLAN: Would the Chief Secretary for Ireland say, Whether his attention has been directed to the meeting held at Milltown, County Galway—the last of these meetings that has been held—and say whether it is a fact that the chairman, proposer, and seconder of the resolutions were not tenant farmers, or in any way connected with the district in which the meeting was held?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I believe it is the case that some of the persons who took part in those meetings were not in any way connected with the neighbourhood.

MR. CALLAN: Nor with the land?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Certainly not connected with the land.

ARMY ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE— THE INSTRUCTIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is in a position to state generally what instructions have been given to the Army Committee?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I do not think it would be convenient to state the instructions to a Departmental Committee which is still sitting; but, speaking generally, I may say what the general tenour of the instructions to the Departmental Committee on the Army is. The Committee has been assembled in order that by their advice steps may be taken to remedy the practical defects which are found to occur in Lord Cardwell's scheme; but there is no intention to depart from the general principles of reorganization which have been accepted since 1870. We propose to refer to the Committee all the Reports of the Localization Committee of 1871-2, and the Reports of the Militia Committee of 1876, as well as those of the various subsidiary Committees connected with recruiting, enlistment, and so forth, and be quite impossible for me to answer the Question of the right hon. man without giving occasion for a discussion; and it would be for the House that such a discussion should be initiated without so much delay at the present time, I think it is very inconvenient and undesirable, for the Commission to have such a discussion of its affairs, although it is as soon as possible to get it into complete shape and make such arrangements as to the right of the Commission.

MR. DILLWYN asked the First Commissioner of Works, whether the Commission is now considering whether it should be included in the one Proclamation, including the Rhodope, Roumelia and the other Provinces or to have a separate one for the others?

SIR, we apprehend that the Commission will be the Commission for the subject will be responsible for Her Majesty's Commission to say what is to be the division of the various Provinces.

MR. GEORGE CAMPBELL: The Commission will remember that the Commission provides for a Commission to be appointed for each Province. Perhaps the Commission will be good enough to state. Whether any steps have been taken for the appointment of any one Commission for any one Province?

MR. BOURKE: Not at present.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE RIVER

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether he would be good enough to place before the House a Bill to amend the law relating to the River Orange in the Cape Colony. Mr. DILLWYN also asked whether the Commission for the River Orange is now considering whether it should be included in the one Proclamation, including the Rhodope, Roumelia and the other Provinces or to have a separate one for the others?

MR. MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In reply, he said, he could not lay the Report of the Commission on the Table; it was made two or three years ago to the Cape Government, and he had no copy of it.

MR. DILLWYN asked, Whether the Commission would not understand a copy, as the subject is interesting? MR. MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he would try to procure a copy.

HAMPTON COURT PARK—THE MASTER OF THE HORSE.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the First Commissioner of Works, What was the amount of rent now paid by the Master of the Horse for the pasturage and use of Hampton Court Park?

MR. GERARD NOEL, in reply, said, the Master of the Horse now paid £280 a-year for the pasturage and use of a portion of Hampton Court Park; but it must be remembered he had to maintain 500 deer, and to provide hay and other food for them during the winter.

THE CHARITY COMMISSION.—THE EXPENSES.—QUESTION.

MR. PELL asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When he proposes to give effect to his recent statement, that part of the expenses of the Charity Commission are to be forthwith defrayed by the charities under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, and if Papers in relation to this matter are to be presented to the House?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he mentioned on a former occasion that some delay would take place; but, in concert with the First Commissioner, he had re-considered the arrangement then proposed, and he hoped in a few days to place before the House a Bill carrying out the recommendations now agreed to.

GRAND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN: The Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill stands on the Orders for second reading this evening. Will the Chief Secretary be good enough to state if it is intended to proceed with it to-night?

MR. J. LOWTHER: We do not intend to take that Order to-night.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS. STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it might be convenient to the House that he should mention, with reference to the order of Business, that there was a Private Bill for the purchase of the East India Railway fixed for to-morrow; but it had been arranged that it should not be taken till to-morrow week. He hoped to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill after the Army Discipline Bill. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had given Notice of a Motion on the subject; but he did not think it need lead to any discussion. He should also be glad to take the East India Loan Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Courts Martial.

Clause 47 (Regimental courts martial).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 22, to leave out lines 15 and 16—namely,

“Any officer authorised by or in pursuance of this Act to convene general and district courts martial, or either of them, also.”

The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, that his object in moving the Amendment was to endeavour to put the legislation relating to courts martial on the same simple footing upon which it now stood in the existing Mutiny Act, and upon which it had stood since the Mutiny Acts were first passed—the time of William III., 1689. He proposed to omit the two first lines of the clause, in order that it might begin with the words—“Any commanding officer of a rank, not below the rank of captain,” and so on. The two first lines of the clause, as it now stood, introduced in the Army an entirely new system, and a practice which had never been thought of before, much less put into operation. By the clause, any officer of superior rank might order a commanding officer of a regiment to assemble a regimental court martial and to submit the proceedings of such court martial to him for confirmation. The practice hitherto observed had been that the commanding officer was supreme in his regiment, with regard to the assembling or confirming of a regimental court martial. No one else but the commanding officer of a regiment could assemble a regimental court martial, and he alone could confirm the proceedings—in fact, a regimental court martial had been held to be a purely regimental concern, for which the commanding officer was responsible. But, under the proposed arrangement, any superior officers who were authorized might themselves convene a regimental court martial. This was an entirely new system, and one which he feared would work very injuriously. It was well that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War should inform the Committee on what grounds this very novel procedure had been proposed. The Committee would find that the present system of courts martial was so very simple that he regretted exceedingly that it was proposed to change it. Clause 6 of the existing Mutiny Act enacted power to constitute courts martial. It said—

“For the purpose of bringing offenders against this Act of Justice Her Majesty may, from time to time, assemble courts martial.”

That was the authority of Parliament to enable the Crown to assemble courts martial. After giving the Crown power to assemble courts martial, the present Act proceeded in the next section to describe the places where offenders might be tried. It then went on to state the powers of general courts martial; the next section enacted the powers of district courts martial; the next section dealt with the powers of the regimental courts martial, enacting the power for each court martial in the order of importance in which it stood. Now, that was a very simple process; it was a process well understood in the Army, and had existed, as he had already said, for 200 years. It was now proposed to alter that system, and to let the authority of Parliament for convening courts martial apply only to regimental courts martial—to the lesser of the three kinds of such tribunals—while the two other courts martial were to be assembled under an Order emanating from the Sovereign. He would read the words the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War used in explaining this change, when he introduced the Bill in the House. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said—“Passing next to courts martial, we have rearranged the old law, but we have maintained the principle. Now, courts martial will be divided into two classes, in respect of the mode in which they are convened. First of all, courts martial are now convened under the authority of the Statute alone,” —that was the Bill they were now discussing—

“and, secondly, under authority, derived mediately or immediately, by Warrant from the Crown. The first class, under the Act of Parliament, are regimental courts martial and detachment courts martial; secondly, general courts martial and districts courts martial.”—[3 Hansard, ccxliii. 1916.]

The draft Bill, which was laid before the Select Committee, was drawn on the same principle as the existing Mutiny Act, for it was there seen that under one of the provisions Her Majesty had power to, from time to time, grant a Warrant for courts martial under Royal Sign Manual. It was drawn up on the principle that Parliament should give to the Sovereign the power to hold district and general courts martial; and he could not see for what purpose that simple arrangement had been altered. The Committee would find that Clause 47, as it now stood, dealt with regimental courts martial under the authority of statute; and that the next clause went on to say that—

“The following rules are enacted with respect to general courts martial and district courts martial:—(1.) A general court martial shall be convened by Her Majesty, or some officer deriving authority to convene a general court martial immediately or mediately for Her Majesty.”

In Clause 122 the subject of courts martial was again taken up, for it was there recited—

“Her Majesty may, by any Warrant or Warrants under her Sign Manual, in such form as Her Majesty may, from time to time direct, from time to time convene, or authorize any qualified officer to convene, a general court martial.”

They had, therefore, a curious mixture of authority regarding courts martial. He had tried, in every possible way, to see why the subject had been divided into two parts; and now he proposed to omit the two first lines of this clause, in order to let regimental courts martial, to which the clause related, be convened by the commanding officers of regiments. And then he proposed to alter the first two lines of Clause 48, so that authority should be introduced to enable the Sovereign to convene courts martial in the same manner as at present; and then he proposed to omit Clause 47, and put it in the Bill in its proper place—namely, after the clause dealing with district courts martial. By that means they would give the Sovereign power to hold courts martial according to the present system; and they would have general courts martial, district courts martial, and regimental courts martial maintained in the same order and plan as in the existing Act. Unless the Secretary of State for War could give him reasons for this extraordinary change he should be bound to ask for a Division.

COLONEL STANLEY could not agree with the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) that the Bill introduced any complication. So far from that being the case, it seemed to him that the two clauses taken together, as they were intended to be, really made the matter very much clearer. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had correctly quoted what he (Colonel Stanley) said when introducing the Bill to the House. He then observed that there were two classes of courts martial—the courts martial convened by Statute alone, and those convened by Warrant from Her Majesty. The regulations as to general courts martial remained unaltered, for the convening authority must be Her Majesty, or a person authorized by Warrant. He could not quite understand in what way the power of the Sovereign had been altered. As regarded the position of officers holding an immediate authority, it was intended that the mere fact of holding a warrant for the convening of general courts martial should carry with it the authority to convene district courts martial. That was the alteration that was made. He was afraid that if he were to take the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman as being hostile to the principle he had enunciated he must resist it.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON observed, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not said why he introduced the question of the superior officer. An entirely new system was started.

Sir Alexander Gordon

COLONEL STANLEY said, it was true that they had altered the detachment general court martial. It now passed under the name of the regimental court martial. Of course, the hon. and gallant Gentleman could not fail to see that there was a wide power given to particular officers; but in that respect it was not intended to interfere with the ordinary powers of commanding officers of regiments.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that if it were not intended to interfere with the ordinary powers of the commanding officers of regiments, then the clause must be altered; because it gave power to superior officers to convene courts martial, whether the commanding officer liked it or not. Hitherto, it had been most important that the commanding officer of a regiment should feel that that power rested with him, and that he was responsible. When a commanding officer wanted a higher power, he went to a superior officer for a higher class of court martial. He desired the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to state where power was given to the Sovereign to assemble courts martial; what part of the Clauses 47 and 48 contained that power which now existed in the Military Act, and without which the Sovereign could not hold courts martial? [Lord EUSTACE CECIL: In the 137th section.] He (Sir Alexander Gordon) thought that that power ought to be provided before they went a step further. They ought to give the Sovereign power to hold courts martial at the part of the Bill where courts martial were dealt with, instead of giving such authority at the tail-end of the Bill. In the old Mutiny Act that power was provided in the first four lines; and he maintained that the present clause should commence in a somewhat similar manner to that Act. He was watching the progress of the Bill most carefully; because the practical effect of this clause, and others affecting the Prerogative of the Crown, was that the Sovereign would have power to hold courts martial without the authority of Parliament.

COLONEL STANLEY directed the hon. and gallant Gentleman's attention to Clause 48—

"The following rules are enacted with respect to general courts martial and district courts martial:—(1.) A general court martial shall be convened by Her Majesty, or some officer de-riding authority to convene a general court martial immediately or mediately from Her Majesty. (2.) A district court martial shall be convened by an officer authorized to convene a general court martial, or some officer deriving authority to convene a district court martial from an officer authorized to convene general courts martial."

Then Clause 122 provided that—

"Her Majesty may, by any Warrant or Warrants under Her Sign Manual, in such form as Her Majesty may, from time to time direct, from time to time convene, or authorize any qualified officer to convene, a general court martial."

He really failed to see the hon. and gallant Gentleman's point.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the words which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had just read ought to commence the part of the Bill they were now considering.

Amendment negatived.

MR. J. HOLMS moved, in page 22, line 22, after the word "consist," to insert—

"Of five ranks of members, viz.: one captain; two first lieutenants; two second lieutenants; two non-commissioned officers; two privates; the captain to be president."

[An hon. MEMBER: And two drummer boys.] The hon. Gentleman said they had completed that part of the Bill which dealt chiefly with crime and punishment, and now they came to another very serious portion of the question—the formation of courts martial. The powers which were invested in courts martial were very important; and he was not quite sure that the Committee was fully impressed with the magnitude and seriousness of the question. He would only give them one fact which ought to arrest their attention, and it was this—that on Saturday morning, amongst the other Parliamentary Papers that were delivered to them, there was one which set forth the number of criminal indictments that were for trial before the Courts having criminal jurisdiction in England and Wales in the year 1877. The number of such indictments was 15,179; while, in the same year, the number of courts martial held in the British Army was 15,793. The criminal indictments, however, referred to persons, the other calculation to trials; so that, in order to correct the two returns for comparison, it was as well to state that the number of persons tried by courts martial in the British Army in 1877 was close on 14,000. That was a comparison which ought to arrest the attention of the House of Commons, and of the Committee. In the former instance—that of the criminal indictments of England and Wales—all the persons were tried by their peers; while, in the other case—the courts martial—the persons charged were not tried by their peers. And that was the point to which he wished to call attention. In reality, the particular clause that his Amendment applied to dealt only with regimental courts martial; and the number of persons tried by regimental courts martial in 1877 was 6,549. He wished, at the very outset, to state that he had no desire to stand by the exact arrangement of his Amendment; but he did particularly wish to urge that they should consider the propriety of introducing a new system respecting the formation of courts martial, in order that they might be able to give to the soldier some guarantee that he would have as great justice done to him in the Army as any civilian had in civil life. They had not hitherto received, to any great extent, the advantage of the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown in the consideration of this Bill; they might, perhaps, receive it upon this particular point. He was aware that the probable answer he would receive from the military authorities in the House was that a proposal of this character was not at all fitted to their system; that this was an application of a German system—that it was foreign. He at once admitted that; but he begged hon. and gallant Gentlemen to consider how far it might not be advantageous to them to adopt some such principle. He was perfectly willing to examine with great care any objection that might be made. He knew he would be told that in foreign Armies they had conscription; but that in England they had no conscription. He was disposed to examine this point; and, in the first place, he would ask the Committee if our system was so perfect that it needed no change? He asserted that they had now got a good class of men in the Army; and if they expected to get and to keep them some change was necessary. The War Office could not complain that they had not had, during the last six or seven years, almost all they had asked for. To-day, with only 132,000 men, they had granted them £2,500,000 more than they had five years ago. If they looked for the result of their system at the little war now going on in South Africa, he scarcely thought there would be anyone bold enough to say, or to suggest, that the system was anything like satisfactory. The system was going to be examined by a Departmental Committee—an admission that the Government did not think the system was anything like perfect. The second objection to which he would refer was that they ought not to adopt the system he proposed, because they had not, as in foreign countries, the system of conscription. Now, he would ask hon. and gallant Members to consider why it was that in Germany, although they there had the conscription, they gave a man the same freedom when he was moved from the civilian life to the military life—he maintained the same rights he had when in the civil life? In Germany, no sense of degradation attached to a man serving his country in the ranks, and care was taken that the men should have their equal rights. Suppose they had the conscription to-morrow in this country, could it be supposed the nation would allow that men, taken from their homes by force, should have less consideration before the law than they had at present? Certainly not; and to be consistent, if men were taken into the Army now, as volunteers, they should have the same opportunity of being tried by their peers as they had if brought before a jury. In the Army, on the other hand, a man was not tried by his peers at all. This was no question of raising the pay of the soldier for our Army; it was the improving of the terms under which he served—that he should be treated the same under his military life as under his civil life. He had no wish to urge the adoption of any extreme measure; and this, he thought, was a fair way of raising and discussing that principle of law, that a man should be tried by his peers; and he hoped the Secretary of State for War would take it into consideration. He moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. J. Holmes

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the hon. Gentleman had raised, by his Amendment, a very grave and important subject; and though it was only now proposed, it was a question of the most entirely new system of amendment to composing the court martial, and then there would be an opportunity of giving prisoners justice, and of giving them a tribunal in which they and the public should have a right to have confidence. One of the arguments advanced against the proposal was this—that the members of the court martial would be likely to talk in the barrack-room of the result and progress of the case. He thought that was a very good argument in favour of non-commissioned officers and privates being admitted, because one of the most valuable things was publicity. If persons heard the evidence they would, probably, be better satisfied with the result than they would if they did not know what had taken place, and if they only heard an unfair and partial statement.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, interposing, explained that he only said they would talk over the finding and sentence, not the evidence.

MR. BIGGAR said, even so, it was very desirable that they should inspire confidence. In all probability, the members of a court martial went into a private room to consult, and, in giving their decision, they did not give their reasons; but if they discussed the matter in the presence of non-commissioned officers and privates, the result would be that a certain amount of public opinion would be exercised over the officers, and, therefore, they would be likely to give decisions in which the public and the Army would have confidence.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the Amendment, undoubtedly, had, at first, a very fascinating effect on a certain class of men; but, on examination, it would be found to be the most impracticable and impractical Amendment that was ever proposed. In confirmation of what had been said, and coming at the same facts from different points of view, he might say that he had heard the opinions of hundreds of soldiers, both those still serving and those who had left the Service and were likely to be under no influence, and he never heard any soldier express the slightest doubt as to the justice and impartiality of the tribunals already existing in the Army. Perhaps the hon. Member might not be aware that as far back as the Crimean War, and before that, there was an informal tribunal in the Service—an extreme development of the principle advocated by the hon. Member for Hackney—a tribunal which was called the company court martial, and which dealt with certain offences committed by the soldier affecting his fellows, such as pilfering and theft. The officers did not interfere at all; but permission was given to the oldest soldiers in the company to assemble an informal tribunal, in order to administer justice to the criminal in any way they thought proper. Usually, the offender was laid on the table and punished with a flat rod; and the reason that tribunal was abolished was because it was found the severity of the sentences it inflicted was far greater than that of those inflicted by the more regular tribunals then existing. There was one point in relation to this Amendment which its Mover had overlooked, and that was that if he desired that a soldier should be tried by his peers, he should prevent non-commissioned officers, of all persons, from being on the court; whereas he proposed to put two non-commissioned officers and two privates. It was one of the most essential points in the Service, and the reason why such good feeling existed, that the non-commissioned officer in the English Service had not any primitive or disciplinary power whatever, as he had in the foreign Services. The non-commissioned officers were kept as an intermediate class, and their position was preserved because they were never allowed any voice whatever, except as regarded giving evidence, in connection with the punishment of a soldier. The non-commissioned officer was constantly brought, from the circumstances of his position, into contact with the private, and was often likely to bear a grudge against him, which could not be entertained by anybody in the position of an officer. Therefore, he was the last person to whom judicial powers should be granted. If, as an alternative, his hon. Friend had proposed a court consisting half of officers and half of privates, it would have been a far more impartial tribunal. However, he (Sir Henry Havelock) preferred the existing tribunals; and as no possible good could arise from the Amendment he was compelled to vote against it.

GENERAL SHUTE said, he knew the hon. Member for Hackney never wished to take up the time of the House unnecessarily, and he was sure if the hon.

by altogether the consideration of what was done in foreign Armies. He did not know that his hon. Friend was a great authority on that subject; but if he were, he might be justly answered by the objection that the English Army was not like foreign Armies, and resembled them in no respect, and if French and German private soldiers sat on courts martial, that was no reason why ours should. He was satisfied it was contrary to the legal spirit which should conduct those proceedings; nor did he think that military men on either side of the House would say that such a proposal as this, if carried into effect, would in any way conduce to good order.

COLONEL ALEXANDER thought the private soldier himself would be inclined to say to the hon. Member for Hackney—"Save me from my friends." The private soldier was not only not fitted to serve on courts martial, but he would not wish to do so. The Royal Commission in 1869 took evidence from private soldiers as to their opinions of courts martial, and the manner in which they were conducted. The names of the witnesses who were examined were not divulged, nor the numbers of their regiments, and they were assured of that beforehand. They came forward perfectly voluntarily, and gave their evidence with the utmost freedom. Private H. stated he believed that a man who was tried by a regimental court martial got full justice at his trial, and he had never known a man to be unjustly convicted by a regimental court martial. Private G. said he had been twice tried by a court martial, and he had no fault to find with it upon either occasion. He added, "I have had fair-play;" and what could be said more than that? Private F. was against the system of regimental courts martial, and preferred district and general courts martial, because he thought regimental courts martial were influenced too much by the colonel; but, then, he added that he had never known a case of a man who was known to have been unjustly convicted by a regimental court martial, although, as a matter of fact, he preferred the superior court to the inferior court. Corporal E. said the feeling amongst soldiers was that a man who was tried by court martial had a fair means of defending himself, and he had never heard any complaint as to the decisions of courts martial. Bombardier E. of the Royal Horse Artillery, said he had never seen any injustice in a court martial, and he had never known a man convicted who was known by his comrades to be innocent; and evidence was given by several non-commissioned officers to the same effect. The want of education in our private soldiers would be a very serious defect. Every officer, on joining the Army, had to attend the proceedings of courts martial for six months before he was allowed to sit on one; and before he could sit on a general court martial he must have served three years. Would the hon. Member for Hackney select his private soldiers to sit on courts martial in the same way, or would he say that a private who had joined six months should sit on a general court martial upon which an officer who had joined two years could not sit? It was quite true that, in the German Army, privates sat on courts martial; but one of the points in a German court martial was this—that each member had to sign his opinion; and, perhaps, they would get many private soldiers serving on courts martial in the English Army who would not be able to sign. Then, in Germany, the members of the court were cautioned that the finding and sentence were not to be divulged. Did hon. Members think that an English private, when he found himself in the barrack-room all day, would not discuss the proceedings of a court martial; and that the comrades of a man who had been a member of the court would not attempt to ascertain from him what the finding of the court had been? And did they not think that, in the event of its being ascertained that Private So-and-so had voted for a very severe sentence, he would not be a marked man in the regiment ever afterwards? It was absurd to say he would not. Then, supposing a soldier were taken up for being absent in a disorderly house in the purlieus of Westminster, was he to be tried by another soldier who, perhaps, was absent at the same disorderly house on the previous day? Not only that, but he thought there would be the greatest difficulty in composing this mixed court martial. Every man, on being put upon his trial, would ask if he had any objection to the members of the court; but as peremptory challenges were not allowed, some of the reasons that might be given for objecting might be rather amusing. Indeed, he thought there would be some difficulty in composing the court under these circumstances. But, with regard to Germany, he did not think the English privates would care much for copying the German system in any way. Perhaps the hon. Member for Hackney might not be aware of some of the summary punishments to which the German soldiers were subject. They were made to undergo imprisonment in a cell with a lath floor, in which the offender could neither stand nor sit without pain; and this torture was so excessive that there was a regulation that there should be an interval of 48 hours between every 24 hours of punishment. Then, a delinquent, instead of suffering arrest, might be tied to a tree, or a wheel for three hours daily. Captain Hozier, who gave evidence before the Commission, said that, in the field, very few courts martial were held in the Prussian Service, and that men were punished very severely without any court martial. They tied men to gun wheels and other torturing punishments. He was quite certain the privates of the English Army would not thank the hon. Gentleman for his proposal.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was a great deal, no doubt, in the Amendment that commended itself to one's sympathies; but when they talked of assimilating the military and civil systems, it would not be done by this Amendment. A man who served on a court martial was not only a juror, but a judge; and the Amendment would assign to private soldiers duties which were reserved for judges, and were not a portion of the duties of a common jury at all. For instance, the sentence, which was, above all, a question for the judge, and which nobody would think of leaving to the jury—that, according to the Amendment, would be left to the private soldier. That was a serious question, which should be left to the judge, as questions of law and evidence should be left to the jury. Now, they must constitute a court martial in a manner to fit it to be both judge and jury, which, in fact, it was. In civil life they did not compose their juries of everybody. There was a qualification for a jury laid down in the Act of George IV., which was passed in the year 1825. They took care that the illiterate and the lowest classes should not be members of juries; but how did the hon. Gentleman propose to do that with the privates of a regiment? There was no qualification proposed in the Amendment. In civil life they had a qualification for common jurors, and they had a qualification of another character for a special jury; but in a regiment there would be no such security at all for the class of the hon. Gentleman's jury, even if they could be considered a jury at all. How would his hon. Friend choose his privates? If they were to have privates on a jury, they must be taken indiscriminately; because, if they began to discriminate, they made an evil which was far greater than the one they were supposed to cure. They would never allow the authorities to select men to conduct the case; anything approaching to selection would be strongly objected to. What could be worse than to have the pet private of the regiment, who was to be put on a court martial? He would be, probably, regarded as the most objectionable member of all. Then, were they to have the newest soldier, or a man whose character was bad, but who had succeeded in keeping out of the hands of courts martial? Neither of those men would command the confidence of his comrades, or anybody else. Therefore, the practical difficulties in the way of forming a jury of that kind were absolutely unsurmountable. He was not familiar with the working of the German Army; but this he could say—that in the system of the German Army they got a better class of men to sit on courts martial than the average English private soldier. They were men of a higher and more educated class. Therefore, it seemed to him, for all these reasons, that there were strong practical objections to the Amendment.

MR. CALLAN said, he at first sight intended to vote for the Amendment; but on consideration, and in the interest of the private soldier, he should certainly vote against it. He believed the esprit de corps was such that a private soldier would feel more confidence in a court martial composed of officers, than he would in a court partly composed of privates and non-commissioned officers, who were brought more into immediate contact with him. There was one argument, however, which was used by the last speaker but one, which, if it were given effect to, would narrow exceedingly the be quite impossible for me to answer the Question of the right hon. Gentleman without giving occasion for a debate and a discussion; and I do not think it would be for the convenience of the House that such a discussion should be initiated without some Notice. At the present time, I must say, it would be very inconvenient, and, indeed, impossible, for the Government to enter into such a discussion in the actual state of affairs, although we shall be anxious, as soon as we can do so without getting into complications with other Powers, to make such a statement as is desired by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. COURTNEY said, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had just told the House that the Governments of England and France had joined in recommending the Khedive to abdicate. Would the hon. Gentleman further inform the House whether the recommendation was that the Khedive should abdicate in favour of his son, or whether he should simply place his resignation in the hands of the Porte?

MR. BOURKE: It is impossible to answer that Question at present.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I beg to give Notice that I will, on Thursday, ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can state with whom negotiations, to which reference has been made by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his reply on the subject of Egypt, are at present going on? I will also repeat, in another form, the Question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochester, which I think was not quite understood, On what ground the application to the Khedive to resign has been made? I have not the slightest intention to say anything to provoke discussion at present. In justice to the Government, I think it right to state that, if they are not able to afford more detailed information upon this question to the House on Thursday next, it is extremely probable—in fact, it will be almost necessary—that an immediate, although, perhaps, an irregular, discussion should take place. We cannot, of course, call upon the Government to say anything which, in their opinion, would be prejudicial to the interests of the Public Service; but the Government will have to bear in mind that the House are in possession of information respecting not only negotiations, but also actions, which, although extremely imperfect, are of such a character that many hon. Members feel they would be wanting in their public duty if they were not to take the earliest opportunity of expressing their opinion with regard to what has taken place.

TURKEY AND GREECE—THE PAPERS. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Greek Papers will be in the hands of Members?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that these Papers would, he hoped, be in the hands of Members on Friday; or, if not then, very soon after.

POST OFFICE STATISTICS—INDIA AND CHINA MAILS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Postmaster General, What was the amount received for postages to and from India, China, and Australia respectively, during the last year of which the statistics are complete?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, the gross receipts on account of sea postage, to which I presume the hon. Member refers, on mails to and from India and China respectively, for the year ended the 31st of March, 1876, the last year for which statistics are complete, were as follows:—India, £114,401; China and other places served by Peninsular and Oriental packets, £63,534. These amounts, however, are subject to considerable deductions in respect of the share of sea postage due to India. As regards Australia and New Zealand, the sea postage received on the outward mails via Suez for the same year was £30,976, the whole of which was handed over to those Colonies. The amount of sea postage on the homeward mails cannot be stated, as the entire collections are retained by the Colonies.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) —THREATENED EVICTION OF A PRIEST.—QUESTIONS.

MR. VERNER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to a letter which appeared in the "Freeman's Journal" of 17th June last, from the Reverend Thomas Fenlon, Roman Catholic Priest, Rosenallis, Queen's County, and headed "Threatened Eviction of a Priest," in which it is stated that in consequence of a possible difference between himself and his landlord he has, to use his own words, brought his "case before the local public from the altar," and adds—

"In fact I am anxious for this case to terminate in my eviction, for I am thoroughly convinced that in good hands and turned to proper account it can be made to subserve the cause of the Irish tenant in a very telling forcible way;"

and, what steps the Government are taking in consequence of the state of affairs, of which the above letter, as well as the violent language made use of at recent meetings in the west of Ireland, afford evidence?

MR. O'DONNELL: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I should like to know, Whether he has inquired of the hon. Member for Armagh why, in referring to the end of the priest's letter, he omitted all mention of accounts of the priest's grievances?

MR. J. LOWTHER: With reference to the Question just asked by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), I can only say that I have not addressed an inquiry such as he suggests to my hon. Friend. In consequence of my attention being called to this letter by the Question of my hon. Friend, I have sent over to Ireland for information upon the subject, which, however, I have not yet had time to receive. Meanwhile, I think it only right to remind my hon. Friend and the House that the action of the Roman Catholic authorities in other parts of Ireland—whatever may be the rights or wrongs of this particular case—has been very different, happily, from that alleged in the case of this gentleman, and calls for recognition at the hands of Government and all lovers of order. With reference to the last matter alluded to—namely, the state of affairs in certain parts of the West of Ireland, brought about by what is known as the anti-rent movement—the Government is fully alive to the necessity of dealing promptly with it. Colonel Bruce, Deputy Inspector General of Constabulary, has been despatched on a special mission to the districts concerned. His duty will be to consult with the resident and other magistrates and the local constabulary, and to report to the Government as to what additional police force and special police stations may be required in order to enable full protection to be afforded to all persons in the exercise of their legal rights. Special police protection will be afforded to process-servers or others requiring it. Considerable reinforcements are being drafted into these districts; and it has been notified to the inhabitants that, in the event of any attempt at outrage, the cost of these measures will be levied off the neighbourhood in which it occurs.

MR. CALLAN: Would the Chief Secretary for Ireland say, Whether his attention has been directed to the meeting held at Milltown, County Galway—the last of these meetings that has been held—and say whether it is a fact that the chairman, proposer, and seconder of the resolutions were not tenant farmers, or in any way connected with the district in which the meeting was held?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I believe it is the case that some of the persons who took part in those meetings were not in any way connected with the neighbourhood.

MR. CALLAN: Nor with the land?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Certainly not connected with the land.

ARMY ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE— THE INSTRUCTIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is in a position to state generally what instructions have been given to the Army Committee?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I do not think it would be convenient to state the instructions to a Departmental Committee which is still sitting; but, speaking generally, I may say what the general tenour of the instructions to the Departmental Committee on the Army is. The Committee has been assembled in order that by their advice steps may be taken to remedy the practical defects which are found to occur in Lord Cardwell's scheme; but there is no intention to depart from the general principles of reorganization which have been accepted since 1870. We propose to refer to the Committee all the Reports of the Localization Committee of 1871-2, and the Reports of the Militia Committee of 1876, as well as those of the various subsidiary Committees connected with recruiting, enlistment, and so forth, and illiterate mechanics the trial of criminals. The magnificent Army of Germany had adopted the principle advocated by those who supported this Amendment.

MR. J. HOLMS said, that in replying to the observations that had been made upon his Amendment, he had no reason to be discontented with the remarks that had fallen from hon. and gallant Members, or from hon. and learned Members, with regard to it. He hoped to see such improvements effected in the Army as would attract a better class of men to it. He could well understand the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General stating that the Army was quite satisfied with the existing system of courts martial; but when he spoke of the Army, of course he meant the officers only. And, indeed, even if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had intended to refer to the Army generally, his statement that it was content with the existing system would afford no satisfaction to those who were anxious to raise the status of the private soldier. He could also understand the argument which had been put forward that many soldiers were at present unfitted to sit upon a court martial. He, however, desired to get rid of the existing system, and, by substituting for it a better one, to attract a superior class of men into the Army. He could also understand the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), when he said that his Amendment would not convert a court martial into a tribunal, such as that which consisted of a Judge and a common jury. He must, however, point out that the system of constituting courts martial he recommended had already been adopted with success in the German Army. Satisfied with having raised this discussion, and pointing out that he had given Notice of similar Amendments upon other clauses, he would not press the Amendment. He had received a number of letters from very eminent men in the Army, to the effect that it would be of great advantage to the Service if non-commissioned officers were not in future to be tried by regimental but by district courts martial.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could quite understand the ground on which this Amendment had been moved, and he was not, therefore, going to take up the time of the Committee in speaking upon it. He could not, on the part of the Government, accept any definite words, as far as the non-commissioned officers were concerned, because their case would be dealt with by the Committee which had been appointed by the House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER moved, in page 22, sub-section 2, line 23, after the word "officers," to insert the words—

"Such number to be, in the United Kingdom not less than five, and elsewhere not less than three."

The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, his object was to restore the complement at home of officers necessary for forming a regimental court martial to the number of five, now required by the Mutiny Act. At the same time, he was prepared to admit that under exceptional circumstances — such, for instance, as might arise in the Colonies from the difficulty of assembling even as many as five — a different arrangement might be permitted, and the number reduced to three. His Amendment would thus restore the exact provision as to numbers for a regimental court martial contained in the present Mutiny Act.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, inasmuch as the present Articles of War gave to the commanding officers power to do all that was asked by it; and that, as in several cases it would not be possible to call together the number of officers proposed by the Amendment, there might be a lapse of several months before necessary inquiries could be held.

MAJOR O'BRIEN opposed the Amendment, on the ground that justice would be delayed if it was necessary that so large a number of officers as was suggested should be called to serve upon a court martial. This difficulty would be much greater in a Cavalry than in an Infantry regiment, and would entail much more of expense. Therefore, he strongly supported the Amendment which had been moved.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT agreed with the opinions which had been expressed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee, mainly on the ground that the proposals contained in the Bill would injuriously affect the Cavalry branch of the Service.

Mr. Hopwood

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON supported the Amendment, on the ground that it would afford to soldiers a protection to which they were properly entitled.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he had a similar Amendment on the Paper—namely, in page 22, line 23, to leave out, “but such number shall in no case be less than three,” and insert—

“Such number to be, in the United Kingdom not less than five, and elsewhere not less than three.”

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, there was no reason why in India the number of a court martial should not be five.

COLONEL STANLEY could not accept the proposal in its entirety, because, if carried, it might produce delay; but, at the same time, he saw no objection to leaving out the words “United Kingdom;” and he, therefore, proposed to amend the Amendment in those terms.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. O'DONNELL moved, in line 35, after the word “days,” to insert “or flogging,” his object being that when flogging was to be inflicted it should be by the order of a higher court than a regimental court martial.

Amendment proposed,

In page 22, line 35, after the word “days,” to insert the words “or flogging.”—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY could not accept the Amendment. If the punishment of flogging remained, it would be necessary to leave its infliction in some cases to regimental courts martial.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 97: Majority 81.—(Div. List, No. 131.)

COLONEL DRUMMOND-MORAY said, if the latter part of the sub-section, the omission of which he intended to move, were allowed to remain in the clause, a great alteration would be thereby made in the law as it at present existed. Under the Articles of War some offences were considered to be of too grave a character to be tried by regimental courts martial, and were, therefore, dealt with either by general or district courts martial; but the effect of the clause as it then stood would be to render such offences triable by regimental court martial. The opinion held by one commanding officer as to whether a certain offence should be tried by general, district, or regimental court martial, might be entirely different from the opinion held by another commanding officer; and, therefore, it might occur that of two persons tried for the same offence, say at Aldershot, one might receive a heavy sentence from a district court-martial, while the other, being tried by regimental court martial, would only get half the punishment awarded in the other case. The clause gave greater power to the commanding officer than he now possessed, inasmuch as it would rest with him to decide whether a man should be liable to 42 days' imprisonment, or whether he should be liable to two years' imprisonment. For these reasons, he thought that the offences triable by courts martial should be scheduled in a way which would insure that grave offences should be tried by higher courts than regimental courts martial. He therefore moved in page 22, line 35, to leave out from the word “ignominy,” to the end of the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 22, line 35, to leave out from the word “ignominy,” to the end of the Clause.—(Colonel Drummond-Moray.)

Question proposed, “That the words, ‘but subject as aforesaid,’ stand part of the Clause.”

COLONEL STANLEY objected to the Amendment, on the ground that it would practically give no discretion to commanding officers in the matter of courts martial. It was well known to be the custom, under the old rule, to apply for the appointment of the highest class of courts martial by which a man could be tried; and the answer usually given was—“You must try by district court martial; we cannot give you a general court martial.” By allowing the clause to remain unaltered, he could not help thinking that the responsibility of deciding the proper class of courts martial to be convened would be left upon the shoulders of the right persons.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON entirely agreed with the views expressed by the hon. and gallant Members opposite who had just spoken. It was well known that commanding officers of regiments would, in many cases, try grave offences by regimental court martial, in order to have a blank court martial return; and the Commander-in-Chief, as well as the War Office authorities, were very apt, in consequence, to form an erroneous judgment as to the character of particular regiments. It was very necessary to insure that commanding officers should not shrink from bringing their men to court martial for grave crimes; but this would be rendered impossible if the clause remained in its present form.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT took a little exception to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), which implied an intention on the part of commanding officers to screen the men in their regiments from the punishment due to their offences. Such cases, in his opinion, were so rare and extraordinary that it would be quite unnecessary to provide for them. But there was much that was worthy of consideration in the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Perthshire (Colonel Drummond-Moray); because there could be no doubt that commanding officers differed very much in the views which they took as to the gravity of crimes—some regarding a crime as a grave one, which others would look upon as perfectly venial. For that reason, he agreed that it would be advisable to schedule the offences in the manner suggested by the hon. and gallant Member.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK could not admit that any sufficient reason had been urged for limiting the discretion of officers in the matter of courts martial.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER thought that some security other than that which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had introduced into the clause should be provided in the Bill. The Articles of War prescribed the offences which were triable by the various degrees of courts martial; but the present Bill contained no similar security. He supposed, after the passing of this Bill, very little would be heard of the Articles of War; and it was, therefore, very important that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Perthshire (Colonel Drummond-Moray) should, in some form, be accepted.

COLONEL DRUMMOND-MORAY trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would state to the Committee whether he intended to schedule the offences?

COLONEL STANLEY, for the reasons already stated, was unable to agree to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT could not agree that the matter could be best dealt with by scheduling the crimes. He understood that one of the great difficulties was that originally under the Articles of War the matter was arranged, not according to the character of the crime, but according to the character of the tribunal which carried with it the punishment. The great objection to that, and the one which induced the Committee to assent to the plan proposed was, that it was said that when an offence was carried to a district or general court martial the court seemed to feel that they were compelled, from the mere fact of the crime being carried before them, to award a high punishment. That was one of the strong arguments by which the Committee were pressed. As far as he understood the clause, it proposed that offences of whatever character might be submitted to a regimental court martial; but that the regimental court martial should not give more than a certain amount of punishment. It was quite possible that the authorities might consider that the offence, owing to the circumstances which surrounded it, might be adequately dealt with by a moderate punishment, and would, therefore, not send it to a general or district court martial; where the punishment might be of a very much heavier kind; but he could not understand that any officer in command of a regiment would desire that crimes should meet with an inadequate punishment; if so, he would be extremely unworthy of the commission which he held. He (Sir William Harcourt) was surprised to hear officers of such experience as the hon. and gallant Members for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) and Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) say that commanding officers would deliberately refer crimes to certain tribunals because they knew that they would be inadequately dealt with. If that were so, all he could say was that, instead of amending the present clause, the officers in question ought to be removed from the Army, because they must be persons utterly unfit to discharge the duties which they were called upon to perform. But, taking a higher view of them, if they were fit for the positions in which they were placed, they must exercise some discretion as to whether a crime ought to be referred to one tribunal or another, and that was what the clause provided for.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME trusted that the Secretary of State for War would make some concession in this matter; for he fully concurred in the opinions which had been expressed by his hon. and gallant Friends upon the subject of scheduling the crimes to be referred to the various degrees of courts martial. Those opinions, he felt sure, would be shared by commanding officers who were experienced in these matters. And, speaking from his own experience, he thought it advisable that the proposed Amendment should be adopted by the Committee. He had no recollection of there having been any difficulty in carrying out the old arrangements, which left certain offences to be tried by the highest class of courts martial, and others to courts martial of the second class, while crimes of another degree were referred to regimental courts martial; on the contrary, as a matter of practice the rule had worked exceedingly well, and he could not see what advantage there would be in instituting a new system which, in his opinion, could hardly be an improvement on the old regulations, that had worked so well for many years. Therefore, he thought it would be a very good plan to schedule crimes in the manner proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Perthshire.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON was bound to say, after the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Hereford (Colonel Arbuthnot), that when he had gained the experience which he trusted he would some day possess, he would find that the facts alluded to by him (Sir Alexander Gordon) had been accurately stated. Whenever the hon. and gallant Gentleman looked over the books of many regiments, he would see that nothing was more common than that some offences had been disposed of by an officer instead of being referred to court martial, and others were tried by an inferior court which ought to have been referred to a superior court. By Act of Parliament, and by the Articles of War, disobedience to orders was a crime which no commanding officer could punish himself, yet this was frequently done. Again, it was a fact that when the quarterly returns of courts martial were sent in, objections were often taken to the courts martial which had been held upon certain offences; and in almost every case a note was returned to say that "this crime ought to have been tried by a superior court, where is the authority for this man's trial?" He therefore hoped the Secretary of State for War would see his way to provide a remedy for these irregularities.

COLONEL ALEXANDER felt so strongly on this subject that he hoped it would be pressed to a Division. With reference to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), he wished to state that it was by no means the case that all offences referred to superior courts martial were supposed to be visited with penal servitude. He (Colonel Alexander) was president last year of a general court martial, when two prisoners were tried for insubordination, and in one case the man was awarded five years' penal servitude; but, the circumstances of the other case not appearing of so grave a nature, the second man was only sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 31: Majority 26.—(Div. List, No. 132.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 48 (General and district courts martial).

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out the words "prescribed number of," in line 10, page 23, in order to insert the word "nine," instead thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out from line 13, page 23, the words—

"Such number to be, in the United Kingdom, not less than nine, and elsewhere not less than five,"

in order to insert instead thereof—

“Provided, if it be the opinion of the officer who convenes the court martial, such opinion to be expressed in the order for convening the court martial, and to be conclusive that such nine officers are not, having due regard to the public service, available, that such court martial shall consist of not less than five officers.”

MR. O'DONNELL thought it would be well to make the minimum number of officers on general courts martial seven instead of five.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that the number of officers stated in the clause was in accordance with the Articles of War and immemorial usage.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out from line 16, page 23, the words “prescribed number of,” in order to insert the word “seven,” instead thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out from line 17, page 23, the words—

“Such number to be, in the United Kingdom, not less than seven, and elsewhere not less than three,”

in order to insert—

“Provided, if it be the opinion of the officer who convenes the court martial, such opinion to be expressed in the order for convening the court martial, and to be conclusive that such seven officers are not, having due regard to the public service, available, that such court martial shall consist of not less than three officers.”

MR. O'DONNELL proposed to amend the proposed Amendment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, by inserting the word “five,” instead of “three,” as the minimum number of officers that should be accepted for district courts martial. It was felt that a regimental court martial should consist, if possible, of five officers; and, surely, there could be no difficulty in assembling five officers out of the regiments assembled in the district for the purpose of a regimental court martial. He could not accept a less number than five without taking a Division. If that number of officers could not be got together, it would be more to the dignity of the Service that the court martial should not be held at all.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would add the words, “Provided, that none of the three officers shall be under the rank of captain.” As the Bill stood now, two lieutenants and a captain might constitute a court martial; and he thought that the officers should be all captains, or, at any rate, that the lieutenants should have gained some experience by active service.

COLONEL STANLEY could not agree to this Proviso, although he was prepared to admit that it was desirable that officers forming a court martial should be men of experience. There was no limit for the status of these officers in the Article of War, which merely said that the court should consist of not less than three commissioned officers. With regard to the proposed Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), the point to be considered was that, on the one hand, by fixing the minimum number of officers at three, the court might not be so fully constituted as might be desirable; while, by drawing a hard-and-fast line, and making the minimum number five, the assembling of the court might be rendered impossible for a considerable time, which was the very thing they were endeavouring to avoid. The balance of advantage was, therefore, in his opinion, in favour of three commissioned officers. He trusted that the hon. Member would not go to a Division; but, if so, it would, perhaps, be well to divide at once.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out that in the United Kingdom, India, Malta, and Gibraltar, a district court martial must consist of seven officers, and that in Nova Scotia and Bermuda it must not consist of less than five. But by the present clause it was proposed that three officers might constitute a court martial in any part of the world. He looked upon this as too great an extension of the principle of reducing the number of officers on district courts martial.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER pointed out that the number of officers to be appointed would be governed by the words proposed to be inserted by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and that the convening officer would be obliged to express in writing that a greater number could not be obtained consistently with the public interest.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT confessed that he could not understand how the clause stood. The view taken composing the court martial, and then there would be an opportunity of giving prisoners justice, and of giving them a tribunal in which they and the public should have a right to have confidence. One of the arguments advanced against the proposal was this—that the members of the court martial would be likely to talk in the barrack-room of the result and progress of the case. He thought that was a very good argument in favour of non-commissioned officers and privates being admitted, because one of the most valuable things was publicity. If persons heard the evidence they would, probably, be better satisfied with the result than they would if they did not know what had taken place, and if they only heard an unfair and partial statement.

Colonel Stanley

COLONEL ALEXANDER, interposing, explained that he only said they would talk over the finding and sentence, not the evidence.

MR. BIGGAR said, even so, it was very desirable that they should inspire confidence. In all probability, the members of a court martial went into a private room to consult, and, in giving their decision, they did not give their reasons; but if they discussed the matter in the presence of non-commissioned officers and privates, the result would be that a certain amount of public opinion would be exercised over the officers, and, therefore, they would be likely to give decisions in which the public and the Army would have confidence.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the Amendment, undoubtedly, had, at first, a very fascinating effect on a certain class of men; but, on examination, it would be found to be the most impracticable and impractical Amendment that was ever proposed. In confirmation of what had been said, and coming at the same facts from different points of view, he might say that he had heard the opinions of hundreds of soldiers, both those still serving and those who had left the Service and were likely to be under no influence, and he never heard any soldier express the slightest doubt as to the justice and impartiality of the tribunals already existing in the Army. Perhaps the hon. Member might not be aware that as far back as the Crimean War, and before that, there was an informal tribunal in the Service—an extreme development of the principle advocated by the hon. Member for Hackney—a tribunal which was called the company court martial, and which dealt with certain offences committed by the soldier affecting his fellows, such as pilfering and theft. The officers did not interfere at all; but permission was given to the oldest soldiers in the company to assemble an informal tribunal, in order to administer justice to the criminal in any way they thought proper. Usually, the offender was laid on the table and punished with a flat rod; and the reason that tribunal was abolished was because it was found the severity of the sentences it inflicted was far greater than that of those inflicted by the more regular tribunals then existing. There was one point in relation to this Amendment which its Mover had overlooked, and that was that if he desired that a soldier should be tried by his peers, he should prevent non-commissioned officers, of all persons, from being on the court; whereas he proposed to put two non-commissioned officers and two privates. It was one of the most essential points in the Service, and the reason why such good feeling existed, that the non-commissioned officer in the English Service had not any primitive or disciplinary power whatever, as he had in the foreign Services. The non-commissioned officers were kept as an intermediate class, and their position was preserved because they were never allowed any voice whatever, except as regarded giving evidence, in connection with the punishment of a soldier. The non-commissioned officer was constantly brought, from the circumstances of his position, into contact with the private, and was often likely to bear a grudge against him, which could not be entertained by anybody in the position of an officer. Therefore, he was the last person to whom judicial powers should be granted. If, as an alternative, his hon. Friend had proposed a court consisting half of officers and half of privates, it would have been a far more impartial tribunal. However, he (Sir Henry Havelock) preferred the existing tribunals; and as no possible good could arise from the Amendment he was compelled to vote against it.

GENERAL SHUTE said, he knew the hon. Member for Hackney never wished to take up the time of the House unnecessarily, and he was sure if the hon.

difficult to say what were two-thirds of five, or even of seven. That matter could be dealt with when the clause was reached; but he was very much in favour of the Amendment proposed.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he agreed in principle with the Amendment; but what he should propose was to insert in the clause "that a court should be composed of not less than seven," and then, in the remainder of the clause, to leave it to the general officer to state the reason why he had not found sufficient officers available to make up that number, and in that case to allow him, in the exercise of his discretion, to make the court not less than three. He would, however, look into the matter, with a view of seeing whether the adoption of the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway would give rise to any practical difficulty; otherwise, he was disposed to assent to it. He could not help remarking that this Article of War had been framed from the experience of past years, and he thought there might be considerable difficulty in making the minimum number of officers more than three.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway would take away the possibility of having a court composed of three officers only, in case no more were obtainable. He thought that result would be undesirable. If five were taken as the minimum, he thought there should also be a provision that not less than three of those officers should be of the rank of captain.

MAJOR NOLAN considered that subalterns of five years' service were just as fit to form an opinion on any military subject as many captains. He did not say that an officer of less than five years' service was fit; but he was of opinion that officers of that seniority would make a very good court. The number of officers on these courts martial should be, at least, five. The object of having five was to get rid of the opposition of a man who was influenced by particular views. Where a court martial was composed of three only, the opinions of one man who held peculiar views, perhaps, on the gravity of the offence for which the soldier was being tried had an undue preponderance. When the court was increased to five, the influence of one man was not so great. He was not anxious to see any limit of rank imposed upon the officers forming these courts martial; for his experience was that junior officers, although necessarily inexperienced, were, as a general rule, on the side of mercy. If an Amendment was to be proposed, he should be inclined to say that the officers composing the court should be of not less than five years' service.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to point out that the difficulty as to obtaining two-thirds of a court composed of five and seven never practically arose; for this reason—a district court martial had never had the power of passing sentence of death; whereas a general court martial, which had the power of passing a sentence of death, was required to be composed of a greater number.

THE CHAIRMAN inquired whether the hon. and gallant Member for Galway wished to withdraw his Amendment?

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he did—that he was willing to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that he should take a Division.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER remarked, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War did not entertain any objection to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway; but, on the other hand, was disposed to agree with it, although he was not prepared to carry it out then. If so, it seemed to him that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would act wisely in not pressing his Amendment. He thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in charge of the Bill might very well plead for a little time for the consideration of the Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL had very great pleasure in postponing his objection till the Report.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would move, in sub-section 4, after the words "United Kingdom," to insert "East Indies, Malta, and Gibraltar," thus putting those places on the same footing as this country in respect of the composition of district courts martial. Also in the same sub-section, after the words "not less than seven," to leave out "and elsewhere not less than three," in order to insert—

"Provided, That in the opinion of the officer convening the court martial, such opinion to be expressed in a prescribed way, seven officers are not having regard to the exigencies of the public service available, then the court shall consist of three."

Amendments agreed to.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 23, line 19, after the word "officer," to insert "or person holding the relative rank or position of an officer." His object in moving this Amendment was to provide for the trial of those persons who were not officers, and who were also not soldiers; but who were, nevertheless, subject to military law. If hon. Members would turn to page 94, they would find that a certain class of persons were made subject to military law and liable to be tried by court martial.

"All persons not otherwise subject to military law who are followers of or accompany Her Majesty's troops, or any portion thereof, when employed on active service beyond the seas, subject to this qualification, that where any such persons are followers of or accompany any portion of Her Majesty's Forces consisting partly of Her Majesty's Indian Forces subject to Indian military law, and such persons are Natives of India within the meaning of Indian military law, they shall be subject to that law."

That clause would include a very large and varied class of persons who followed an Army in various capacities, and who were civilians. Sometimes persons were sent out by the Secretary of State for War as official interpreters and in various capacities. There were also newspaper correspondents with a large Army in the field. There was thus a large number of persons following the Army who held the position of gentlemen, and, therefore, the position of officers. By this clause, as it was framed, every one of these persons would be liable to be tried by district courts martial as a common soldier, and to be sentenced and to suffer the punishment of a common soldier in the field, including corporal punishment or imprisonment. He thought that to subject those civilians, who might be engaged in the public service with an Army in the field, to such penalties as this was inflicting upon them a very great hardship. If they were always under protection of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, there would be no great reason to complain. But any person with an Army in the field, who had authority to convene a district court martial, might order any of these gentlemen to be tried by a district court martial. It was right that the Committee should understand, and that these persons should know, what position they occupied when an Army took the field. He might state that the power of punishing these persons was not in the old Acts, but was a new power, and was totally unknown in any previous Act of Parliament. He thought the Committee should properly understand what it was doing before it passed this clause of the Bill in the shape in which it now was, for it might lead to most important and unpleasant questions.

COLONEL STANLEY confessed that he did not very clearly see what necessity had been shown for the Amendment, nor did he quite understand what the effect of it would be. At the same time, he quite agreed with the reasons that the hon. and gallant Member had brought forward in favour of the Amendment. The insertion of the words would, it seemed to him, cause considerable inconvenience, for he apprehended that it would be most difficult to know what persons occupied the relative rank or position of officers. He did not think that these persons would be tried by courts martial where a civil court could act. Persons who voluntarily chose to attach themselves to the Army would know the liability to which they subjected themselves, and could not expect to be dealt with in any other manner than other persons who were under military law. He was really at a loss to understand what was aimed at by this Amendment, unless it had in view the case of newspaper correspondents.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the Amendment was intended to protect the numerous class of persons who followed an Army in the field.

COLONEL STANLEY remarked, that if such persons did not form a part of the Force, they were not liable to come under the provisions of the Act. And if they formed part of the Force, he could not imagine anything more inconvenient than that persons who received advantages, such as being mounted, or having facilities granted to them, and yet should be able to turn round and say, "You have no control over us." He could not conceive anything more inconvenient than the adoption of such a course; particularly, as the Committee had already included camp followers amongst persons subject to military law.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, there was a distinction which the hon. and gallant Member desired to draw, and which he thought the Committee would also draw. He took it that the distinction which was intended to be drawn was one which did not, in any degree, militate against the maintenance of discipline, or of that discipline which was applied to the persons in a civilian capacity serving with an Army in the field. The distinction he wished to make was that, whereas, in the clause further on, all persons following the Army were taken without discrimination, the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished, in the case of newspaper correspondents, or artists, or photographers, that those persons should, without making any invidious distinction, be put on a different footing from camp followers and persons who attached themselves to the Army for the purpose of selling drink to the soldiers. The hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to make a distinction between those classes of persons in the manner in which military law should be applicable to them. For his part, he could not conceive any practical difficulty in drawing the distinction which it was desired to make. It was desired, in the case of superior persons following the train of an Army, to render them liable to be dealt with by military law as officers, and not to be subject to trial by a district court martial, which was an inferior court, intended only to try private soldiers. He thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would be able to see his way to accept the principle of the Amendment, for there could be no possible objection to making the distinction. In the case of a large Army in the field, if any person holding the relative position of an officer committed an offence which it was deemed necessary to try him for, there would be no difficulty in assembling a sufficient number of officers to constitute a general court martial. In every succeeding year a larger number of civilians of a superior class accompanied Armies in the field, and the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire did not desire that they should be placed indiscriminately in the same class as common camp followers, whom the Act allowed to be dealt with summarily.

Colonel Stanley

There was a necessity for drawing a broad distinction between the two classes of persons, and to subject each class, when necessary, to military law.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD) was totally ignorant of the way in which the distinction was to be drawn, or what were the different classes between which the hon. and gallant Member desired to draw the distinction. What was the relative rank or position of an officer? Did the photographer, or the photographer's man, hold such a place, or did they both hold it? So far as he could understand, the position of an officer in the Army was quite clear, and admitted of no doubt; but if they drew this very arbitrary and wholly artificial distinction as to the relative rank or position of an officer, he wished to know where they could draw the dividing line? It seemed to him that it would be wholly impossible in practice to say what class of persons held the relative rank or position of officers.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that, perhaps, the matter was very amusing to the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he could inform him that the class of persons who held the relative rank and position of officers was laid down by the Queen's Regulations. Some civilians ranked as majors, some as colonels; and there were civilians attached to Armies who received pay and allowance according to their relative rank. They were followers of the Army who would, under this clause, unless it was amended, be liable to be tried as private soldiers.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would carry out his object more effectually, if he were to move this Amendment on Clause 166. He was at a loss to understand what the hon. and gallant Gentleman intended, or how he proposed to define which civilians were in the relative position of officers and which were in the position of soldiers. It was open for the Amendment to be moved on the 166th clause. As he understood the matter, these persons did not form any part of an Army in the field, nor did they hold any commission; but their status was to be decided by some process which he was at a loss to understand. If he were in Order, he would refer to Sub-section 7, which said that every person not other-cases arising out of the Jamaica riots, spoke of the proceedings before courts martial being, in general, favourable to the accused. The late Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Judge Advocate General, in 1869, wrote to the Secretary of State for War—

"I cannot pass from the subject of courts martial without bearing my testimony to the fairness in which, in general, persons are tried by these courts, and to the honest manner in which, on the whole, justice is administered in them."

He hoped, therefore, after the opinions which had been expressed on this subject by the high authorities to whom he had referred, that the Committee would be very cautious before they ignored the Report of the Court Martial Commission.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that no one had a right to read the hon. Member for Hackney a lecture upon the propriety of suggesting Amendments upon this Bill which were based upon the principles which had been adopted by the largest and, considering recent events, the grandest Army in Europe. By raising this discussion the hon. Member had, at any rate, done good service. It had been said that this Amendment had been brought forward with the intention of impugning the fairness of hon. and gallant Members who had sat upon courts martial. He disowned that view of the Amendment; and he was sure that the hon. Member for Hackney, speaking on his own behalf, would also disown any desire to impute to the hon. and gallant Members, or to any of the officers of the Army who sat upon courts martial, any tendency to unfairness. That, however, was not the point under discussion. He, and those hon. Members who thought with him, were persuaded that every officer who sat upon a court martial was, according to his particular views and his particular lights, disposed and anxious to do his duty; but the question was, whether these tribunals did, and ought to, command by their constitution the confidence and respect of those who were tried by them? It had been urged that it was impossible, under this Amendment, to secure that a soldier should be tried by his peers; but the same thing might be said of our civil system, under which no man was ever tried by his peers. Would not it be better to give the great body of the soldiers who were tried by courts martial greater confidence in those tribunals by placing some of their own rank upon it? He doubted whether the hon. and gallant Members in that House knew very much about the private soldier, and the disabilities to which he was subjected. He wanted to know what was the view taken by the private soldier on this subject? He had found it very difficult to ascertain what it was. Of this, however, the Committee might be satisfied—that the great point on which the good feeling in the Army broke down was not as between the soldier and the commissioned officer, but as between the soldier and the non-commissioned officer. It would be said, triumphantly, that if such were the case, that was the best reason for not placing the non-commissioned officers upon these courts martial; but that was not so, because they would be met on these tribunals by the privates, who would bring with them from the ranks below the feeling of the regiment. The privates, moreover, would be able to throw much light on the causes of insubordination and of desertion, which were now almost altogether unknown to those of higher rank. But it was said that those who supported this Amendment had been led away by a false analogy between the civil tribunals presided over by a Judge versed in the law, and these military courts, over which there was no such president. The oldest officer, however, might well explain the military law to the other members of the court. It must further be remembered that until recent times justice was very fairly administered by officers who were themselves perfectly ignorant of the law, and who were only guided by their own feeling of what was right, and by common sense, in dealing with matters of fact. It would not be very difficult to find a large number of common soldiers who would be capable of deciding fairly upon matters of fact in like manner. He was satisfied that it would add to the feeling of solidarity in the Army if men of all ranks were placed upon courts martial. Then it was urged that the common soldier had not sufficient education to entitle him to a seat in these tribunals. He believed that in some parts of the country men sat upon common juries who were unable to write their names; and yet they had no hesitation in trusting to these possibly skilled but illiterate mechanics the trial of criminals. The magnificent Army of Germany had adopted the principle advocated by those who supported this Amendment.

MR. J. HOLMS said, that in replying to the observations that had been made upon his Amendment, he had no reason to be discontented with the remarks that had fallen from hon. and gallant Members, or from hon. and learned Members, with regard to it. He hoped to see such improvements effected in the Army as would attract a better class of men to it. He could well understand the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General stating that the Army was quite satisfied with the existing system of courts martial; but when he spoke of the Army, of course he meant the officers only. And, indeed, even if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had intended to refer to the Army generally, his statement that it was content with the existing system would afford no satisfaction to those who were anxious to raise the status of the private soldier. He could also understand the argument which had been put forward that many soldiers were at present unfitted to sit upon a court martial. He, however, desired to get rid of the existing system, and, by substituting for it a better one, to attract a superior class of men into the Army. He could also understand the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), when he said that his Amendment would not convert a court martial into a tribunal, such as that which consisted of a Judge and a common jury. He must, however, point out that the system of constituting courts martial he recommended had already been adopted with success in the German Army. Satisfied with having raised this discussion, and pointing out that he had given Notice of similar Amendments upon other clauses, he would not press the Amendment. He had received a number of letters from very eminent men in the Army, to the effect that it would be of great advantage to the Service if non-commissioned officers were not in future to be tried by regimental but by district courts martial.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could quite understand the ground on which this Amendment had been moved, and he was not, therefore, going to take up the time of the Committee in speaking upon it. He could not, on the part of the Government, accept any definite words, as far as the non-commissioned officers were concerned, because their case would be dealt with by the Committee which had been appointed by the House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER moved, in page 22, sub-section 2, line 23, after the word "officers," to insert the words—

"Such number to be, in the United Kingdom not less than five, and elsewhere not less than three."

The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, his object was to restore the complement at home of officers necessary for forming a regimental court martial to the number of five, now required by the Mutiny Act. At the same time, he was prepared to admit that under exceptional circumstances—such, for instance, as might arise in the Colonies from the difficulty of assembling even as many as five—a different arrangement might be permitted, and the number reduced to three. His Amendment would thus restore the exact provision as to numbers for a regimental court martial contained in the present Mutiny Act.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, inasmuch as the present Articles of War gave to the commanding officers power to do all that was asked by it; and that, as in several cases it would not be possible to call together the number of officers proposed by the Amendment, there might be a lapse of several months before necessary inquiries could be held.

MAJOR O'BRIEN opposed the Amendment, on the ground that justice would be delayed if it was necessary that so large a number of officers as was suggested should be called to serve upon a court martial. This difficulty would be much greater in a Cavalry than in an Infantry regiment, and would entail much more of expense. Therefore, he strongly supported the Amendment which had been moved.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT agreed with the opinions which had been expressed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee, mainly on the ground that the proposals contained in the Bill would injuriously affect the Cavalry branch of the Service.

Mr. Hopwood

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON supported the Amendment, on the ground that it would afford to soldiers a protection to which they were properly entitled.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he had a similar Amendment on the Paper—namely, in page 22, line 23, to leave out, “but such number shall in no case be less than three,” and insert—

“Such number to be, in the United Kingdom not less than five, and elsewhere not less than three.”

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, there was no reason why in India the number of a court martial should not be five.

COLONEL STANLEY could not accept the proposal in its entirety, because, if carried, it might produce delay; but, at the same time, he saw no objection to leaving out the words “United Kingdom;” and he, therefore, proposed to amend the Amendment in those terms.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. O'DONNELL moved, in line 35, after the word “days,” to insert “or flogging,” his object being that when flogging was to be inflicted it should be by the order of a higher court than a regimental court martial.

Amendment proposed,

In page 22, line 35, after the word “days,” to insert the words “or flogging.”—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY could not accept the Amendment. If the punishment of flogging remained, it would be necessary to leave its infliction in some cases to regimental courts martial.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 97: Majority 81.—(Div. List, No. 131.)

COLONEL DRUMMOND-MORAY said, if the latter part of the sub-section, the omission of which he intended to move, were allowed to remain in the clause, a great alteration would be thereby made in the law as it at present existed. Under the Articles of War some offences were considered to be of too grave a character to be tried by regimental courts martial, and were, therefore, dealt with either by general or district courts martial; but the effect of the clause as it then stood would be to render such offences triable by regimental court martial. The opinion held by one commanding officer as to whether a certain offence should be tried by general, district, or regimental court martial, might be entirely different from the opinion held by another commanding officer; and, therefore, it might occur that of two persons tried for the same offence, say at Aldershot, one might receive a heavy sentence from a district court-martial, while the other, being tried by regimental court martial, would only get half the punishment awarded in the other case. The clause gave greater power to the commanding officer than he now possessed, inasmuch as it would rest with him to decide whether a man should be liable to 42 days' imprisonment, or whether he should be liable to two years' imprisonment. For these reasons, he thought that the offences triable by courts martial should be scheduled in a way which would insure that grave offences should be tried by higher courts than regimental courts martial. He therefore moved in page 22, line 35, to leave out from the word “ignominy,” to the end of the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 22, line 35, to leave out from the word “ignominy,” to the end of the Clause.—(Colonel Drummond-Moray.)

Question proposed, “That the words, ‘but subject as aforesaid,’ stand part of the Clause.”

COLONEL STANLEY objected to the Amendment, on the ground that it would practically give no discretion to commanding officers in the matter of courts martial. It was well known to be the custom, under the old rule, to apply for the appointment of the highest class of courts martial by which a man could be tried; and the answer usually given was—“You must try by district court martial; we cannot give you a general court martial.” By allowing the clause to remain unaltered, he could not help thinking that the responsibility of deciding the proper class of courts martial to be convened would be left upon the shoulders of the right persons.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON entirely agreed with the views expressed by the hon. and gallant Members opposite who had just spoken. It was well known that commanding officers of regiments would, in many cases, try grave offences by regimental court martial, in order to have a blank court martial return; and the Commander-in-Chief, as well as the War Office authorities, were very apt, in consequence, to form an erroneous judgment as to the character of particular regiments. It was very necessary to insure that commanding officers should not shrink from bringing their men to court martial for grave crimes; but this would be rendered impossible if the clause remained in its present form.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT took a little exception to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), which implied an intention on the part of commanding officers to screen the men in their regiments from the punishment due to their offences. Such cases, in his opinion, were so rare and extraordinary that it would be quite unnecessary to provide for them. But there was much that was worthy of consideration in the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Perthshire (Colonel Drummond-Moray); because there could be no doubt that commanding officers differed very much in the views which they took as to the gravity of crimes—some regarding a crime as a grave one, which others would look upon as perfectly venial. For that reason, he agreed that it would be advisable to schedule the offences in the manner suggested by the hon. and gallant Member.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK could not admit that any sufficient reason had been urged for limiting the discretion of officers in the matter of courts martial.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER thought that some security other than that which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had introduced into the clause should be provided in the Bill. The Articles of War prescribed the offences which were triable by the various degrees of courts martial; but the present Bill contained no similar security. He supposed, after the passing of this Bill, very little would be heard of the Articles of War; and it was, therefore, very important that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant

Member for Perthshire (Colonel Drummond-Moray) should, in some form, be accepted.

COLONEL DRUMMOND-MORAY trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would state to the Committee whether he intended to schedule the offences?

COLONEL STANLEY, for the reasons already stated, was unable to agree to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT could not agree that the matter could be best dealt with by scheduling the crimes. He understood that one of the great difficulties was that originally under the Articles of War the matter was arranged, not according to the character of the crime, but according to the character of the tribunal which carried with it the punishment. The great objection to that, and the one which induced the Committee to assent to the plan proposed was, that it was said that when an offence was carried to a district or general court martial the court seemed to feel that they were compelled, from the mere fact of the crime being carried before them, to award a high punishment. That was one of the strong arguments by which the Committee were pressed. As far as he understood the clause, it proposed that offences of whatever character might be submitted to a regimental court martial; but that the regimental court martial should not give more than a certain amount of punishment. It was quite possible that the authorities might consider that the offence, owing to the circumstances which surrounded it, might be adequately dealt with by a moderate punishment, and would, therefore, not send it to a general or district court martial; where the punishment might be of a very much heavier kind; but he could not understand that any officer in command of a regiment would desire that crimes should meet with an inadequate punishment; if so, he would be extremely unworthy of the commission which he held. He (Sir William Harcourt) was surprised to hear officers of such experience as the hon. and gallant Members for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) and Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) say that commanding officers would deliberately refer crimes to certain tribunals because they knew that they would be inadequately dealt with. If that were so, all he could say was that, instead of amending the present clause, the officers in question ought to be removed from the Army, because they must be persons utterly unfit to discharge the duties which they were called upon to perform. But, taking a higher view of them, if they were fit for the positions in which they were placed, they must exercise some discretion as to whether a crime ought to be referred to one tribunal or another, and that was what the clause provided for.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME trusted that the Secretary of State for War would make some concession in this matter; for he fully concurred in the opinions which had been expressed by his hon. and gallant Friends upon the subject of scheduling the crimes to be referred to the various degrees of courts martial. Those opinions, he felt sure, would be shared by commanding officers who were experienced in these matters. And, speaking from his own experience, he thought it advisable that the proposed Amendment should be adopted by the Committee. He had no recollection of there having been any difficulty in carrying out the old arrangements, which left certain offences to be tried by the highest class of courts martial, and others to courts martial of the second class, while crimes of another degree were referred to regimental courts martial; on the contrary, as a matter of practice the rule had worked exceedingly well, and he could not see what advantage there would be in instituting a new system which, in his opinion, could hardly be an improvement on the old regulations, that had worked so well for many years. Therefore, he thought it would be a very good plan to schedule crimes in the manner proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Perthshire.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON was bound to say, after the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Hereford (Colonel Arbuthnot), that when he had gained the experience which he trusted he would some day possess, he would find that the facts alluded to by him (Sir Alexander Gordon) had been accurately stated. Whenever the hon. and gallant Gentleman looked over the books of many regiments, he would see that nothing was more common than that some offences had been disposed of by an officer instead of being referred to court martial, and others were tried by an inferior court which ought to have been referred to a superior court. By Act of Parliament, and by the Articles of War, disobedience to orders was a crime which no commanding officer could punish himself, yet this was frequently done. Again, it was a fact that when the quarterly returns of courts martial were sent in, objections were often taken to the courts martial which had been held upon certain offences; and in almost every case a note was returned to say that "this crime ought to have been tried by a superior court, where is the authority for this man's trial?" He therefore hoped the Secretary of State for War would see his way to provide a remedy for these irregularities.

COLONEL ALEXANDER felt so strongly on this subject that he hoped it would be pressed to a Division. With reference to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), he wished to state that it was by no means the case that all offences referred to superior courts martial were supposed to be visited with penal servitude. He (Colonel Alexander) was president last year of a general court martial, when two prisoners were tried for insubordination, and in one case the man was awarded five years' penal servitude; but, the circumstances of the other case not appearing of so grave a nature, the second man was only sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 31: Majority 26.—(Div. List, No. 132.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 48 (General and district courts martial).

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out the words "prescribed number of," in line 10, page 23, in order to insert the word "nine," instead thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out from line 13, page 23, the words—

"Such number to be, in the United Kingdom, not less than nine, and elsewhere not less than five,"

in order to insert instead thereof—

“Provided, if it be the opinion of the officer who convenes the court martial, such opinion to be expressed in the order for convening the court martial, and to be conclusive that such nine officers are not, having due regard to the public service, available, that such court martial shall consist of not less than five officers.”

MR. O'DONNELL thought it would be well to make the minimum number of officers on general courts martial seven instead of five.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that the number of officers stated in the clause was in accordance with the Articles of War and immemorial usage.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out from line 16, page 23, the words “prescribed number of,” in order to insert the word “seven,” instead thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY proposed to leave out from line 17, page 23, the words—

“Such number to be, in the United Kingdom, not less than seven, and elsewhere not less than three,”

in order to insert—

“Provided, if it be the opinion of the officer who convenes the court martial, such opinion to be expressed in the order for convening the court martial, and to be conclusive that such seven officers are not, having due regard to the public service, available, that such court martial shall consist of not less than three officers.”

MR. O'DONNELL proposed to amend the proposed Amendment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, by inserting the word “five,” instead of “three,” as the minimum number of officers that should be accepted for district courts martial. It was felt that a regimental court martial should consist, if possible, of five officers; and, surely, there could be no difficulty in assembling five officers out of the regiments assembled in the district for the purpose of a regimental court martial. He could not accept a less number than five without taking a Division. If that number of officers could not be got together, it would be more to the dignity of the Service that the court martial should not be held at all.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would add the words, “Provided, that none of the three officers shall be under the rank of captain.” As the Bill stood now, two lieutenants and a captain might constitute a court martial; and he thought that the officers should be all captains, or, at any rate, that the lieutenants should have gained some experience by active service.

COLONEL STANLEY could not agree to this Proviso, although he was prepared to admit that it was desirable that officers forming a court martial should be men of experience. There was no limit for the status of these officers in the Article of War, which merely said that the court should consist of not less than three commissioned officers. With regard to the proposed Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), the point to be considered was that, on the one hand, by fixing the minimum number of officers at three, the court might not be so fully constituted as might be desirable; while, by drawing a hard-and-fast line, and making the minimum number five, the assembling of the court might be rendered impossible for a considerable time, which was the very thing they were endeavouring to avoid. The balance of advantage was, therefore, in his opinion, in favour of three commissioned officers. He trusted that the hon. Member would not go to a Division; but, if so, it would, perhaps, be well to divide at once.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out that in the United Kingdom, India, Malta, and Gibraltar, a district court martial must consist of seven officers, and that in Nova Scotia and Bermuda it must not consist of less than five. But by the present clause it was proposed that three officers might constitute a court martial in any part of the world. He looked upon this as too great an extension of the principle of reducing the number of officers on district courts martial.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER pointed out that the number of officers to be appointed would be governed by the words proposed to be inserted by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and that the convening officer would be obliged to express in writing that a greater number could not be obtained consistently with the public interest.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT confessed that he could not understand how the clause stood. The view taken by one officer of the interests of the public service might be different to that held by another. A convening officer might think that the officers were better employed in attending to their duties than in sitting upon a court martial, and might have the opinion that this was a sufficient reason for saying that a greater number of officers than three was not available. He did not think that it could ever be the case that in the United Kingdom and India seven officers were not available for a district court-martial. The Articles of War prescribed that a district court martial should consist of seven officers in the United Kingdom, East Indies, Malta, and Gibraltar; but excepted some parts of the world—as Nova Scotia and Bermuda—where, in case of difficulty arising, the court might consist of five officers.

Colonel Stanley

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT thought this was a matter which might be dealt with by the Regulations, and that a special instruction might be issued to meet the peculiarities of each case.

MR. BIGGAR objected to leaving the matter to be dealt with by the authorities, when it could be settled by the House of Commons. It was all very well to allow the authorities to administer the laws; but it was the function of the House of Commons to make them. He hoped the Amendment would be pressed to a Division.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the only argument which had been used by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in favour of his Amendment was that a prisoner might be often inconvenienced by having his case unduly postponed. But this could not be properly applied to the present question; for he fancied that very few prisoners, indeed, would not be perfectly willing to have their trial postponed, rather than that their case should come before an imperfect tribunal.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the point was not an important one, and, as the hon. and gallant Member for Hereford (Colonel Arbuthnot) had suggested, could be dealt with by the Regulations. He had no objection to put in the words—

"If convened in the United Kingdom, East Indies, Gibraltar, or Malta, the court shall consist of not less than seven officers."

It would rest with the convening officer to say why that number was not available.

MAJOR NOLAN explained, that the great difficulty was to get rid of any individual who entertained wrong views, and persons of that character were almost always to be found on courts martial. If the number were reduced to three, the influence of such a person would be too great; but, with a minimum number of five, it would not make itself so much felt. His opinion was that the minimum number everywhere should be five; for if five officers were sufficient to constitute a general court martial, not only would a great deal of trouble be saved, but the district court martial would be much more used than the regimental court martial, which would get rid of the idea prevalent in the Army that a district court martial thought itself bound to award heavier punishments than a regimental court martial. Although he believed that the number of district courts martial consisting of three officers might be counted on the fingers of the hand, at the same time he saw no use whatever in keeping the number up to seven. He asked the Secretary of State for War to agree to one uniform number as the minimum for district courts martial; and therefore begged to move to insert, in line 17, page 23, after the words "to be," the words "not less than five," and leave out the remainder of the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to consider the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, as it seemed to him that it offered a very simple way out of the difficulty. Anyone, he should have thought, would be satisfied to have a court martial composed of five, and if a larger number were required they could be appointed; but he did see great force in the argument that where an offence was so serious that it had to be brought before a district court martial, then there ought to be not less than five officers to deal with so serious a matter. It seemed to him that what the hon. and gallant Member proposed was a very satisfactory solution of the case. There was a subsequent clause in the Bill which bore upon this question—namely, that which provided that a sentence of death should not be inflicted unless two-thirds of the officers composing the court martial concurred. It seemed to him that it would be rather difficult to say what were two-thirds of five, or even of seven. That matter could be dealt with when the clause was reached; but he was very much in favour of the Amendment proposed.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he agreed in principle with the Amendment; but what he should propose was to insert in the clause "that a court should be composed of not less than seven," and then, in the remainder of the clause, to leave it to the general officer to state the reason why he had not found sufficient officers available to make up that number, and in that case to allow him, in the exercise of his discretion, to make the court not less than three. He would, however, look into the matter, with a view of seeing whether the adoption of the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway would give rise to any practical difficulty; otherwise, he was disposed to assent to it. He could not help remarking that this Article of War had been framed from the experience of past years, and he thought there might be considerable difficulty in making the minimum number of officers more than three.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway would take away the possibility of having a court composed of three officers only, in case no more were obtainable. He thought that result would be undesirable. If five were taken as the minimum, he thought there should also be a provision that not less than three of those officers should be of the rank of captain.

MAJOR NOLAN considered that subalterns of five years' service were just as fit to form an opinion on any military subject as many captains. He did not say that an officer of less than five years' service was fit; but he was of opinion that officers of that seniority would make a very good court. The number of officers on these courts martial should be, at least, five. The object of having five was to get rid of the opposition of a man who was influenced by particular views. Where a court martial was composed of three only, the opinions of one man who held peculiar views, perhaps, on the gravity of the offence for which the soldier was being tried had an undue preponderance. When the court was increased to five, the influence of one man was not so great. He was not anxious to see any limit of rank imposed upon the officers forming these courts martial; for his experience was that junior officers, although necessarily inexperienced, were, as a general rule, on the side of mercy. If an Amendment was to be proposed, he should be inclined to say that the officers composing the court should be of not less than five years' service.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to point out that the difficulty as to obtaining two-thirds of a court composed of five and seven never practically arose; for this reason—a district court martial had never had the power of passing sentence of death; whereas a general court martial, which had the power of passing a sentence of death, was required to be composed of a greater number.

THE CHAIRMAN inquired whether the hon. and gallant Member for Galway wished to withdraw his Amendment?

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he did—that he was willing to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that he should take a Division.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER remarked, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War did not entertain any objection to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway; but, on the other hand, was disposed to agree with it, although he was not prepared to carry it out then. If so, it seemed to him that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would act wisely in not pressing his Amendment. He thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in charge of the Bill might very well plead for a little time for the consideration of the Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL had very great pleasure in postponing his objection till the Report.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would move, in sub-section 4, after the words "United Kingdom," to insert "East Indies, Malta, and Gibraltar," thus putting those places on the same footing as this country in respect of the composition of district courts martial. Also in the same sub-section, after the words "not less than seven," to leave out "and elsewhere not less than three," in order to insert—

"Provided, That in the opinion of the officer convening the court martial, such opinion to be expressed in a prescribed way, seven officers are not having regard to the exigencies of the public service available, then the court shall consist of three."

Sir William Harcourt

Amendments agreed to.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 23, line 19, after the word "officer," to insert "or person holding the relative rank or position of an officer." His object in moving this Amendment was to provide for the trial of those persons who were not officers, and who were also not soldiers; but who were, nevertheless, subject to military law. If hon. Members would turn to page 94, they would find that a certain class of persons were made subject to military law and liable to be tried by court martial.

"All persons not otherwise subject to military law who are followers of or accompany Her Majesty's troops, or any portion thereof, when employed on active service beyond the seas, subject to this qualification, that where any such persons are followers of or accompany any portion of Her Majesty's Forces consisting partly of Her Majesty's Indian Forces subject to Indian military law, and such persons are Natives of India within the meaning of Indian military law, they shall be subject to that law."

That clause would include a very large and varied class of persons who followed an Army in various capacities, and who were civilians. Sometimes persons were sent out by the Secretary of State for War as official interpreters and in various capacities. There were also newspaper correspondents with a large Army in the field. There was thus a large number of persons following the Army who held the position of gentlemen, and, therefore, the position of officers. By this clause, as it was framed, every one of these persons would be liable to be tried by district courts martial as a common soldier, and to be sentenced and to suffer the punishment of a common soldier in the field, including corporal punishment or imprisonment. He thought that to subject those civilians, who might be engaged in the public service with an Army in the field, to such penalties as this was inflicting upon them a very great hardship. If they were always under protection of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, there would be no great reason to complain. But any person with an Army in the field, who had authority to convene a district court martial, might order any of these gentlemen to be tried by a district court martial. It was right that the Committee should understand, and that these persons should know, what position they occupied when an Army took the field. He might state that the power of punishing these persons was not in the old Acts, but was a new power, and was totally unknown in any previous Act of Parliament. He thought the Committee should properly understand what it was doing before it passed this clause of the Bill in the shape in which it now was, for it might lead to most important and unpleasant questions.

COLONEL STANLEY confessed that he did not very clearly see what necessity had been shown for the Amendment, nor did he quite understand what the effect of it would be. At the same time, he quite agreed with the reasons that the hon. and gallant Member had brought forward in favour of the Amendment. The insertion of the words would, it seemed to him, cause considerable inconvenience, for he apprehended that it would be most difficult to know what persons occupied the relative rank or position of officers. He did not think that these persons would be tried by courts martial where a civil court could act. Persons who voluntarily chose to attach themselves to the Army would know the liability to which they subjected themselves, and could not expect to be dealt with in any other manner than other persons who were under military law. He was really at a loss to understand what was aimed at by this Amendment, unless it had in view the case of newspaper correspondents.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the Amendment was intended to protect the numerous class of persons who followed an Army in the field.

COLONEL STANLEY remarked, that if such persons did not form a part of the Force, they were not liable to come under the provisions of the Act. And if they formed part of the Force, he could not imagine anything more inconvenient than that persons who received advantages, such as being mounted, or having facilities granted to them, and yet should be able to turn round and say, "You have no control over us." He could not conceive anything more inconvenient than the adoption of such a course; particularly, as the Committee had already included camp followers amongst persons subject to military law.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, there was a distinction which the hon. and gallant Member desired to draw, and which he thought the Committee would also draw. He took it that the distinction which was intended to be drawn was one which did not, in any degree, militate against the maintenance of discipline, or of that discipline which was applied to the persons in a civilian capacity serving with an Army in the field. The distinction he wished to make was that, whereas, in the clause further on, all persons following the Army were taken without discrimination, the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished, in the case of newspaper correspondents, or artists, or photographers, that those persons should, without making any invidious distinction, be put on a different footing from camp followers and persons who attached themselves to the Army for the purpose of selling drink to the soldiers. The hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to make a distinction between those classes of persons in the manner in which military law should be applicable to them. For his part, he could not conceive any practical difficulty in drawing the distinction which it was desired to make. It was desired, in the case of superior persons following the train of an Army, to render them liable to be dealt with by military law as officers, and not to be subject to trial by a district court martial, which was an inferior court, intended only to try private soldiers. He thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would be able to see his way to accept the principle of the Amendment, for there could be no possible objection to making the distinction. In the case of a large Army in the field, if any person holding the relative position of an officer committed an offence which it was deemed necessary to try him for, there would be no difficulty in assembling a sufficient number of officers to constitute a general court martial. In every succeeding year a larger number of civilians of a superior class accompanied Armies in the field, and the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire did not desire that they should be placed indiscriminately in the same class as common camp followers, whom the Act allowed to be dealt with summarily.

Colonel Stanley

There was a necessity for drawing a broad distinction between the two classes of persons, and to subject each class, when necessary, to military law.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD) was totally ignorant of the way in which the distinction was to be drawn, or what were the different classes between which the hon. and gallant Member desired to draw the distinction. What was the relative rank or position of an officer? Did the photographer, or the photographer's man, hold such a place, or did they both hold it? So far as he could understand, the position of an officer in the Army was quite clear, and admitted of no doubt; but if they drew this very arbitrary and wholly artificial distinction as to the relative rank or position of an officer, he wished to know where they could draw the dividing line? It seemed to him that it would be wholly impossible in practice to say what class of persons held the relative rank or position of officers.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that, perhaps, the matter was very amusing to the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he could inform him that the class of persons who held the relative rank and position of officers was laid down by the Queen's Regulations. Some civilians ranked as majors, some as colonels; and there were civilians attached to Armies who received pay and allowance according to their relative rank. They were followers of the Army who would, under this clause, unless it was amended, be liable to be tried as private soldiers.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would carry out his object more effectually, if he were to move this Amendment on Clause 166. He was at a loss to understand what the hon. and gallant Gentleman intended, or how he proposed to define which civilians were in the relative position of officers and which were in the position of soldiers. It was open for the Amendment to be moved on the 166th clause. As he understood the matter, these persons did not form any part of an Army in the field, nor did they hold any commission; but their status was to be decided by some process which he was at a loss to understand. If he were in Order, he would refer to Sub-section 7, which said that every person not otherwise subject to military law accompanying an Army in any official capacity was subjected to certain provisions. It would be legitimate for the hon. and gallant Gentleman to add to that sub-section words to meet the case of the persons he had in view. But to insert his Amendment there, would lead to great inconvenience and confusion.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that if his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had done them the honour of listening to their argument, he would not have made the observations he had done. His hon. and gallant Friend wished to put in some definition to take a certain class from the cognizance of the district court martial; and he had mentioned several instances of persons who would be brought under the operation of the clause. It had been further pointed out, by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire, that this was an entirely new provision, and that up to that time any discipline, with regard to civilians accompanying an Army, had been left entirely in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in the field. The House was now undertaking to legislate in this matter, and it was desirable to see exactly what it was doing. They provided that a district court martial should not try an officer; and, therefore, it should be provided that it ought not to try a civilian of the rank of an officer. His hon. and gallant Friend might be hampered with difficulty in giving a precise definition of the class whom he intended; but, because there was a difficulty in meeting their case, it by no means followed that these persons should be treated unjustly. Clause 166 defined officers who were exempted from the provisions of this clause by its express words. Officers were defined to mean—

“Every person not otherwise subject to military law who under the orders of a Secretary of State or of the Governor General of India accompanies in any official capacity any of Her Majesty's troops on active service in any place beyond the seas, subject to this qualification, that where such person is a native of India within the meaning of Indian military law, he shall be subject to that law as an officer.”

But the definition of persons “not otherwise subject to military law” as soldiers included newspaper correspondents; and if the clause were left as it stood, any artist or newspaper correspondent accompanying an Army would be subject to military law, and liable to be tried by a district court martial. If this were the effect of the clause, he should be in favour of doing away with it altogether; but if the Government insisted on retaining it, he contended that they ought to go further, and make the distinction that was sought to be drawn.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK remarked, that the operation of this clause could be readily seen. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself chose to accompany an Army in the field he would be accompanied, probably, by a servant, and that servant would be, by the Act, subject to military law, and liable to be tried by a district court martial. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself would also be in the same position. Would he like to be tried in the same manner as his servant? This was precisely the distinction which his hon. and gallant Friend was desirous of drawing. It would be quite sufficient to mention, as an instance of the distinction to be drawn, persons who were authorized by the Secretary of State to accompany an Army in the field. The only object in raising this question was to apply to a certain clause, to civilians who accompanied an Army in the field, the provisions to which they were entitled. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would introduce into the sub-sections of Clause 48, or into sub-section 7 of Clause 166, words carrying out these distinctions, they would be quite content. If an assurance to that effect was not given, he should go to a division with his hon. and gallant Friend in favour of his Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD) was wholly unable to understand what was intended to be settled by this Amendment, when it was said that not only an officer, but a person holding the relative rank or position of an officer should not be tried before a district court martial. What was the relation of the one person to the other? What were their relative positions? The matter depended upon something entirely outside of any distinctions which existed in the Bill; but, whether any such distinctions could be drawn or not, the time for dealing with these matters would obviously arise when they were on the clause defining officers. The words in question were intended to settle something; but, in reality, they settled nothing, but left the section a very difficult one to understand. For these reasons, he trusted that the Committee would not consent to the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman should not raise any difficulty to the very reasonable suggestions that had been offered. If he remembered a case which happened a short time ago, the distinction that was sought to be drawn would be apparent to him. He referred to the case of a correspondent of The Standard newspaper. Much controversy occurred between the general in command of a Force in Afghanistan and this correspondent, as to the way in which the correspondent should send news. The general thought that the correspondent should send only such news as was favourable to his own character as a military commander; but the correspondent thought he should describe things pretty much as they really were. In future, immediately such a controversy arose a general of this kind could at once order a correspondent to be put on his trial before a district court martial. The Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman would render a general much more careful in putting a correspondent of a first-class newspaper upon his trial for any offence. It was not possible to lay down in words the precise definition aimed at; but he thought the Amendment proposed very clearly defined the general idea, and would be found to work well in practice.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that if hon. Members would turn to Clause 166 they would see that there was a definition of persons subject to military law as officers. The clause was as follows:—

“The persons in this section mentioned are persons subject to military law as officers, and this Act shall apply accordingly to all persons so specified; that is to say.”

Then the sub-section went on to define the various classes of officers, and sub-section 7 was to this effect—

“Every person not otherwise subject to military law who under the orders of a Secretary of State or the Governor General of India, accompanies in any official capacity any of Her Majesty's troops on active service in any place beyond the seas, subject to this qualification, that where such person is a native of India within the meaning of Indian military law, he shall be subject to that law as an officer.”

Thus it would be seen that all persons

The Solicitor General

accompanying an Army in the field in an official capacity, under the orders of a Secretary of State or the Governor General of India, possessed all the benefits, and were subject to all the liabilities of officers. What he wanted to know was, whether they could not go further than that, and treat as officers everyone who had no official recognized position? He did not see how persons having no official recognized position could be treated as officers. How was a correspondent, or any other man, to be considered to have official capacity, unless he were recognized by a Secretary of State, or by the Governor General of India? If a man went in an officially recognized position he would be treated as an officer; but, if not, he did not see how he could be put in the position of an officer. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) would find that the case of special correspondents of newspapers was provided for, and that they were triable in India exactly as they would be under this clause in England. By the existing Mutiny Act newspaper correspondents were triable in all respects, as camp followers were in India. They were liable to the Mutiny Act, as everyone else following the Army was. There was no exceptional position accorded to them. Clause 166 seemed to him to draw the only distinction they could draw—namely, between persons having an officially recognized position and those who had not. Without they had that recognized position the clause applied to them; but when they did not come under Clause 166, they could be treated only as persons not otherwise subject to military law who followed, or accompanied, the troops, and were, to that extent, in the position of private soldiers.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, his hon. and gallant Friend had correctly pointed out that correspondents with the Army in India were under official protection. Hon. Members were now desirous of knowing how this could be extended to places outside India. There were many civilians serving with the Army in Afghanistan who had not so provided themselves. There was Mr. Archibald Forbes, and others not equally well known, who would be affected by this clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Let him get an order,

COLONEL STANLEY contended that under the sub-section 7, both classes of persons were provided for. He did not think it was too much to claim that a person in the status of an officer, allowed to feed and lodge in camp, should be subject to this arrangement.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, in the Mutiny Act the words used had always been an "officer and soldier;" but all through this Bill these words had been altered, and the words used were "persons subject to military law." That was a very different thing, and included the class of persons whom he mentioned. This Bill altered the whole condition of things. He only wished the Committee to be aware of the condition of things, so that it might know what it was doing. This, perhaps, was a matter which could be discussed when they came to the Interpretation Clause; but, in the meantime, he would suggest that "soldier" be used here, instead of "persons subject to military law."

THE CHAIRMAN asked, did the hon. and gallant Member propose to withdraw his Amendment?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I shall withdraw the Amendment, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman accepts my suggestion.

MR. HOPWOOD said, it was provided that the district court martial should not try an officer. Well, ought it to try, say, a Mr. Kinglake, gathering the ideas for the history of the future? Did the right hon. and gallant Gentleman mean to say that he wished to have Mr. Kinglake tried by a district court martial? The answer might be that he had rank enough to get an order from the Secretary of State; but this answer did not meet the difficulty. The term "correspondent" was used because it was a convenient word. Men of rank might attend the Army from some laudable motives; and, therefore, he thought the case for the Amendment had been made out.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT hoped his hon. and learned Friend would give the Committee assistance how to distinguish between a person of rank and, say, a sutler in the Army. The question was, how to draw the line? The difficulty was, when they came to matters of opinion, whether a man belonged to one class or to another? The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire said that the Mutiny Bill only applied to officers and soldiers. He was in error there. Already, the Indian Forces had been pointed out as an exception. In India, especially, the 1st clause applied to every camp follower. [SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I quite admit that.] That was so in point of principle. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that if the Bill was examined, it would be found that really very few of the clauses could refer to anyone but an officer or soldier. If they looked at the 4th and 5th clauses, they would see how very few clauses there were which could apply to anyone who was a civilian. When they came to the few clauses which referred to civilians, why should they not apply to them as well as to soldiers? Why should not a civilian be tried by a district court martial as well as a soldier, if the civilian picked a pocket or committed some other theft? He asked the hon. and learned Member for Stockport to run through the clauses and see what clauses there were to which civilians were subject. He would find very few indeed. If it was said that certain civilians were too great swells to be tried by district courts; if men like Mr. Kinglake, to whom his hon. and learned Friend referred, were not to be subject to the clause, then let them pass an Act of Parliament exempting Mr. Kinglake. The Government had tried that in Clause 166. If that was not enough—if the definition was not sufficient—let there be another; but, up to the present time, nobody had made a practical suggestion as to what was to take the place of the definition already given by the Government.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, it was a marvel of marvels to him that his hon. and learned Friend had not apprehended the distinction hon. Members were desirous of drawing. He could only attribute it to the fact that the hon. and learned Gentleman was not present when the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire was addressing the Committee. They were told to draw a distinction. But the distinction was ready for them in the words which the hon. and gallant Member had introduced in sub-section 4, Clause 48. All that he desired was this—that in the case of certain persons of a superior social condition, who were permitted to accompany troops in the field, they should make a distinction which did not affect the degree of the crime committed. There was no difficulty whatever about that—"all persons holding the relative rank or position of an officer." If the acute legal minds which had been dealing with this matter had not by this time apprehended the simple and elementary distinction which was sought to be made, he must despair of the further progress of this Bill.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he quite agreed that upon the proposer of an Amendment rested the responsibility of inventing the necessary description of what was desired. Clause 166 stated that "one who accompanies in an official capacity any of Her Majesty's troops on active service." What objection could there be to inserting those words here, after the word "officer?" What objection was there to saying that a district court martial should not try an officer, or one who accompanied in an official capacity Her Majesty's troops on active service? He could not see what objection there was to the insertion of this Amendment in the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was no objection, but that it was done already. It would simply include those who were included in Clause 166.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had already stated that he was willing to postpone this matter until they came to Clause 166. He should withdraw the Amendment as it stood, and move, instead, to omit the words "persons subject to military law," and insert the word "soldier."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved to omit the word "officer," and insert the words "persons subject to military law as an officer."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no objection to that.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the correspondents of such a paper as The Times, and also of The Daily News, had been considered in the light of an officer, and treated as officers. It would be a nice position to take up to say that they were not to be treated as officers. That would be putting a very nice point to a court martial; and it was not fair to throw upon that court the duty of interpreting the point. He thought Ministers ought to state what would be the course if a military correspondent was brought before a court martial under this clause. He thought there was a prima facie case that a correspondent was in the position of an officer. He was treated as an officer. He had that social position in the camp.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no doubt, in his own mind, that Clause 166, sub-section 7, would govern the case. He appealed to the Committee now to go on. He thought the point could be cleared up on Clause 166. He did not believe that it wanted clearing; but Clause 166 was open to those who thought that it did. The Amendment required consideration, and he hoped it would be withdrawn.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK pointed out that the words proposed to be introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) should, in his opinion, follow the word "officer," and not the word "try."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT explained that the Amendment included all officers. He was not of opinion that sub-section 7 of Clause 166 covered the case of newspaper correspondents; because he could not conceive that a newspaper correspondent would ever be a person who accompanied the Army in any official capacity under the orders of the Secretary of State.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER understood that the Amendment would exclude officers.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the word "officer" was already in the clause.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought the distinction would be clearer if the words "nor persons subject to military law as officers" were inserted after the word "officer." If the Committee inserted the Amendment, as suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, and said—"A district court martial shall not try any persons subject to military law as an officer," the distinction would not be clear. He, therefore, suggested that the hon. and learned Gentleman should insert his Amendment after the word "officer," so that it should be clear that a district court martial should not try an officer, and that it should be equally clear that it should not try a person as an officer.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT replied, that there would be a redundancy of expression in the form proposed by the hon. Member for Mayo.

Sir Henry Havelock

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the effect of the Amendment would be to raise a nice point of military law for future courts martial to interpret.

COLONEL STANLEY had no doubt that Clause 166, sub-section 7, provided for the case of newspaper correspondents; but he would accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member to make the matter more clear.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the consequence of the Committee having adopted the last Amendment was to render it absolutely necessary to alter the wording of the Amendment which he proposed to introduce three lines further down. He, therefore, moved to omit the words "person subject to military law, and triable by court martial," in order to insert the word "soldier."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT objected to the Amendment. The Committee had already said that persons subject to military law as officers should not be tried by district court martial, and they were now asked to say that persons subject to military law, not as officers, should be tried by district court martial.

Amendment negatived.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 23, line 25, to leave out the word "captain," and insert the words—

"Field officer, unless it be impossible to obtain the requisite number of field officers, in which case not more than one captain shall be a member of the court; and in no case shall a junior officer of the regiment to which the field officer under trial belongs be a member of the court."

The object of that Amendment was to make this Act agree with the existing rules of the Service. By the existing regulations of the Service, no captain could sit upon a court martial for the trial of a field officer unless it was impossible to get a sufficient number of field officers, and to that very proper custom he (Sir Alexander Gordon) wished to adhere. By the alteration made in this Bill, however, a field officer could be tried by a court martial composed entirely of captains. In his opinion, it was most undesirable that a large number of junior officers should assemble to try a field officer; because it had always been the custom that officers should be tried by their peers. He could not understand why the word "captain" had been introduced into this Bill, instead of "field officer."

MR. BRISTOWE pointed out, that if these words were introduced in the order in which they stood, the sub-section would be unintelligible.

MAJOR NOLAN replied, that the construction was perfectly simple; the Amendment made it imperative on the general to have no officers on a court martial for the trial of a field officer below the rank of field officer if they could possibly be obtained. Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire would agree to two captains instead of one, and propose, in the last part of his Amendment, that—

"In no case shall a junior officer of the regiment to which the field officer under trial belongs be a member of a court."

It was a very improper thing to put junior officers upon these courts martial, and was, besides, most unfair to the other members of the court.

COLONEL STANLEY could not accept the Amendment. The 106th Article of War excepted only officers under the rank of lieutenant from being members of courts martial for the trial of field officers.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON wished to alter the wording of his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out, that it would not be competent to amend the proposed Amendment, unless the Committee had decided to omit the word "captain."

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 49 (Field general courts martial).

MR. O'CONNOR POWER wished to propose the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins). He, therefore, begged to move that the words "outside the United Kingdom" be substituted for the words "beyond the seas;" and he thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War might, perhaps, see his way to the adoption of that Amendment, inasmuch as the expression "outside the United Kingdom" was less open to doubt and misunderstanding than the expression "beyond the seas."

COLONEL STANLEY had no objection to the proposed Amendment; but if the hon. Member would look to the bottom of page 106, he would find the expression "beyond the seas" was there defined to mean out of the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK proposed, after line 29, page 24, to introduce a precautionary clause which must have been omitted through an oversight—namely, to restrict the powers of general field courts martial by a provision which existed in the old Act. He proposed to insert, in page 24, line 29, after the word "award"—

"Provided always, That no sentence of any court martial shall be executed until the General commanding the Army of which such detachment or portion forms part shall have approved and confirmed the same."

It never could have been intended by those who framed this Bill that this precautionary clause should be omitted. The Bill had been too much cooked, and erred in excessive drafting. The latter part of the sub-section said—

"A field general court martial may, notwithstanding the restrictions enacted by this Act in respect of the trial by court martial of civil offences within the meaning of this Act, try any person subject to military law who is under the command of the convening officer and is charged with any such offence as is mentioned in this section, and may award for such offence any sentence which a general court martial is competent to award."

He would apply this to the case of the civil disturbance or commotion which occurred in Jamaica some years ago. It would have been competent for the officer convening a general field court martial under this clause, and which might be restricted to three members, not only to sentence persons who, for the time being, came under military law to imprisonment, but it would have been competent to the convening officer, not necessarily the highest authority in the district, to pass a sentence affecting the life of an individual. If his reading of the clause were correct, it was obvious to anybody that his Proviso was a necessary safeguard, which, without restricting the operation of military law in certain places, otherwise not subject thereto, would maintain a security for the life of the subject; for when an individual had been sentenced to death, it would be necessary that his sentence before execution should be referred to the general officer, or others in supreme command of the Army, of which the court that tried him formed only a small part.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the substance of the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland was already in the Bill. He presumed that the words "no sentence of any court martial shall be executed," &c., meant that it could not be executed until it was confirmed. The hon. and gallant Gentleman would see that this was already provided for in sub-section d of Clause 54, which said—

"In the case of a field general court martial, an officer authorized to confirm the findings and sentences of general courts martial for the trial of offences in the force of which the detachment or portion of troops under the command of the convening officer forms part."

He had no objection to the insertion of the Proviso; but suggested that its object was covered by the sub-sections to which he had referred.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK was of opinion that the sub-section alluded to did not cover the point raised.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that detachment general courts martial were first instituted after the battle of Vittoria, in the year 1813, when the Duke of Wellington found himself obliged to make use of them, for the purpose of repressing plundering and outrages upon women in Spain. It was because it was impossible to drag to the head-quarters of the General these women who had been outraged, that evidence had to be taken on the spot where the court martial was held; but before sentence was carried into execution, it was referred to the General commanding that portion of the Army of which the court martial formed a part.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that in the case of serious offences it was right to have some such provision as that suggested by the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland. He understood that the clause provided for cases for the trial of which a civil magistrate was not available, and which would, therefore, be tried by court martial. Understanding that this clause was for the protection of the inhabitants of the country, and supposing that some petty offences were committed against them, was it intended in such case that no punishment could be inflicted upon the offenders without reference to the General commanding the Army? If so, the proceeding would be cumbrous in the extreme.

COLONEL ALEXANDER explained that the offenders could be tried without reference to the General, but could not be executed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, however necessary punishment in small cases might be, it would be rendered almost impossible to inflict it under these circumstances.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that this particular disqualification applied only to the extraordinary tribunal of field general court martial.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, even if the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland were adopted, it would be no guarantee that such scenes as occurred in Jamaica would not be repeated. One great object of the Amendment was that the officer who approved the decision of the court martial should act under a sense of responsibility. The object in view now was to place responsibility on the General commanding the Army, who, as in the case of the commanding officer, so to speak, in Jamaica, might be able to escape from responsibility for want of the provision which the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland wished to supply. He would like to know what objection there could be to the proposed Amendment, the object of which was to fix responsibility upon the most responsible person?

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that so far as he was able to understand the clause, an officer or a soldier who committed an offence might be tried under its operation by a tribunal which was somewhat in the nature of a drum-head court martial, even when the troops were not on active service. That, he thought, was a sort of tribunal which ought not to be set up in a part of Her Majesty's Dominions, which, perhaps, might be in a most quiet and peaceable state.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the object of the clause was to protect the civil population of a country through which troops happened to be passing in those cases in which, from want of time, or for some other reason, it was found impossible to appeal to the Civil Law. A field general court martial was an extraordinary tribunal, to which it would not be necessary often to have recourse, but which it was extremely desirable there should be the power of convening in certain circumstances.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was quite aware that that was the object of the clause; but, in his opinion, it was so worded as to give it a scope which was unnecessarily wide; and, therefore, he would venture to suggest the insertion at the end of the clause, providing that effect should not be given to it unless the troops were engaged on active service, or that the offence was committed at a place which was too distant from the ordinary tribunals of the country to admit of the offender being brought before them.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member would not be in Order in moving his proposed Amendment now, inasmuch as the Question before the Committee was, that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 50 (Courts martial in general.)

COLONEL STANLEY moved to insert, in page 24, line 38, at the end of the clause, as a separate paragraph, the following words:—

"The commanding officer of a corps to which a prisoner belongs, or the officer who investigated the charges on which a prisoner is arraigned, shall not, save in the case of a field general court martial, sit on the court martial for the trial of such prisoner, nor shall he act as judge advocate at such court martial."

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had an Amendment to propose to the Amendment, which was, to leave out the words "save in the case of a field general court martial." It was contrary, he said, to all the principles of English military law, as it had existed almost up to the present time, that an officer who convened a court martial, and who had investigated the charges on which a prisoner was arraigned, should be a member of it. In 1854, however, a change was made by which an officer who convened a court martial might sit as a member of it. The law which previously existed was, however, in his opinion, much more just in principle; and he, therefore, begged to move the omission from the Amendment of the words "save in the case of a field general court martial."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 51 (Challenges by prisoner.)

MR. O'CONNOR POWER moved to insert, in page 24, line 40, after the word "object," the words—

"In a general court martial to any three officers, including the president, without reason given; in the case of a district court martial to any two officers, including the president, without reason given; and in the case of a regimental court martial to one officer, who may be the president; and afterwards."

The hon. Gentleman said, a portion of the Amendment had, he believed, been already disposed of, by a decision at which the Committee had arrived in allowing a right of absolute challenge to a prisoner in the case of general courts martial. That decision would not, however, so far as he understood the matter, preclude the Committee from adopting the whole of the Amendment which he now proposed. It might be said that the giving a prisoner a right of absolutely challenging, without reason given, so many members of a tribunal which was composed of so limited a number of persons, might be productive of serious inconvenience; but he should not, if the Committee should be of that opinion, adhere literally to the terms of his Amendment, and he had moved it merely with the view of affording the Committee an opportunity of expressing their views on the matter. The Amendment was, he thought, well worthy of their attention. It should be borne in mind that in the case of a common soldier who was brought before a court martial he was not tried by his peers, and that, in that respect, he laboured under a disadvantage, to which he would not be exposed if he were being tried for a criminal offence before a civil tribunal. In the case of a court martial he was tried by officers, and not by his peers; and that was a point in regard to which it was, he thought, too late to seek to alter the decision to which the Committee had come. It was, however, in his opinion, highly desirable, in order to inspire confidence in courts martial, that a prisoner should have the right of challenging absolutely one, or two, or three of the members of any particular court martial. The proportion might, he thought, very well be three in the case of a general court martial, which would consist of a maximum number of nine and a minimum of five members. If three were considered too many to empower a prisoner to challenge, the number might be reduced. Then, in the case of a district court martial, which would be composed of a maximum of seven and a minimum of three members, the right of challenge might, if the Committee deemed it necessary, be confined to one member of the court. He felt it to be his duty to press the matter on the attention of the Committee, because it was but just and fair, in his opinion, that some concession should be made to the legitimate claims of the soldier, and that he should not be left so completely at the mercy of those courts, as he would be if the Amendment were not agreed to. It must be quite intelligible to the Committee that a soldier might know very well that an officer was prejudiced against him, although he might not be able to make out such a case against him to his brother officers as would enable them to say whether an objection to his sitting as a member of the court had been properly raised or not. The clause provided that every objection made by a prisoner to any officer should be submitted to the other officers appointed to form the court; and it would all depend upon a prisoner being able to substantiate his objection whether it would be accepted by the court or not. Under those circumstances, the position, he contended, in which the common soldier was placed was one of great disadvantage and of possible hardship; and he hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would seriously give his mind to the subject.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) could not help thinking that the Amendment which had just been moved was a very unreasonable one to seek to introduce into the clause, and the hon. Gentleman who proposed it had, he thought, somewhat overstrained the analogy which he drew between the mode of proceeding in our Civil Courts and that which he wished to establish. The clause, as it stood, provided that objection might be made by a prisoner who was about to be tried by a court martial, for any reasonable cause, to the President or any other member of it; but the hon. Gentleman now proposed to give the soldier a peremptory right of challenge, entirely apart from the necessity of alleging any reasonable ground for his objection. That, in his opinion, was a power which it would be very unadvisable to give. It would tend unduly to limit the operation of courts martial. The language of the clause was intelligible enough; but if the wide signification desired by the hon. Member for Mayo were given to it, and if the analogy of the proceedings in Civil Courts were to be acted upon, it would be necessary to go into the question of what was a legal and technical objection, and much unnecessary inconvenience and delay would be the result. He hoped, therefore, the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

Sir Alexander Gordon

MR. BIGGAR did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman had at all succeeded in making out a case against the adoption of the Amendment. It was most important, in the case of a trial for any offence, that all parties should be satisfied that justice would be done; but no such confidence would exist if a prisoner who was brought before a court martial did not possess the right of challenge to a member of the court whom he had reason to believe was not in a position to pronounce an impartial judgment upon his case. It was very well known that in many instances a soldier was perfectly well aware that an officer had some spite against him, and it would be most unfair that such an officer should be placed in the position of one of his judges. Matters were very different in the ordinary Criminal Courts where there were Judges, and the Law Officers of the Crown, who were, of course, much more likely to arrive at an impartial decision than it could be expected the brother could be of a man to whose sitting on a court martial a soldier might very properly object. Besides, a prisoner might not be able to adduce such evidence as would be sufficient to convince the other members of a court martial that a particular officer was prejudiced against him.

COLONEL ALEXANDER pointed out, that the proposal embodied in the Amendment was one which it would be very difficult to carry into effect. It would, in his opinion, so operate as to cause very serious expense and delay; for it would often happen that when a number of officers had assembled for the purpose of holding a court martial, they would find that they would be unable to proceed with the business before them. Again, one court martial might be ordered to try several prisoners, and one prisoner might challenge two members of the court, and the next prisoner might object to two others, and a third to two more, so that the court would not be able to hold its sittings.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he must admit there was a certain degree of force in some of the objections which had been urged against the Amendment. All that he desired to impress on the Committee was that enforcing a regulation which would deprive a prisoner of the right of challenge without the necessity of giving a reason, they would be placing him in a very unfair position. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General seemed to think he had no right to refer to the analogy of the Courts of Law in support of his argument; but why, he should like to know, should it not be competent to him to do so? Courts of Law were Courts of Justice; and it must surely be the object of the Government to establish impartial tribunals under the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to the words "any reasonable cause;" but those words in the clause did not refer to what might be a reasonable cause in the opinion of a prisoner, but in that of the brother officers of the very officers to whom he might have taken objection. It rarely happened that objections of the kind were sustained by those brother officers; and, under the circumstances, some such Amendment as that which he proposed was, he maintained, required. If it were deemed to be too great a power to give a prisoner that he should have the right of challenging three officers on a general court martial, he should be willing to substitute the word "two" for "three," and to limit the right of challenge in the case of district courts martial to one. From the way, he might add, in which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General seemed disposed to deal with the case, he saw no course open to him but to take the opinion of the Committee on the question. It would be too bad, he thought, that such a clause as that under discussion should be agreed to, and that no protest should be recorded against the system of putting a common soldier on his trial without giving him any right of challenge whatsoever. He was quite prepared, however, to withdraw the Amendment as it now stood, and to move it in an altered form.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER then moved, in page 24, line 40, after "object," to insert—

"In a general court martial to any two officers, including the president, without reason given; in the case of a district court martial to any one officer, including the president, without reason given; and afterwards."

Amendment proposed,

In page 24, line 40, after the word "object," to insert the words "in a general court martial to any two officers, including the president, without reason given; in the case of a district court martial to any one officer, including the president, without reason given." —(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 15; Noes 170: Majority 155.—(Div. List, No. 133.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 52 (Administration of oaths).

MAJOR NOLAN moved, in page 25, line 42, to leave out "1879," and insert "now in force."

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN moved, in page 25, line 42, before "without partiality," to insert "and the custom of war in the like cases," which had reference, he said, to the form of the oath which was to be administered to members of courts martial. He did not attach so much importance to this Amendment as to that to which the Committee had just given their assent; and he would content himself with merely offering it for the consideration of the Secretary of State for War and the Committee.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK pointed out that in the Committee which sat three years ago upstairs a division was taken as to whether the words now proposed in the clause should be retained in the oath, and that they decided, by a large majority, that it was not desirable to make any alteration in it.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he hoped some better reason against the adoption of the Amendment would be given than that which the Committee had just heard. He attached very little weight to the recommendations of the Committee to which the Judge Advocate General referred, and, in moving his Amendment, he was supporting that which was an old and well-established form.

GENERAL SHUTE quite concurred in the view of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and saw no objection to the old form of oath.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he, too, much preferred the old form.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the objection to the oath, as it was formerly framed, was that it was considered to be somewhat vague.

MAJOR NOLAN could not help thinking that it was not a wise or a proper course to adopt to overrule altogether the custom of war. There had of late been constant discussions in that House as to whether our soldiers always behaved with humanity in the Zulu War, and it was not well, in his opinion, to break away from old traditions. It was a great mistake, by giving up the old form of oath, to set aside all the common law of the Army, and to rely entirely upon Statute law. If the words which he proposed were not inserted in the clause, there were a great many men who would think that they were within the four corners of the Bill, and who would act upon that view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME wished to know why the form of oath which was to be administered by the Judge Advocate General or his deputy to the witnesses before a court martial, was not set forth in the Bill? He begged, in page 26, line 14, to leave out the words "the prescribed form," and to insert, instead of them, "the form prescribed in the first Schedule of this Act."

COLONEL STANLEY said, the words "prescribed form" in the clause had reference to rules and regulations which were to be made, and which would be laid before Parliament as soon as was practicable. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman would read Clause 69, he would find that power was taken in it to frame rules of procedure in connection with several points relating to trials by courts martial which it was impossible to include in a Bill.

Mr. O'Connor Power

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME said, that after the explanation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, he had no wish to press the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished, before the Amendment was withdrawn, to ask for some further information with respect to the clause. It provided that—

"Every witness before a court martial shall be examined on oath, which the president or other prescribed person shall administer in the prescribed form."

But suppose a witness happened not to be a Christian, but a member, for instance, of the Jewish or Mahomedan persuasions, to whom it was not usual to administer an oath, how was his evidence to be taken; was he to be examined in accordance with the form prescribed by his religion?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that if the hon. Gentleman would look at the Articles of War, he would find that there were certain forms of oath to be taken by Jews and Christians. The point raised was one which would come within the scope of the Rules which would be laid on the Table.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 53 (Procedure).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he wished to move to insert, after sub-section 8, the following sub-sections:—

"9. Trials by court martial shall be held between the hours of eight in the morning and four in the afternoon, except in India, where trials may be held between the hours of six in the morning and four in the afternoon. Provided, That if the court considers it necessary they may continue any trial beyond the hour of four in the afternoon, recording in the proceedings the reasons for their so doing. Provided also, That in cases requiring an immediate example, or when the general or other officer commanding any body of troops shall certify under his hand that the same is expedient for the public service, trials may be held at any hour; but in no case shall any court martial sit for a longer period than eight hours in any one day.

10. When a court martial shall recommend a prisoner to mercy, such recommendation shall be attached to and form part of the proceedings of the court, and shall be promulgated and communicated to the prisoner, together with the finding and sentence.

11. In no case shall any officer sit as president or member of a court martial who has been employed to investigate the matter out of which the charge before the court arose."

The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, as the Bill stood, no mention was made in it of the recommendation to mercy; and if it were to form no part of the proceedings of the court, a prisoner might know nothing about it. It would be a hardship, he thought, that when the court was disposed to take a lenient view of a man's case, the fact should not be publicly known. He was also of opinion that it was highly desirable to limit, as he proposed, the duration of the sittings of courts martial.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not think that he wished to offer any frivolous objection to his Amendment, when he said that the points with which it dealt, being like so many other matters of procedure, he did not think it would be well to provide for them in the Bill itself. It would be much better, in his opinion, to deal with them by regulation. As to the hours during which a court martial should sit, the Amendment, if carried, might produce consequences which would sometimes be found very inconvenient. He himself recollected a case in which the restriction of the hours of sitting might have caused a good deal of inconvenience, for there was a great deal of work to be got through, and the whole of the officers who composed the court had come from different parts of the country, and some had to attend other courts martial the next day. Analogous cases very often occurred; and therefore he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not, at all events, press that part of his Amendment. As to the recommendation to mercy, that stood upon rather different ground. He might point out that to recommend a prisoner to mercy was by no means a function of the court, whose duty was to decide upon the guilt or innocence of a prisoner; and it was a sound principle, he thought, that the recommendation to mercy should not be connected with the finding or sentence of a court martial, for it, properly speaking, belonged to the exercise of the Royal Prerogative. It was no part of the duty of the court, so far as he could see, to promulgate and communicate to a prisoner the fact that he had been recommended to mercy; nor would it be wise, in his view of the matter, to provide that a recommendation should be so promulgated, which it might not, in some cases, be possible to carry into effect.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would advise the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire not to press the first part of the Amendment. The second part, which related to the recommendation to mercy, stood, however, upon a totally different footing. It was only about 18 years ago that the rule was introduced that such a recommendation should not form part of the proceedings of the court, but that it should be forwarded in a separate letter to the Secretary of State for War. The law, therefore, was formerly that which the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to make it now; and the effect of not making the recommendation part of the proceedings was that courts martial were unable to bring any moral pressure to bear on commanding officers. The question was whether they ought to be enabled to do so, and, in his opinion, they ought. The members of the court had the advantage of having been in contact with the prisoner; of having had the means of forming an opinion of his character; of having seen and heard the witnesses in the case, and had the opportunity of making themselves acquainted with all the circumstances bearing on the prisoner's guilt. Their recommendation, therefore, ought to have great weight; but it would not have nearly so much weight if it were not made part of the proceedings. He might also observe that he was afraid the mere trouble of writing letters often prevented the recommendation of a prisoner to mercy; and, for these reasons, he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would go to a division on that part of his Amendment.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he thought it was of great importance that the recommendation to mercy should form part of the proceedings of the court, and should be glad to see that part of the Amendment carried.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) pointed out that the recommendation to mercy by a jury formed no part of the proceedings of a Criminal Court. The jury were bound to return a verdict in accordance with the evidence brought before them, and there their functions ceased. It was quite true, of course, that recommendations to mercy were made by juries, but they never appeared on the record.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he quite concurred in the opinion that a recommendation to mercy by a court martial should appear publicly on the record of its proceedings. Martial law was necessarily stringent and severe; but in cases in which the court thought that mercy ought to be extended to a prisoner, although the law required that sentence of death should be passed on him, the recommendation to mercy ought, he thought, to be made as public as the sentence.

MR. COLE said, the hon. and learned Solicitor General was, no doubt, quite right in saying that the recommendations made by juries formed no part of the proceedings of our Criminal Courts; but, as the Committee were aware, the Judge who presided always took care to inform them that their recommendation would be forwarded to the proper quarter. It, accordingly, was always so forwarded, and was frequently acted upon. It constituted, therefore, in reality, a most important part of the proceedings of a court. He should most cordially support the latter portion of the Amendment.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) was quite right in stating that formerly the recommendation to mercy used always to appear as part of the proceedings of a court martial. It was only in 1868 that the alteration of which the hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke was made.

GENERAL SHUTE said, that as matters at present stood, there was a great want of uniformity in the practice in respect to recommendations to mercy. In some cases they were attached to the proceedings, and in some they were not; and he thought it desirable, therefore, that the latter part of the Amendment should be adopted by the Committee.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the consensus of the military Members of the House seemed to be in favour of the change proposed in the latter part of the Amendment, and he hoped it would be agreed to by the Committee. The argument of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, drawn from what occurred in the Criminal Courts, was, he thought, based on a false analogy. In the case of those courts, it would be inconvenient that the recommendations of juries should form part of the proceedings, and there was no necessity that they should, for the Judge could, in most instances, deal with the matter then and there. He would, of course, forward, in the case of a capital offence, such a recommendation to the Secretary of State; and his right hon. Friend (Mr. Assheton Cross) would, he was sure, consider it to be a dereliction of duty if he did not pay every attention to it. No Judge would for a moment, he might add, think of keeping from the knowledge of the Secretary of State the fact that a recommendation to mercy had been made by a jury. But courts martial were entirely different tribunals from the ordinary Criminal Courts; and as no inconvenience could result from the adoption of the Amendment, he thought the latter part of it, at all events, ought to be agreed to in common fairness to the soldier.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the clause had reference not only to the punishment of death, but to other punishments; and that in a number of cases the Judges reported to the Secretary of State that, in their opinion, the sentences should be dealt with leniently. Those recommendations, however, were not published; and his hon. and learned Friend was perfectly right in saying that the recommendations to mercy made by juries formed no part of the proceedings of the Criminal Courts.

MR. COLE said, he did not dispute the correctness of that statement, but the real question was, how the practice worked?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON hoped the Secretary of State for War would agree to the first part of the Amendment, because it was word for word the existing Act. He had put it down because he had found that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had omitted it from his Bill, and he thought it was a question which it was most important to decide there, and not leave to regulations. If they bore in mind that a private soldier had to stand eight hours over his trial, he thought they ought to make it certain by legislation that no trial by court martial should be held for more than eight hours in a day.

COLONEL STANLEY thought that whether it was put into the Bill or left to the regulations was not of much importance, though there were reasons why he should prefer not to have it in the Bill. The question, however, of recommendation to mercy was not likely to be altered by Act of Parliament. There was this to be said—that a court martial, under the present Bill, was not tied to any particular offence; and, therefore, they were not bound, as they used to be under the old Act, to give a certain punishment for a certain offence. As there appeared to be a general feeling on the part of the Committee in favour of so much of the Amendment as related to the recommendation to mercy, he should assent to it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it was his experience that courts martial were extremely slow moving bodies.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON offering to withdraw the sub-sections referred to of the Amendment,

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out, that the whole of the Amendment was at present before the Committee, and it would be necessary for the hon. and gallant General to move to amend it by striking out the first part.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved to leave out sub-sections 9 and 11 from the proposed Amendment.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he only wanted to point out, before they parted with the Amendment, that it was urged by the hon. and gallant Gentleman that one reason for his Amendment was that a prisoner had to stand the whole of his trial by a court martial. Now, as a civilian, it did strike him that they might offer the man a seat. Even the greatest criminals in Civil Courts were not treated so. They were not expected to stand until human endurance could stand no longer. He wanted to suggest that, if it were necessary, there should be inserted, even in the regulations, a provision to the effect that the president of a court martial should be directed to allow a prisoner to sit down.

COLONEL STANLEY was sure that no officer need be directed to do anything of the sort.

Amendment of said proposed Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 54 (Confirmation, revision, and approval of sentences).

COLONEL STANLEY said, it would save the time of the Committee if he stated that he proposed, in the absence of the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), to accept the latter part of his Amendment, which was as follows:—

“In no case shall the authority recommend the increase of a sentence, nor shall the court martial on revisal of the sentence, either in obedience to the recommendation of an authority or for any other reason, have the power to increase the sentence awarded.”

MAJOR O'BEIRNE wished to add the words—

“Nor shall it be lawful for the convening authority to order members of the same court to sit again for other trials of other prisoners, unless it shall be their turn upon the duty roster, or the exigencies of the Service shall demand it.”

The reason he had for proposing the Amendment was because it was quite possible for a commanding officer to order a court martial to sit for six months, on the ground that they did not know their duty properly. When he examined His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief before the Committee, His Royal Highness said he was not aware that there was any such practice. But he (Major O'Beirne) knew that it was so. He was on a court martial in India, when the officer commanding the regiment ordered himself, the president, and four other members of a court martial—that was five altogether—to sit for six months, and that was in the hot weather. The reason for doing so was that they had not passed sufficiently severe sentences. He considered that such a step was a very improper interference with the oath which members of a court martial took. If his Amendment were accepted, a commanding officer could not possibly order a court martial to sit for six months, unless the exigencies of the Service absolutely required it.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought it would be better to omit from the original Amendment the words “either in obedience to the authority or for any other reason;” because, if they stipulated that the authority should not increase the sentence, it would be rather an anomaly to put in these words.

COLONEL STANLEY agreed with the hon. and gallant Baronet. He did not think it was necessary that the words should be kept in; but, at the same time, he was rather in a difficulty. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Renfrewshire put the words in thinking that, perhaps, there might be moral pressure exercised upon the court martial, a supposition in which he did not agree. But having accepted the words, and the hon. and gallant Member being away, he thought that, even if they were surplusage, he should be better discharging his duty by not withdrawing them.

Amendment (Colonel Stanley) agreed to.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE then moved the addition of the words which he had suggested previously.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he must confess that he should be rather unwilling to have it taken as a legal point what was the position of an officer on the duty roster. As a matter of fact, he always thought that court martial duties were detailed by the duty roster. He knew that it had been the case that some junior officers, who were supposed not to know their duties, had been taken out of their turn, and put on courts martial; but that was some time ago, and such officers were now attached to courts martial as supernumeraries. He did not think that such cases as that mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) existed now, or that they had been so general in the Army that it was necessary to take cognizance of them.

COLONEL ALEXANDER thought that a commanding officer would commit a gross violation of the Queen's Regulations by such a course as the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim had described. It was distinctly required by the regulations that the duty was to be detailed by the roster, from the senior officer downwards. He had never known such an instance as was mentioned; but he recollected what took place at the Committee on the Mutiny Act last year: and he was perfectly astonished when he saw the question which had been put to the Duke of Cambridge, as he had never heard of such a case occurring.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, that it was done in India. It was constantly done, because it was very difficult to make an appeal to authorities in case of any irregularity; besides which, officers at a distant station might find it a very unpleasant thing to prefer a complaint against their commanding officer. He had spoken to several officers on this subject, and they had confirmed his statement.

GENERAL SHUTE said, he had had six years' experience in India, and he had never come across such a case. He agreed that it would be an extreme irregularity. Where officers were found very ignorant of their duties, it was usual for a commanding officer to desire them to attend all courts martial which assembled in the regiment, or in some cases the district, till they proved, on examination, that they had become better acquainted with military law, and thus that they were entitled to be on the roster for court martial duty.

MR. BIGGAR hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would carry his Amendment to a division, because it seemed to him that the system was so improper that it was only carried into operation in districts where there was not a good opportunity for protesting against the despotic arrangements of the officer in command, and that was the very reason why specific instructions should be laid down that each officer should only perform his fair turn of duty.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN suggested that the Amendment would not meet the case, because courts martial were always convened for the trial of a soldier or a sergeant, or such other persons as might be brought before them.

Amendment negatived.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 28, line 28, to leave out from "or," to "Presidency," in line 29, both inclusive. The object of that was that the punishment of death should be approved by the Governor General of India, and not by the Governors of the minor Presidencies. Now that communication was so rapid between the head-quarters of a regiment and the Government of India, he thought there could be no objection in submitting the sentence to the Viceroy for approval. It would be a protection to the prisoners, and, in some cases, a very valuable protection.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not insist upon his Amendment. He confessed that he spoke with some little doubt as to the legal effect of the objection which he would make, but he had taken the Act exactly as it stood. The case arose very seldom, and he thought it better to leave the law where it stood.

Amendment negatived.

SIR HENRY JAMES (for Mr. E. JENKINS) moved an Amendment to leave out the words that provided for the confirmation of a sentence by a higher authority only in the case of an officer. The offences dealt with in the sub-section were generally treated by military law, subject to reference to a higher authority. The Committee would see that in the case of an officer confirmation was required, and not in the case of a private soldier. He moved, in page 28, sub-section 9, to leave out the words "being an officer," in order that there should be no distinction between the officers and privates.

COLONEL STANLEY did not think there was any objection to leave out the words.

Words omitted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 55 (Amendment of charge).

MR. J. BROWN (for Mr. A. H. BROWN) moved, in page 28, after line 41, to insert—

"(1.) 'The court shall not make any amendment under which the accused, if found guilty of the amended charge, would be subject to a higher penalty than he would be if found guilty of the original charge.'"

The provision contained in the clause, if acted upon, would lead to much abuse. The officer convening a court had every facility for making the charge accurate and true, and the charges, to be properly framed, should be supported by evidence before they came on. If he referred to the authorities on the subject, he could not find any provision whatever for allowing an amended charge. These authorities showed that an alteration in a charge was something entirely different from the practice which had hitherto existed. He contended that the very fact that a prisoner was not found guilty of what he was charged with was a good reason for his acquittal; and he thought that no court martial should proceed to a trial unless they had satisfied themselves of their competency to deal with the charge. For those reasons, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wenlock was worthy of the consideration of the Secretary of State for War. He thought that some such words as those of the Amendment were absolutely necessary; otherwise, a prisoner might be found guilty on a different charge from that with which he was originally charged. In Clause 56 they would find that a soldier charged with embezzlement might be found guilty of stealing or fraudulent misappropriation of property. Surely one of those offences must be greater than the other. It also was provided that a soldier charged with desertion might be found guilty of an attempt to desert, or of being absent without leave. In their own words, they evidently allowed a prisoner to be charged with one offence and found guilty of another; and, as one must be greater than another, he contended that, unless the Amendment was adopted, a charge might be amended and a man found guilty of a greater offence than that with which he was originally charged. His chief argument was this—that in the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill such a thing was allowed to be done. It was presided over by a learned Judge. But the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill would have to be administered by, he would not say ignorant officers, but certainly officers ignorant of law; and to put any such power as that in the hands of the president of a court martial would be imposing upon him a duty very disagreeable to exercise, and one he should not like to have to exercise himself. He observed that it was provided in the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill—Clause 488—that an amended form of charge would be allowed; but they had also provided for an appeal against the amended charge. In the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill there was no such appeal. By the Criminal Code a prisoner would be protected in every possible way; whereas by the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill he was left in the hands of officers ignorant of law.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) hoped the hon. Member would see that it was not quite proper to put in the words of the proposed Amendment. Even if they were added, he thought the prisoner might, on conviction, be liable to greater punishment. The clause was, of course, intended to give power to the tribunal to put the charge in proper form. He trusted the Amendment would not be pressed.

SIR HENRY JAMES thought that the Secretary of State for War should further consider the great power conferred by the clause, with a view to its being restricted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, the matter should receive further consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) proposed to add the words “or render him liable on conviction to greater punishment.”

Amendment agreed to.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON had an Amendment on the Paper to omit this clause altogether; and he believed he could show that it was, as far as the prisoner was concerned, a very unjust one. The marginal note set opposite this clause would lead anyone to imagine that the clause itself was confirmed by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100; but if hon. Members would refer they would find that by no means to be the case. The Act of Parliament referred to allowed alterations to be made in the charges preferred in Civil Courts, when there was a slight difference between the name of any county, division, city, or borough, or in the name of any place mentioned or described in the indictment, or any alteration in the name, or error in the name or description of the person or persons, or if the Christian or surname of the person or persons was wrongly described they might be altered, or if there was an error in the name or description of any matter or thing. The Act was restricted entirely to the trivial errors mentioned, and it rested with the Judge to alter the charge; but there was no provision whatever for allowing any alteration with regard to the matter of the charge. On the contrary, it was carefully excluded from the Act cited; but the Committee were here asked to agree that the charge itself should be altered when the evidence was insufficient, and the charge was inaccurately described. Nothing could be more unjust than to put a man on his trial for an offence, and when he had made all his arrangements and had got together his witnesses to prove his innocence, turn round and change the charges brought against him. Again, when it was considered that the persons who were to make this change were not lawyers, and had no knowledge of the Law of Evidence, it would appear a still more unjust step to take with regard to the prisoner. He hoped the Committee would reject the clause altogether.

COLONEL ALEXANDER supported the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), on the ground that the clause was a premium on the incapacity and incompetence of the commanding officer. The clause said that—“When the court martial are of opinion that there is any defect in the charge, or that there is a variance between the charge and the evidence offered in proof thereof, and that such defect or variance is not material to the merits of the case, they may amend the charge.”

Why should there be any variance between the evidence and the charge preferred? It was the duty of the officer to see that the charge was not at variance with the evidence. When the commanding officer had investigated all the facts of the case, he sent the result of his investigation, with the depositions of witnesses, to the general officer, by whom they were reviewed, and then sent back to the court martial. If, after all this, the charge should be altered on the ground that it was at variance with the evidence, it would be the grossest injustice to the prisoner. Further, the court martial not consisting of trained lawyers it was totally incompetent to make this change; and he, therefore, hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would go to a Division on the Amendment.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the alteration of charges would lead to great difficulty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) thought that there was some misapprehension as to the intention of the clause. It would be extremely improper that there should be any alteration in the charge; and he suggested that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War should allow the clause to be amended, if by the introduction of such Amendment its meaning could be rendered clearer.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that the clause provided that the alteration might take place at any time before the finding of the court, so that after every witness had been called, and after the accused had given his defence to a charge, of which the court might find him perfectly innocent, the court might say he was guilty of another offence; while the power of the accused was simply that he might re-call and cross-examine any witnesses, as if such witnesses were then called for the first time to give evidence on the trial, and call any other witnesses. He thought the intention of the draftsman was to give the court power to frame a different charge. The hon. and learned Solicitor General would, he thought, agree that under the clause in its present form a man accused of embezzlement might be found guilty of felony on a distinct and separate charge. It was impossible for the Committee to bear the responsibility of passing the clause in its present form, which gave a power far greater than existed in any Civil Court. A court martial was the last body to whom it was desirable to give such great power, inasmuch as it consisted of untrained Judges. He suggested that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should allow the clause to be struck out, with a view to remedy any technical defects which it contained.

COLONEL STANLEY admitted that the criticisms of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) were of great force, and suggested that the clause should be negatived pro forma, so that it might be altered in accordance with the views of the Committee.

Clause omitted.

Clause 56 (Conviction of less offence permissible on charge of the greater).

MR. HOPWOOD, thinking that some considerable discussion of this clause would be necessary, and in view of the lateness of the hour, begged to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Mr. Hopwood.)

SIR HENRY JAMES thought the clause might be proceeded with.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the clauses relating to the execution of the sentence did not involve any matter on which serious discussion could arise.

S.

MR. HOPWOOD, not wishing to go against the feeling of the Committee, asked leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 29, line 16, to leave out the words "attempting to desert, or of." He pointed out to the Committee that the attempt to desert was made a crime only two years ago by the House of Commons, without a single word having been said on the subject. What occurred was as follows:—The Mutiny Bill was down for second reading, and the late Secretary of State for War was asked by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) whether the Bill was going to be read a second time? The Secretary of State for War replied in the affirmative, and the hon. Member for Newcastle objected. The Secretary of State for War said that the only changes in the Bill were those of detail, and the House accepted that statement; but it turned out afterwards that the words "attempting to desert" had been inserted. The crime was, therefore, entirely new, and one which it was most difficult to prove, inasmuch as it was impossible to tell whether a man intended to desert or not, a fact which could only be ascertained when the man had deserted. The First Lord of the Admiralty would bear him out in saying that in the Navy the crime of "attempting to desert" was unknown. The sailor must be convicted of desertion or of absence without leave, but could not be tried for attempting to desert. How was it possible to prove the intention to desert? If a man were apprehended before desertion was completed he could not be tried for desertion, but only for absenting himself without leave. Attempting to desert was not a crime for which a man ought to suffer death, to which on active service he would be liable. The House of Commons never intended this; and he, therefore, hoped the Committee would agree to the Motion which he now begged to move, that the words "attempting to desert or of" be struck out of the clause.

COLONEL STANLEY thought it would be very unwise to leave out the words "attempting to desert." The hon. and gallant Member had asked whether it was possible to prove that a man intended to desert before he had carried out his intention? One of many cases in point which occurred to him (Colonel Stanley) was that of a man who might go into barracks and get together all his clothes and then transfer them to a private house. The intention to desert would be clearly shown in such a case.

Amendment negatived.

MR. HOPWOOD was at a loss to understand the meaning of the last paragraph of the clause, which seemed to him to resolve itself under the discussion which had already taken place upon Clause 55. It ran thus—

"A prisoner charged before a court martial with any other offence under this Act may, on failure of proof of an offence being committed under circumstances involving a higher degree of punishment, be found guilty of the same offence as being committed under circumstances involving a less degree of punishment."

He did not find any objection to that, but was quite unable to understand the meaning of what followed—

"And also may, on failure of proof of the full offence, be found guilty of another offence of the same class not involving a greater degree of punishment."

He presumed the class of offence was to be measured by the punishment put against it in this Act; but the clause spoke of "another offence," and was altogether so vague, that he moved to leave out the words from the beginning of line 20 to the end of the clause.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the intention of the section was to give the accused the benefit of any extenuating circumstances which might reduce the gravity of his offence. For instance, disobedience in the military sense of the word implied positive refusal to obey a given order; but it was quite possible that there might be extenuating circumstances tending to show that a man charged with this offence had only neglected to obey the order. In that case, he apprehended that the man would deserve punishment for an offence of the same class as that charged against him in the first instance.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that was, no doubt, the case; but, assuming that there was a failure of proof of the full offence, the accused might be found guilty by the terms of the clause of "another offence" which was exactly what the Committee had just decided should not take place. He understood the general terms, but not their legal bearing, and therefore trusted that the Solicitor General would give some further explanation of the legal meaning of the words of "another offence of the same class."

Colonel Stanley

COLONEL STANLEY thought that, after the discussion which had taken place, it would be much safer to strike out the last three lines of the clause. He thought there might be many reasons for finding a prisoner guilty of the same offence committed under circumstances involving a less degree of punishment; but it might, perhaps, lead to a loose interpretation, and, therefore, he proposed to strike out, after "punishment," the words—

"And also may, on failure of proof of the full offence, be found guilty of another offence of the same class not involving a greater degree of punishment."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. HOPWOOD moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Hopwood.)

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Motion would not be pressed. Although the Committee had now been engaged upon the Bill for a considerable time, yet they were proceeding with a part of it to which there were comparatively few Amendments, and most of those were unopposed. He thought, therefore, the Committee might still make very good progress without coming to any point which would excite opposition. He turned over four or five pages of the Bill, and found literally only one small Amendment. When they came to any matter likely to lead to serious discussion, as involving a question of principle, he should not object to report Progress.

MR. HOPWOOD said, his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had left the House under the impression that Progress would be reported after Clause 56 had been disposed of. His hon. and gallant Friend had appealed to him whether that was not so, and he had told him that he thought that was the understanding.

SIR HENRY JAMES hoped the Committee might be allowed to proceed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EXECUTION OF SENTENCE.

Clause 57 (Commutation and remission of sentences) agreed to.

Clause 58 (Effect of sentence of penal servitude) agreed to.

Clause 59 (Execution of sentences of penal servitude passed in the United Kingdom).

MR. HOPWOOD said, he observed that the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire had an Amendment on the Paper to this clause, and he must, therefore, renew his Motion to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Hopwood.)

COLONEL STANLEY must again express a hope that the Committee would proceed. The Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire was not one he could consent to. It was to leave out one of the officers, the Adjutant General, who might have received directions to act as one of the committing authorities. He acted as a committing authority for certain purposes under this Act, and he did so in discharge of his duty. This would not produce the slightest effect upon any prisoner. He was merely the committing authority, just as a magistrate, or anyone else, was. He could not consent to leave out the words "Adjutant General," and he hoped the Motion would not be pressed.

MR. HOPWOOD should be very glad to accede to the appeal of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, if the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire had not gone away under the impression that he had stated.

COLONEL STANLEY must appeal once more to the Committee. He had had the honour of a seat in that House for some years, and he had yet to learn that they were to subordinate the whole of their proceedings and the time of the Committee to any one particular hon. Member. If he had given the understanding which had been referred to, or had even indirectly assented to it, he, of course, should have been willing to carry it out; but he gave none, and, really, upon two trivial Amendments to leave the Adjutant General's name out of the clause, he thought it was a little hard upon the Committee—he did not say upon the Government—to stop the progress of the Bill.

Mr. HOPWOOD remarked, that his allegation was that his hon. and gallant Friend believed that the Government had assented to Progress being reported after Clause 56, and had left the House under that impression. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members would excuse him; but this was not to be answered by clamour. He understood the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) to suggest that course, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to assent. ["No, no!"] He did not say that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did. It was quite enough for him (Mr. Hopwood) that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said he did not. He was, however, under that impression. But he also took his stand upon the merits, and he thought that, considering the hour at which the Committee had arrived, it was impossible that they could any longer give their undivided attention to this important Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he certainly did not understand that even what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) implied that they were to stop at the end of Clause 56. What he understood that hon. and learned Member to say was that they should at least finish Clause 56, because it was supposed to be connected with what had preceded it. No intimation was given on the part of the Government that they did not intend to ask the Committee to proceed further. He quite admitted that, at that time of the night, it would not be reasonable to go into any matter of difficulty that would lead to great contention; but that they should be stopped because one single hon. Member had left the House appeared to him to be wholly unreasonable, and, considering the great length of time that had already been spent over the Bill, and what still remained to be accomplished, he thought the Committee would be altogether wrong if they were, for such a reason, to decline to make a little more progress with the measure. He hoped the feeling of the Committee would be that they ought to proceed.

Colonel Stanley

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he expressed no opinion whether they should go beyond Clause 56. He observed that the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire had several Amendments on Clause 67. They referred only to two words, "Adjutant General," the object being to strike out all reference to that officer, and if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consent to pass over that clause, they might get rid of a great many clauses upon which there was no contention. When they reached Clause 69, they came to rather heavier ground, and it would then be desirable to report Progress.

COLONEL STANLEY thought the best course would be that the hon. and gallant Member should have an opportunity of challenging the opinion of the Committee on the Report.

Motion negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 60 (Execution of sentences of penal servitude passed in India or a Colony) agreed to.

Clause 61 (Execution of sentences of penal servitude passed in a foreign country) agreed to.

Clause 62 (General provisions applicable to penal servitude) agreed to.

Clause 63 (Execution of sentences of imprisonment) agreed to.

Clause 64 (Supplemental provisions as to sentences of imprisonment passed in the United Kingdom) agreed to.

Clause 65 (Supplemental provisions as to sentences of imprisonment passed in India or a Colony) agreed to.

Clause 66 (Supplemental provisions as to sentences of imprisonment passed in a foreign country) agreed to.

Clause 67 (Removal of prisoners to place where corps is serving) agreed to.

Clause 68 (Commencement of term of penal servitude or imprisonment) agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rules of Procedure.

Clause 69 (Power of Her Majesty to make rules of procedure).

COLONEL STANLEY thought it quite fair that he should here move to report Progress, as the clause contained matter that might lead to some discussion.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PUBLIC LOANS [REMISSION].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the remission of certain Loans formerly made by the Exchequer Loan Commissioners, and the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and by the Irish Exchequer Loan Commissioners, and the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or out of moneys formerly raised by the authority of Parliament for the purpose of such Loans.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 24th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Cruelty to Animals* (125); Salmon Fishery Law Amendment (No. 2)* (126); Sale of Food and Drugs Act (1875) Amendment* (127); Wormwood Scrubs Regulation* (128). Second Reading—Companies Acts Amendment (71).

Committee—Report—Metropolitan Public Carriage Act Amendment* (105).

Report—Children's Dangerous Performances* (122).

Third Reading—Supply of Drink on Credit* (84); Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment* (115); Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common)* (107); Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons)* (109); Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common)* (108); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford)* (112); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.)* (111); Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.)* (114); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.)* (110); Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.)* (94); Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.)* (103), and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY—NOTICE OF MOTION—THE STATE OF IRELAND.

EXPLANATION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE wished to explain why he did not at the previous Sitting bring forward the Motion which stood on the Paper in his name for that evening, with reference to the disturbed state of parts of Ireland. It was about a quarter past 6 o'clock before he left the House, and at that time there was a subject under discussion. Consequently, according to the time their Lordships usually sat, only an hour or so was left for any discussion on the subject. The reply on the part of the Government would probably have occupied some time, and there would not have been time for independent Members to express their views on the question. It was in these circumstances, and believing that the Motion could not have been adequately discussed, that he did not bring it forward.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I am sorry that the noble Lord did not bring forward his Motion yesterday, as there was a considerable attendance of Peers, and the House had a desire to hear the statement he had to make. As to the assumption that there would not have been time after a reply on the part of the Government for any independent Member to address your Lordships, I believe, on the contrary, that an opportunity would certainly have been given to any noble Lord who wished to express an opinion on the subject. I think it is much to be lamented that the noble Lord was not in his place when his opportunity occurred.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

(The Earl De La Warr.)

(NO. 7.) SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

On Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the Motion for Second Reading (which stands appointed for this day)—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR appealed to the noble Earl (Earl De La Warr), whether he would not consider the desirability of postponing for some time the second reading of this Bill, which stood among the Orders for the Day, and of which the noble Earl had charge. It had been introduced into their Lordships' House for the purpose of making an alteration in the law with regard to compensation for injuries sustained by workmen in the service of their employers. The subject was one which had already received much attention. It had been inquired into by one or more Committees and Commissions, and the Government undertook to bring in a measure dealing with it. That promise they fulfilled by introducing a Bill into the other House, by which it was proposed, to some extent, to alter the present law. In the other House there was also a Bill identical with that of the noble Earl, and both measures stood for second reading. The Government were anxious to proceed with the consideration of their Bill at the earliest possible period; but the state of Business in the other House of Parliament, and the little time left for proceeding with fresh measures there, had to be taken into account. Meantime, it would not be possible for their Lordships satisfactorily to discuss the merits of the noble Earl's Bill without having side by side with it the measure of the Government.

THE EARL OF BELMORE who had been, together with the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill, a Member of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents, and signed its Report, upon which this Bill was based, joined in the appeal of the noble and learned Earl, and recommended his noble Friend to leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

LORD NORTON thought the subject was ripe for legislation, and saw no reason why the Bill should not be proceeded with. Between the several Bills there were only differences of degree, so that all would consent to what they could get, if the Government would drop their Bill in the other House, and introduce it here to save time.

EARL DE LA WARR, while anxious that his Bill should be brought before their Lordships this Session, said he appreciated the grounds on which the noble and learned Earl had appealed to him on the subject, and asked leave to bring the Bill to the second reading.

already been turned debate put off to what still remains of July next.

Colonel Stanley Chancellor

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT (1875) AMENDMENT (INTERMENTS) BILL.

(The Earl Stanhope.)

(NO. 123.) SECOND READING.

On Order of the Day for the Second Reading (which stands appointed for this day)—

EARL GRANVILLE asked the noble Earl who had charge of this Bill (Earl Stanhope) to postpone the second reading. The Bill made an important alteration in the Law of Burial, and was only read a first time on Friday last.

EARL STANHOPE said, that the Bill passed through the House of Commons without a Division on its merits; but he had no objection to accede to the request of the noble Earl, and postpone the Bill for one week.

Second Reading put off to Tuesday next.

COMPANIES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Aberdare.)

(NO. 71.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD ABERDARE, in moving that the Bill, which had come up from the Commons, should be now read a second time, explained that its object was to enable Companies to apply accumulated funds from undivided profits to the reduction of the paid-up capital. Companies sometimes found that, in consequence of a restriction of their business, a diminution of their capital was desirable, and could be made without injury to creditors, if the Companies had legal power to make it. The distribution of a surplus in the form of a bonus led to speculation. The Bill had been examined by the Law Officers of the Crown and had received the assent of the Board of Trade; but he felt that it required amendment, and he was prepared to move certain Amendments in Committee. All he asked at present was the confirmation of its principle.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Aberdare.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that in the abstract he saw no objection to the principle of this Bill; but he was somewhat surprised to find that in the Bill that principle was unaccompanied by any conditions or safeguards. There ought to be a provision for the making of returns to some public officer, and also one to apply to the case of persons holding shares as trustees in Companies.

LORD SELBORNE concurred with his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack as to the necessity for a provision relating to trustees. When shares were fully paid up everything was safe for trustees holding such shares; but after the change proposed in this Bill trustees might be saddled with a liability to which they were not now exposed. Nothing would induce him, even for the nearest relative, to be trustee of shares carrying liability.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) did not see any great advantage in the Bill. He did not think it would be workable.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

SMALL-POX—PRISONS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether their attention has been drawn to the circumstances attending an inquest held on the 14th instant on the body of a prisoner named Joseph Penrose, who died on the 12th instant in Richmond Bridewell of small-pox; and if they are prepared to take steps to obviate in future the risk attending inquests upon persons who may have died in prison in Ireland of infectious diseases? The matter was of some importance, though it might seem a small one. It appeared that a person named Joseph Penrose had been committed to the Richmond Bridewell, Dublin, for some offence—the character of which he did not know—and subsequently small-pox developed itself in the man, and he died. According to a clause in a recent statute inserted, he presumed, in the interest of what are called in Ireland "political prisoners," if a prisoner died in gaol, an inquest must be held upon the body; formerly, he believed, all that was necessary was that the Coroner should certify as to the cause of death. On this occasion a jury was empannelled, and they very naturally objected to view the body; the Coroner, however, told them they were compelled to do so by law. He entirely sympathized with the jury in their refusal; had he formed one of the jury, he should himself have objected. The taking persons from outside the prison to sit as jurors on prisoners who had died of small-pox was dangerous not only to the jurors themselves, but to the community in which they lived. It appeared also that, besides being daily visited by the Governor of the gaol and the turnkeys, which was perhaps unavoidable, the prisoner had been attended in his illness by three other prisoners. He had been told, on very good authority, that only the other day, in the case of an inquest on a man who had died in prison in the North of Ireland, that the Coroner empannelled half-a-dozen of the prisoners in the gaol on the jury, and they improved the occasion by appending to their finding as to the cause of death a resolution condemning the Government dietary in Ireland as being unfit for prisoners, though it was exactly the same as that used in England. Considering the prevalence of small-pox in Dublin of late, he thought this was a matter not unworthy of notice, and one had excited interest in Dublin which, with some other towns in Ireland, was affected by this loathsome and dangerous disease.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that what his noble Friend had stated was correct. A change in the law on the subject of his noble Friend's Question was made by the Bill passed in 1877. During the passing of that Bill through the House of Commons great stress was laid on the necessity of having an inquest held on every person who died while a prisoner in any of the prisons. The result was that, by 40 & 41 Vict. c. 49, an inquest in such case was necessary. He was not aware of the circumstances of the particular case to which his noble Friend referred beyond that the man died of small-pox. He would make inquiry into it. He believed there was no doubt that the prisoner died of small-pox; but even in that state of circumstances, so long as that clause remained, the jury must view the body.

THE EARL OF BELMORE observed, that the jury added a rider to their verdict to the effect that prisoners suspected of small-pox should be removed to a small-pox hospital.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the removal of a prisoner, under such circumstances, would make the hospital a prison, and he could not be placed there without subjecting him to the same regulations as he would be in a prison; and if he died there, the law would still have to be carried out.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

EARL FORTESCUE *: My Lords, I must once more ask your indulgence for a few remarks in moving for the Returns on the Notice Paper. I have, for the last two or three years, moved for similar Returns, hoping against hope that the Government might be persuaded to propose, and Parliament to sanction, the admission of the most emphatic and prominent recommendation of the Schools Inquiry Committee into the legislation which purported to be based upon their Report, and to embody their recommendations. I refer to the establishment of Provincial authorities for preparing and carrying out, under the supervision of the central authority, schemes for re-organizing, systematically, in large districts, endowed schools of various grades throughout the country. This recommendation, on which, in the words of Lord Lyttelton and his Colleagues, the system proposed in the Schools Inquiry Report was mainly founded, came, with all the weight attaching to a singularly able and influential Commission, as the result of their most laborious and exhaustive inquiry. Perhaps, in these days, when all the resources of the country are under strain, when England is suffering simultaneously from agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing depression, remonstrances against the wasteful misapplication of vast educational endowments may be listened to more readily than I have found they were in more prosperous times. In moving for the same Returns, I regret that they must now, when granted, show, I fear, that three-fourths of the rich inheritance of endowments, of the value of some £20,000,000 sterling, have been disposed of by the Commissioners in their schemes, without the advantage of that Provincial consultation and local co-operation which the Schools Inquiry Report described as indispensable to the satisfactory accomplishment of this great national work. I am quite prepared to admit that the Charity Commissioners, having to depend solely on Assistant Commissioners, without any intermediate and independent Provincial authorities, have honestly done their best, in their separate and isolated schemes, to turn the individual endowments to good account. But this was not the problem before the country. The evidence from all parts conclusively showed that, though the endowments were numerous and valuable, yet that the feeling or fancy of individual benefactors had, from the first, scattered them so unequally, and that in the lapse of time their values had altered so capriciously, that no mere revival of their activity—always desultory, and, latterly, often obsolete—would correspond either to the wishes of the dead founders, or to the wants of the present and future generations. This state of things naturally led the Inquiry Commissioners to the conclusion pressed upon them by witnesses of the highest authority—that dealing with the schools in groups was an absolute necessity, and, further, that having local Provincial boards to deal with them was a corresponding necessity. Meanwhile, since the Report of that Committee, the whole educational question, as affecting all classes from the highest to the lowest, has assumed an entirely new aspect. I will not now stop to examine the process by which the wage class, with the addition of a constantly growing proportion of the class next above them, have been encouraged to expect unstinted instruction to be provided for their children, at a nominal cost to themselves, as parents, and a correspondingly heavy one to the ratepayer and the taxpayer. Nor will I pause now to inquire as to the probable influence of such a novel prospect upon the character and fortunes of our peculiar country and people. But, if the result should be inevitable, and the elementary schools of England are permanently to be sustained out of public resources, while selfishly deprecating this new burden upon my property, and even more seriously deprecating the debased, because pauperized, tone of education which my own and other employers' labourers' children must, I fear, receive under the threatened fuller development of such a system, yet I would earnestly protest in this House, as I have in my own neighbourhood, against a reduction of the rates upon my land, or the taxes on my means, by the misapplication of these endowments towards elementary schools. While wage-earning parents and their charitable friends were bearing the whole burden of their children's schooling, there was a reasonable claim, not only on benefactions destined ad hoc by those donors, but even on those whose redistribution had, through altered times and circumstances, reverted to the disposal of public authorities. But as this burden is now being shifted on to the ratepayer and the taxpayer, it is impossible to employ, with anything like equity, these diverse and capriciously located endowments for the relief of the general property of the country. I regret, therefore, to see, by the last Report of the Charity Commissioners, that out of 481 schemes for regulating schools under the Endowed Schools Act, no less than 203 have been for the benefit of elementary schools. The true application of these endowments should be in sustaining and elevating that education which is above the elementary—that intermediate education into which Lord Taunton's Commission so laboriously inquired, on which it so fully reported, and with regard to which its recommendations were so clear, so emphatic, so statesmanlike, and, alas! so unheeded by the late and the present Government. And when I speak of intermediate education, I look to its important bearing, not only on the middle class, properly so called, but on the most promising and deserving of the class below. While, therefore, I have been sorry to see in that Report that out of 481 of these schools' schemes no less than 203 were elementary, I am still more sorry to see that of the remaining 278 not more than 114 were 3rd grade, exactly the same number are of 2nd grade, the remaining 50 being 1st grade. Now, the Schools Inquiry states emphatically that the great want in England is good 3rd grade schools, that their numbers are deficient, and that the general condition of the existing ones is most unsatisfactory; and that the want is one which private enterprise cannot, as it could in the 1st and 2nd grades, be at all relied upon to supply; for this obvious reason—that as soon as the 3rd grade schoolmaster has acquired a reputation for the excellence of his school, he is at once induced to raise his terms, and thus convert his 3rd grade into a 2nd grade school. Pressed by the want of 3rd grade schools, the needful assistance for the establishment of which had thus been directed to schools far less requiring such aid, the ratepayers are beginning, in their despair, to demand, a State-and-rate-aided 3rd grade education for their children at elementary schools. And in this they are encouraged by the whole body of bureaucratic educational enthusiasts in Downing Street and elsewhere. I cited last year the case of Bradford, where a grammar school exists; but it is so instructive that perhaps I may be allowed to read the report of what took place in the House of Commons on this subject last Session.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

“MR. WHEELHOUSE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the following statement, issued by the School Board of Bradford, Yorkshire, be the legitimate object of any School Board formed under the Elementary Education Acts, seeing that each school is supported by rates:— ‘The design of the Board is to provide in both these schools a superior elementary education; to realize this object the course will be more enlarged than that of the ordinary elementary schools, and the instruction will be carried further by special teaching than has been found practicable in such schools;’ whether or not it be with the knowledge and sanction of the Educational Department of the Privy Council that ratepayers under the Elementary Education Acts should be called upon, compulsorily, to pay for pupils who, under the Board School system, are taught the subjects named under the ‘second’ head of the following curriculum:— ‘First, the subjects included in the Six Standards of the New Code—viz., reading, recitation, writing, arithmetic, dictation, grammar, composition, geography, history, object lessons, drill, vocal music, and needlework (for girls). Second, drawing, English literature, social economy, and the specific subjects of the New Code—viz., Latin, French, mathematics—algebra and euclid, physical geography, mechanics, animal physiology, domestic economy (for girls). Chemistry, botany, and other sciences may be taken up, without extra charge, in evening classes, under the Science and Art Department;’ and, if not, whether steps will be taken by the Council to prevent the provisions of the Elementary Education Acts being so applied?”

“LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, some time back the Bradford School Board started, as an experiment, an advanced elementary school. This experiment met with much support, so much so that a requisition, largely signed by ratepayers, was sent to the Board, asking them to establish another advanced elementary school. The Board applied to the Education Department for leave to charge in these schools a uniform rate of 9d. under the Elementary Education Act, and the Department consented, having taken adequate steps to protect children in the district whose parents were unable to pay the higher fee. All the subjects proposed to be taught, with the exception of social economy, are recognized and paid for by the Education Department. I am not, therefore, prepared to admit that the proposal of the Bradford School Board is contrary to the provisions of the Elementary Education Acts."—[3 Hansard, cccxxxix. 1371-2.]

The extra cost beyond the parents' pence—and not all of them are to pay even 9d. a-week—the extra cost of all this—I should till lately have said 3rd grade, I must now say advanced elementary education—is divided between the rates and the Treasury. We have many of us seen the recent letter in The Times describing how a tradesman with a splendid shop-front in Regent Street, and a villa in the suburbs, sent his children to a Board school; no doubt an advanced elementary school. We know that the last year's cost per head of the children to the London School Board was about £3 10s., and the average payment from parents 6s., leaving £3 4s. to be divided between the rates and the Treasury. No wonder that the annual Estimate for Education should, in a few years, have risen from £500,000 to £2,500,000. Where is it to stop if advanced elementary schools are to be multiplied? Now, rates are levied on real property alone, and the annual income from real property, we learn from the best authorities, does not exceed one-fifth of the total income enjoyed in the country. This is a fresh burden on land wholly imposed on it within less than 10 years, but assuming this new and alarming aspect within the last five years. Pray remember, I am not here protesting against the Elementary Education Act. It may be necessary that, like the pavement of the street, the mere groundwork of education should be provided by money raised from the public; but there must be a point where, as in the case of streets and houses, private obligations with their corresponding privileges begin. Between the public street and private home stands the door. The water and light provided free to the ratepayer outside have to be paid for by the householder within; for such tax-and-rate-paid-conveniences cannot be supplied within gratis without sapping the very foundation of independent citizenship. I am not, therefore, protesting against elementary education properly limited—in a word, against the three R's—being provided more or less at the public cost; remembering only that, for the good of the parents, it is desirable that their own contributions towards it should be fully proportioned to their means. But I do earnestly protest against more than the common groundwork being so provided—against a costly superstructure of education, against Latin and French, and algebra and chemistry, and much more besides, being taught at the public expense. We hear much of the dispauperizing influence of education. But I am afraid that, in the case of the children getting, almost wholly at the expense of their fellow-citizens, an education which their parents could well pay, and a few years ago would certainly have paid for them, the practical lesson of dependence on State-and-rate aid will far more than counteract any lessons on the blessings of independence inculcated in the course of their studies. And the worst is, that as the children will be, so the parents are now being, demoralized and enervated by this system. Educational aids from benefactions of pious founders do not seem to produce at all the same effect as the experience of the working of our great schools and Universities for centuries seem to prove. Scholarships for the deserving could be amply supplied out of the £20,000,000 of educational endowments already mentioned. But these £20,000,000 might do much more than provide the means of rising for the meritorious poor scholar; they might sustain and assist schools of various grades for both sexes, by which the families of all other classes except the highest—who have long benefited, but not exclusively, by the public school and University endowments—might be helped to hold their own in the increasing struggles of an age of increasing intellectual competition. For that purpose, I more than ever believe in the importance of intermediate local authorities to co-operate with the central authority in the great national work of intermediate education. And I have observed with pain the omission of all allusion to any such duties in the various abortive measures for county government brought in by the present Administration. In conclusion, I may be allowed to say that in protesting both against what I consider the mischievous transgression beyond the professed, and, in my opinion, proper, limits of the Elementary Education Act, and against the persistent neglect of the most important of the recommendations announced to be the basis of the Endowed Schools Act—a neglect leading to extensive misapplication, though not abuse, of endowments—I feel I am only acting consistently with that earnest desire for the promotion of education among all classes of my countrymen, under the influence of which I have strenuously laboured ever since I came to man's estate.

Moved that there be laid before the House—

Return made out, county by county, in continuation of Return respecting the Endowed Schools Acts, Paper No. (5.), ordered to be printed on the 13th of February last, with in each case a proximate estimate of the annual endowments of (1) The number of Schemes finally approved and in force in England and Wales under the Endowed Schools Acts of 1869, 1873, and 1874; (2) The number of Schemes published by the Charity Commissioners under those Acts, but not yet finally approved; (3) The Endowed Schools not returned in (1) and (2) nor included in sect. 3 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1873, which are within the general provisions of the Endowed Schools Acts; (4) The aggregate number and income of Endowed Schools included in sect. 3. of the Endowed Schools Act, 1873: Also

Return, as regards (1), of the grade, determined as in Paper (5.), 1879, of each school under the Scheme in force, as well as the total number and grades of such schools.—(The Earl Fortescue.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was not prepared for a speech from the noble Earl upon a Motion for a Return to which there was no opposition, and which Return was in continuation of former Returns on the same subject. However, the noble Earl moved annually for these Returns, and annually made a speech upon the subject, and it was his (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon's) duty to make a reply. The noble Earl complained of the action of the Charity Commissioners. For himself (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), it was his duty to say that he was perfectly satisfied with the manner in which those gentlemen had carried out the duties of their Office. The noble Earl said that he would not touch upon the operation of the Education Act of 1870; but the last part of the noble Earl's speech was against the manner in which the Commissioners had carried out the provisions of that Act. But what the Commissioners had done was legally done. The noble Earl stated that the Charity Commissioners had dealt with elementary education, and made grants towards it under certain schemes. But the money they had appropriated to such schemes was money expressly left for that purpose. But he preferred to rest the conduct of the Commissioners, not upon his own approbation, but upon the approbation of the country, and upon the approbation of those persons who were most nearly and closely interested and connected with the operation of their schemes. Out of the 75 schemes which were produced last year by the Commissioners, only seven were opposed in Parliament. Upon only one of those seven was there a division taken; and that scheme, as proposed by the Commissioners, was carried by a large majority. Their work was best judged by the results. There would be no objection to the Returns; and, in conclusion, he was glad to state that the Charity Commissioners had shown great diligence and energy, and had in the most proper manner carried on the duties of their Office.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY wished to observe that, as regarded the diligence and energy of the Commissioners, he could state that he had never met with any Office where the correspondence took such an extraordinarily long time to answer; and that feeling he had heard expressed in the country. He would now hope that the Charity Commissioners would, in future, after what the noble Duke had said, exhibit that ordinary diligence and activity which were shown by, and expected from, persons who received large salaries from the country for the transaction of the duties of their Office. He understood that all the Charity Commissioners took at the same time of the year what was called their "long vacation," and left the business of the Department to stand over for weeks, if not months; and, consequently, no correspondence could be carried on. He certainly thought that some of the Commissioners should remain at the Office all the year round and attend to the business which was necessary, so that it should not be quite stopped for weeks or months.

LORD CLINTON said, that he must say a word on behalf of the Charity Commissioners. He thought it would have been fairer if the noble Earl, instead of bringing so general a charge against the Commissioners, had stated instances in which the alleged delay had occurred, so that he (Lord Clinton), as a Charity Commissioner, might have had the opportunity of giving some answer or explanation. He could assure the noble Earl that at no period of the year was the Office entirely closed, except on the Bank and other general holidays, and he must protest against the charge that the Commissioners neglected the correspondence of their Office.

Motion agreed to; Return ordered to be laid before the House.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make provision for the more effectual prevention of Cruelty to Animals—Was presented by The Lord TRURO; read 1^a. (No. 125.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 24th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Turnpike Acts Continuance [No. 243]; Land Titles and Transfer [No. 244].

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution [June 23] reported—Ordered—First Reading—Public Loans (Remission) * [218].

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [88]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Consolidated Fund (No. 4) *.

The House met at Two of the clock.

POSTPONEMENT OF QUESTION.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK: I wish to give Notice, Sir, that I shall postpone till Thursday next the Question which stands on the Paper in my name (see page 414) with regard to the circumstances attending the lamented death of the Prince Imperial; and I beg to state that I do so in the hope that the Mail expected from the Cape to-morrow or next day will enable the Government to put the circumstances in a more favourable light than they appear at present in the eyes of many thousands of people, who, like myself, think the circumstances in which the Prince found himself there on that occasion called, in more than an ordinary degree, for the special supervision of the military authorities.

Lord Clinton

MR. P. J. SMYTH: I beg to give Notice that on Thursday I will ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether a rigid inquiry will be instituted into the circumstances immediately attending the melancholy death of the Prince Imperial?

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—MILITIA BARRACKS AT CHESTERFIELD.—QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether the attention of the War Office has been called to the bad state of repair and unwholesome condition of the Militia buildings at Chesterfield, being the headquarters of the 2nd Derby Militia; and, whether the War Office is prepared to put these buildings in a proper state of repair and good sanitary condition?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in reply, said, that the attention of the War Office had not been called to the alleged bad state of repair and the unwholesomeness of the barracks in question. The 2nd Derby Militia, at the request of their colonel, had obtained permission to occupy the barracks at Chesterfield instead of those at Derby. The War Office, while desiring to accommodate the Militia, could scarcely be asked to place any buildings they might choose to select as their barracks in repair at the public expense.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE WAR—DESTRUCTION OF ZULU VILLAGES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been directed to the letter of the special correspondent of the "Daily News," published in the issue of that paper on the 20th instant, in which the destruction of four native villages, by Colonel Lowe's command, is described; whether, in particular, he has marked the following statement:—

"Lord Chelmsford had given orders that no kraals should be burned until the general advance, being anxious to utilize the woodwork of the huts as fuel; but these kraals were far away from the line of any possible advance, and Colonel Lowe determined to destroy them. Two laconic words from Long to his men, "set fire," sufficed to set them in a blaze, mere flimsy structures of wooden wattle as they were;"

and, whether the Government will make inquiries as to any order given by Lord Chelmsford for the burning of native villages during the general advance into Zululand such as is here alleged?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Yes, Sir; my attention has been directed to the statements in the special correspondence of The Daily News quoted by the hon. Member; but the interpretation I should place upon them is that Lord Chelmsford had not ordered Native huts or villages to be burnt, but had directed them to be spared, in view of the possible necessity for using their materials as fuel during the advance into Zululand. The Government, of course, consider that these kraals should only be destroyed in case of military necessity; and my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, with whom, rather than with me, this matter rests, has authorized me to state that if he saw reason to believe that any wanton destruction was permitted he would at once interfere.

MR. O'DONNELL: I will take an early opportunity of bringing the matter under the notice of the Secretary of State for War.

SOUTH AFRICA—INDENTURED NATIVE WOMEN AND CHILDREN.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to the following "Government Notice," published at foot of page 126 of "The Journal of the Aborigines' Protection Society," No. 5, prohibiting the restoration to their families of native women and children indentured out in servitude to Colonial farmers:—

"Native Labourers under Government Notice, No. 222, of 1878.—Office of the Secretary for Native Affairs, Cape of Good Hope, 10th April, 1879.—Whereas certain Kaffirs (Galekas, Gaikas, and others) on the Frontier and in other parts of the Colony, are found to apply to the Civil Commissioners of the various divisions in which the said Kaffirs at present reside, for passes to enable them to visit the Cape, and other districts of the Western Province, for the purpose of 'fetching their wives and families;' and whereas the said wives and families of the said Kaffirs have duly entered into terms of service under the above-mentioned Government Notice, No. 222, of 1878, thereby voluntarily rendering themselves incapable of leaving their place of service for the term of three years and six months from the date of their various 'contracts' respectively: Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that it is not expedient to grant passes to Kaffirs for the purpose above indicated, and all Civil Commissioners and Resident Magistrates, and other officers authorised to issue passes to natives, are hereby directed to refuse such passes when applied for, and to inform all applicants of this regulation accordingly. — William Ayliff, Secretary for Native Affairs;"

and, what action he intends to take in the matter?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have not received the "Government Notice" quoted by the hon. Member, either from the Colony or from the Aborigines' Protection Society, and I am, of course, unable to say how far it is an accurate copy of any notice which may have been issued; but, unquestionably, if it is accurate, it is open to very grave objection. I trust I may receive it from the Aborigines' Protection Society, with their report of the circumstances under which it was sent to them; and I can promise the House that I will, as soon as I do so, take action upon it.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (WATER EXPENSES) BILL.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was anxious to put a Question to the Chairman of Ways and Means relating to the Notice which his hon. Friend had put upon the Paper with regard to the second reading of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Water Expenses) Bill. The Question which he wished to put was, Whether, looking at the circumstances of the case, his hon. Friend could see his way to the removal of his opposition to this Bill, so that it might be considered by the House? The Notice of his hon. Friend rather implied that the Government ought to have introduced this measure on their own responsibility, but that they had not done so. He was now authorized by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—whom he regretted to say was unable, from indisposition, to be present that day—to state that, with certain Amendments which he proposed to move in Committee, and of which he would give due Notice, the Government were prepared, on their own responsibility, to support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. RAIKES ventured to think that the Question which had just been addressed to him by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury offered the best justification for the course which he had taken in putting upon the Paper the Notice to which he had referred. The proposition which he desired to have affirmed was that a measure of this sort, quite apart from its merits—as to which he did not wish to say anything—that a proposal of this description was not one which would obtain the favour of the House unless it had received the sanction of the Government, who had thought that, under the special circumstances of the case, there was reason for its being brought before Parliament. Having now obtained from his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury the intimation that the Bill was in that position, he had arrived at the result he desired to secure, and he should, therefore, be very happy to withdraw the Notice which he had put upon the Paper.

Mr. MONK desired to ask a Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works upon the general question arising out of this Bill—namely, Whether he could inform the House the amount for which he asked an indemnity from Parliament.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, that in answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, he might state that he should be prepared in Committee to put down a certain sum beyond which an indemnity would not be asked; but as he had had no Notice of the Question then put to him, he hoped the House would allow him to postpone giving an exact answer. Perhaps he might be permitted to add his belief that the amount of the indemnity would be between £15,000 and £16,000 at the outside. But he would put down a sum in Committee which would cover everything.

Mr. O'DONNELL begged to give Notice that, as the very excellent Notice of opposition put down by the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means had been removed, he should do what was in his power to make certain that the discussion upon this Bill should take place before half-past 12 at night, if at all, in order that he might insure as full as possible a discussion of the very important principles contained in this Bill.

Mr. Raikes

SOUTH AFRICA—THE WAR EXPENDITURE.—QUESTION.

Mr. RYLANDS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to ask, If the Government have formed any estimate of the amount which ought to be contributed by the Cape Colonists towards the war expenditure; and, whether any, and what steps, have been taken with a view to obtaining payment of such amount; and, whether any despatches upon the subject will shortly be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I see that the hon. Member for Burnley has given Notice of his intention to ask the House to express its opinion that the Colonies of the Cape of Good Hope and Natal ought to be required to contribute a due proportion of the military expenditure incurred in their interests. I can only assure the hon. Member that that is entirely the view of Her Majesty's Government, and that that is a matter which they have had in mind throughout all the circumstances which have occurred. From the Papers which are already in the possession of the House I think hon. Members must be aware that when, now more than a year and a-half ago, re-inforcements were sent to the Cape in connection with the Transkei War, it was distinctly stated to the Cape Government that they would be required to contribute their due proportion of the expenditure. There have been, since that time, further communications upon the subject. We have had, of course, to endeavour to ascertain what the expenditure of the Cape Government itself may have been—I understand that it amounted to more than £1,250,000—and what our own expenditure was in the Transkei War; and it is only comparatively recently that we have been able to arrive at a knowledge of the full details of that expenditure. The Cape Government have informed us merely of the total amount at which they estimate their expenditure; and the last despatch which was written upon the subject was one conveying to them the detailed items of the expenditure which had been incurred by this country for the Transkei War, and asking them to furnish us, in return, with the details of the £1,250,000 which they said they had expendent. That is how the matter at present stands. The Correspondence has not yet been presented. I think it would be well to wait for their reply before it is presented; but it will be laid, as soon as possible, before the House.

MR. RYLANDS said, that, in consequence of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, he should withdraw his Notice on the third reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill; and, if no further information were given by the Government, he should put it down on the Motion for Supply.

MR. CHILDERS: With respect to the answer which has just been given to my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley, may I be allowed to give the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of supplementing his answer by asking this further Question? My hon. Friend referred in his Question not only to the Transkei War, but to the Zulu War; but in the right hon. Gentleman's answer, no reference was made to any share which the Colonists may have to bear of the other and larger expenditure in connection with the Zulu War. I would ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have had any similar communications with the Colonial authorities with reference to the Zulu War; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence which has already taken place?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Will the right hon. Gentleman give Notice of his Question?

HARBOURS—DUNBAR HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Report on Dunbar Harbour will be placed on the Table of the House?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that he had received it that morning, but had not had time to look into it. He would do so without delay, and then inform the noble Lord when it would be ready for presentation to the House.

PREROGATIVE OF THE CROWN.

ORDER FOR RESUMING ADJOURNED DEBATE DISCHARGED.

MR. DILLWYN moved the discharge of the Order for resuming the debate upon the Prerogative of the Crown. He explained that he did so, in the first place, because he did not see any opportunity of bringing the debate on; secondly, because the House was in possession of much more information now than it was when he brought the question forward; and, thirdly, because of the change that had been made in the command of the troops at the Cape.

Motion agreed to.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment on Motion [13th May] read, and discharged.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—COURTS OF INQUIRY.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, When he will lay on the Table the promised Rules as to limiting the use of Courts of Inquiry, and preventing their abuse?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he proposed that the clause in the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill bearing on the subject of Rules of procedure, should be postponed until the Committee had arrived at the end of the measure. He was advised that this would be the best mode of meeting any possible changes which the Committee might make in the Bill as it stood.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked, Whether Mr. Speaker would be good enough to inform him why the Notice of Motion in his name for this evening stood third upon the Paper, instead of second, as it appeared in the Order Book of the 10th of June? A Notice of Motion by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) was now put before him, although he had balloted and obtained the second place.

MR. CALLAN said, that some mistake having been made in the matter before the adjournment for the Holidays, he had written to the Clerk at the Table and received an answer that nothing could be done until the House re-assembled. When the House met, a reference was made to the list which had been made, and the Notices were placed by the Clerk at the Table exactly in the order in which the ballot was held.

MR. SPEAKER believed that the explanation just given was quite correct. It accounted for the Notice of the hon. Member for Dundalk being put down before that of the hon. and gallant Member for Gravesend. The Motion of the hon. Member for Dundalk was entitled to precedence on the Paper this evening.

CAPTAIN PIM asked, why he was not informed by the Clerk at the Table as to the fate of his Motion?

MR. SPEAKER said, the Clerk, acting in accordance with the ordinary practice of the House, made an alteration, which, of course, the hon. and gallant Member would see on the Notice Paper on the following day.

CAPTAIN PIM said, it was by the merest accident that he happened to see it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 23rd June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rules of Procedure.

Clause 69 (Power of Her Majesty to make rules of procedure).

COLONEL STANLEY moved that the clause be postponed. He had been informed by his advisers that it would be best to postpone the discussion of this clause in Committee till a later period.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to know exactly when the clause would be taken, for it involved very important considerations. He should not like the clause to be taken without Notice, or at a late or inconvenient hour.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he proposed to postpone the discussion of the clause, because he was advised that it would be best not to take power to make rules of procedure until the various clauses of the Bill had been decided upon by the Committee. The clause, having been postponed, would come before the Committee at a later period ; but when he could not at that moment say.

MR. HOPWOOD observed, that this clause was open to considerable objection, for it was one giving power to Her Majesty—

“To make rules to be signified under the hand of a Secretary of State, to repeal, alter, or add to,” certain provisions of the Bill. The power given by this clause was, in effect, to leave it to the Secretary of State to vary various matters decided upon by the House. He thought this matter required considerable attention.

MR. O'DONNELL thought the proposal to postpone the consideration of this very important clause was very inconvenient; if the Government were not prepared to discuss the clause, let them postpone the discussion of the Bill altogether. The Government would find itself very much more pressed for time later on in the Session, and would probably yield to the irresistible temptation of bringing on the clause, perhaps, after 12 or 1, and a discussion at that time would not be at all satisfactory. He begged to remind the Committee that on the last occasion when the Committee sat, several clauses were run over with extreme haste, which, had they been brought forward at an earlier time of the day, would have received much more consideration. By this clause—

“Her Majesty may, by rules signified under the hand of a Secretary of a State, from time to time make, and when made repeal, alter, or add to, provisions in respect to the following matters.”

The clause gave power to the Secretary of State for the time being, no matter what might be the subsequent decisions of the Committee upon the Bill, to make and unmake, alter and add to, the provisions of the measure. The matters over which this power was given were some of the most important provisions of the measure. They included—

“The convening and constituting of courts martial; the adjournment, dissolution, and sittings of courts martial; the procedure to be observed in trials by courts martial; the confirmation and revision of the findings and sentences of courts martial; the carrying into effect sentences of courts martial; the forms of orders to be made under the provisions of this Act relating to courts martial, penal servitude, or imprisonment; any matter in this Act directed to be prescribed; any other matter or thing expedient or necessary for the purpose of carrying this Act into execution so far as relates to the investigation, trial, and punishment of offences triable or punishable by military law."

The Committee had discussed the position and functions of courts martial at great length; but this clause gave power to vary any decision in respect of that, or of any of the other matters mentioned; so that, no matter what decision might be come to upon these subjects, it could afterwards be set aside by the Secretary of State. He thought that, with such a clause as this hanging over the Bill, the best thing to be done would be to put it out of the way before they went further. For, if any subsequent clause which they passed in any way related to the matters as to which this clause gave power to make rules, the decisions of the Committee would be absolutely futile. In his opinion, there should not be any such clause in the Bill as this 69th clause. The Bill was intended to be permanent; and yet Her Majesty's Government were to have power, whenever they pleased, to vary so much of it as came within this very sweeping clause. He should have thought that Her Majesty's Government ought to be able to tell the Committee what were the permanent regulations which were required for Army discipline, and to ask for the sanction of Parliament to those rules. If this Army Bill, which the House was now passing, was not found satisfactory, it was open to the Government to bring in supplementary Acts for such portions of it as were found deficient. But, by this clause of the Bill, the authorities were to be allowed to tack on provisions which, it seemed to him, would entirely stultify the action of the Committee. One would have imagined that the Government desired to pass a Bill of some kind with respect to the Army; but if the Government were ashamed of their Bill, let them say so, and not occupy the time of the House further with it. He could see no reason whatever for the postponement of this clause.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was surprised that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War did not think it worth his while to notice the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan; because it seemed to him that what he had pointed out—namely, that this clause gave power to do away with the decisions of the Committee on various parts of the Bill, was of very great importance. The Government now proposed to withdraw this clause, and to run through the whole Bill, and then to embody the substance of this clause in a new one. He thought that the best time for the discussion of this very important question was as it stood in the 69th Clause.

Motion agreed to.

Clause, by leave, postponed.

Inquiry as to, and Confession of Desertion.

Clause 70 (Inquiry by court on absence of soldier).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON wished to move an Amendment—namely, in page 39, line 2, to leave out the word "may," and insert the word "shall."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he had no objection to it.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to move an Amendment on the clause, before that of the hon. and gallant Member. This clause said—

"That when any soldier has been illegally absent from his duty for a period of twenty-one days, a court of inquiry may, as soon as practicable, be assembled, and inquire in the prescribed manner on oath (which such court is hereby authorized to administer) respecting the fact of such absence."

He wished to point out that the object of the inquiry in this clause was whether the soldier had been "illegally" absent or not. He did not think that this presumption of illegality should be retained, for what was the use of the word "illegal" in the clause? If the soldier was absent without known cause, he could understand it; but when it was said that the inquiry was to be whether he was "illegally" absent, he did not see what meaning was to be attached to the word. He should suggest that, instead of the word "illegally," there should be substituted the words "has been absent without known cause."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that if the word "illegally" were left out, the absence of a soldier from his duty for 21 days would be made legal. Where a soldier had been absent without any assignable cause then the court of inquiry would have to assemble. This court was—

"To inquire in the prescribed manner on oath (which such court is hereby authorized to administer) respecting the fact of such absence, and the deficiency (if any) in the arms, ammunition, equipments, instruments, regimental necessities, or clothing of the soldier; and if satisfied of the fact of such soldier having absented himself without leave, the court shall declare such absence and the period thereof, and the said deficiency (if any), and the commanding officer of the absent soldier shall enter in the regimental books a record of the declaration of such court. If the absent soldier does not afterwards surrender, or is apprehended, such record shall have the legal effect of a conviction by the court martial for desertion."

The record had a legal effect, and the soldier's effects were sold and placed to the non-effective account. This was necessary to be done, as in some cases soldiers deserted, and were not heard of for years.

MR. BIGGAR thought that the objection raised to this clause was this—that it was assumed by the clause that the soldier was "illegally" absent before investigating the case. It was proposed, then, to punish the soldier for being "illegally" absent. If he apprehended the Amendment, it was to introduce after the word "absent" the words "without leave," and to strike out the word "illegally." Under this clause, as it stood, a soldier, who had been absent without leave, might be declared a deserter in his absence. A soldier might be absent without leave from no fault of his own, but for causes which he could not help; and it was not right that it should be assumed that he had been "illegally" absent.

MR. O'DONNELL hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consent to strike out the word "illegally" and put in the words "without leave." His contention was that it could not be told whether the soldier was illegally absent until he had been tried; he might be absent for a very good reason—he might have got leave, and overstayed it from no fault of his own, and, at the same time, it might be necessary for inquiry to be made into the cause of his absence. It seemed to him that the wording of the clause was faulty; and he could not see why the authorities should stick to the word "illegally," which was not properly put in the clause. Although a soldier might be absent without assignable cause, it ought to be legally proved that his absence had been "illegal." He thought that the fact of the illegality of the man's absence should be proved, rather than they should go upon a supposition which might turn out to be quite unfounded.

MR. HOPWOOD understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to say that mere absence from duty was a sufficient definition, and that the soldier was then on the wrong side of the account. What he supposed the right hon. and gallant Gentleman meant was that absence from duty raised the presumption of an offence or omission cognizable by a Court of Inquiry. If that were so, he should be much surprised. He did not see that the word "illegally" was really wanted; all objection to the clause would be done away with by taking out the word "illegally." Then the clause would read—"When any soldier has been absent from his duty for a period of 21 days," and there was something to be inquired into. If the clause were left in that manner, they would have all they wanted; but if the word "illegally" was retained then, as the hon. Member for Dungarvan had said, it would prejudice the matter; whereas the court ought to require to be satisfied by proof that the absence of the soldier was "illegal."

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON was bound to say that he thought the proposal to strike out the word "illegally" was a sensible one. He considered that it would be quite enough to provide for the trial of a soldier "who had been absent from his duty without leave," without using the word "illegally."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFORD) was inclined to agree with some of the observations of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. But this was only one of those enactments which assumed, in the first instance, the commission of an offence. It was the rule in Acts of Parliament to say that a man guilty of murder should be tried before a magistrate, and the same phrases were used with respect to other offences. It was assumed in all Statutes that a man was guilty of the offence for which he was to be brought before the magistrates. In a certain sense, no doubt, it was unjust to assume that the man was guilty of an offence before he was tried; but, on the other hand, no real injustice was done, and no practical inconvenience resulted from leaving the language as it now stood. It was the contention of his right hon. and gallant Friend that the mere words "absence from duty without leave" would not cover every case that might occur. There seemed to be cases in which the words "absent without leave" would subject persons to trial who were not really liable to be tried. He thought that what had been said with respect to this clause was hypercritical; and as he had shown that it was usual, in speaking of the trial of offences, to assume that a man was guilty of what he was tried for and no practical inconvenience resulted, he did not think it was worth while to alter this clause.

Colonel Stanley

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that it was surely not necessary to retain these words because it had been the usual practice to assume that men were guilty before they were tried. There must be some form of words known to the Army authorities which would correctly state the circumstances which should make a soldier liable to be tried, without using words which assumed that he was guilty. Clearly, the Committee could not allow the word "illegally" to be retained in the clause when its use was prejudicial. He should suggest, that instead of "illegally," they should say—"Absent without leave," "without due cause," or "without reasonable cause."

MR. RYLANDS said, that this was one of the difficulties in which the Committee was landed in consequence of Her Majesty's Government not giving proper instructions to the Select Committee. If the Government had directed the Select Committee to deal with the questions put before them in the general way, instead of saddling them with the terms they had, he believed that the anomalous wording of the clause would not have been retained. If the Committee had been left unfettered, the Articles of War and the Mutiny Act would have been drafted into a proper shape, and the old words, which were improperly used in those documents, would not now appear. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to regard the language of the Articles of War and the Mutiny Act as almost having the authority of inspiration. He could not see any ground for the Government refusing to accept this Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General) did not give the slightest evidence to show that the words suggested would not meet the case. He most strongly objected to the continuance of words in this clause, because they were found in the very musty and obsolete Articles of War, and had been for many years accepted by the military authorities.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to point out that the phrase "without leave" occurred a little lower down in the clause, and seemed to be tantamount to "illegal" absence. That seemed to him to take away the ground from under the feet of Her Majesty's Government. If the Government criticized them for being hypercritical, he thought that the Government were guilty of delaying the Business of the Committee from their own hypercriticism, in refusing to accept the Amendment.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, it was admitted that as the words stood in the clause they were capable of an ambiguous construction; and it had been suggested that the words should be made clear and intelligible. If the phrase "without leave" did not cover the ground sufficiently, then he thought that the expression which had also been suggested by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would meet the case—namely, "without leave," or "without due cause," or "without reasonable cause." These were expressions which were intelligible to everyone; but the word "illegally" was really a very doubtful word. Nothing could be worse than to leave such a matter as this in ambiguity.

COLONEL COLTHURST remarked, that the words "absent from duty without leave" would, in practice, cover every possible case.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT thought that the objection might be readily met if it were said "suspected of having been illegally absent from duty."

COLONEL STANLEY had no objection to the insertion of the words "absent from his duty without leave;" but what he did object to was to strike out the word "illegally." Striking out that word would make a man liable to be tried who had been absent even with leave, but had overstayed it.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the original proposal was that the word "illegally" should be struck out. With respect to the contention of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, it seemed to him to be an exceedingly weak one. He argued that because in some Acts of Parliament expressions were used which were contrary to general principles of jurisprudence, they should adhere to them and fall into the same error.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that the Government was asked to give way upon this point as to the word "illegally," and to that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had replied that he accepted the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst). This was absolutely no concession on the part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; and he did not think that they ought to pass this clause under the idea that a concession had been made. The addition of the words "without leave" would not meet the objection which had been made. It was against the common sense of the Committee to suppose that they would consent to a proposal of that kind.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE remarked, that if a soldier surrendered, or was afterwards apprehended when he was absent from no fault of his own, he would, nevertheless, have been declared "illegally" absent, and convicted of desertion. If a soldier surrendered voluntarily, there was no occasion for a conviction.

MR. O'DONNELL remarked, that in the case stated where a man had been tried as illegally absent, there was good reason why he should not have been convicted, and the Government, in retaining this word, was doubly stultifying itself. If the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General), who had delivered a lecture on hypercriticism, would give a little legal advice to his military Colleagues on this subject, he thought some good would result. However great the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's knowledge of military matters might be, he did not seem to apprehend that there was grave objection to saying that a man should not be tried unless he had been illegally absent.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he was willing to accept the words, which, it seemed to him, perfectly met the objection. If they said a man was absent illegally, they said, in fact, that he was absent without leave. But he was willing to insert the words "without leave," as he understood that to be the wish of the Committee. Although he did not think that much would be gained, he would not raise any further objection to the word "illegally" being struck out from the clause.

Amendment made,

In page 39, line 1, by striking out the word "illegally," and inserting in the same line, after the word "absent," the words "without leave."

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 39, line 2, to leave out the word "may," and insert the word "shall."

MR. MUNTZ thought the clause would be better as it stood; for supposing that a man was taken ill when on leave, his absence from duty for that cause ought to be passed over. But if the word "shall" was substituted for "may," on his return his commanding officer would have no alternative but to assemble a Court of Inquiry to inquire as to his absence.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON explained, that the reason why he wished this Amendment to be made was that it would compel the commanding officer to report all deserters to head-quarters. This was a very important matter; for at present it was compulsory on a commanding officer to return a man to head-quarters as a deserter if he were absent for more than 21 days. The reason for compelling the commanding officer to make these reports was that the Secretary of State for War might know how many deserters there were in the Army. If this matter were made optional, the commanding officer might allow men to be absent for several months without ordering any inquiry. At present, a General could direct a man to be reported as a deserter; but if this Act made the assembling of a court permissive, a commanding officer could refuse to have an inquiry held. Therefore, he thought that it was of the highest importance that the assembling of these courts should be made compulsory where a man had been absent for 21 days.

MAJOR NOLAN did not think that the Amendment was required. At present, the commanding officer had to report a man who had been illegally absent for five days, and the War Office thus became cognizant of the fact. He knew of cases where hardship would be worked by this alteration. A man might overstay his leave without any intention of deserting; and it should be in the discretion of the commanding officer as to inquiring into the case. Moreover, there might be great practical difficulties if this were made compulsory, for unnecessary trouble would be occasioned in the case, say, of a small battery of Artillery at an outlying port. It would be very troublesome for an officer in command of that battery to obtain the attendance of officers for the purpose of holding a Court of Inquiry; whereas, under the clause as it stood at present, the matter might be postponed till a convenient time.

Amendment negatived.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved to insert, after the words "without leave," "or without other sufficient cause."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the closing paragraph of this clause was rather severe, and he thought was calculated to work undeserved injury upon the character of a man. It stated that—

"If the absent soldier does not afterwards surrender and is not apprehended, such record shall have the legal effect of a conviction by court martial for desertion."

Desertion was a most disgraceful offence, and if it took place in the face of the enemy was peculiarly disgraceful. A soldier might be absent without leave for one or two days. He might have fallen sick, or he might be dead; but this clause would give the opportunity, from the mere fact of his having been absent without leave, to brand him as a deserter. This effect of the clause would be to enable a man who was absent from no fault of his own to be branded as a deserter. That might be very painful to his family and relations, when it was afterwards found that he had been killed, or had been taken a prisoner, or had fallen ill. He thought that the same legal effect might have been produced in some other way, without the necessity of branding a man as a deserter under these circumstances. He did not think it right to brand a man as a deserter while there was any reasonable chance or hope that he had not really deserted. He did not propose to move any Amendment on the clause; but he thought that something should be done to prevent the effect which he had pointed out.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that it occasionally happened that a soldier returned after having been illegally absent for three, four, or five years. The witnesses who might be necessary to prove the case against him might then be dead, or might have moved, and there would be no evidence producible to prove his desertion, except this record of a court martial. At present, the book of this court was produced, and was evidence of the soldier's desertion. That was the reason for the provision.

MR. O'DONNELL, in replying to the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Alexander), wished to put the case of a man either killed or cut off by the enemy. He thought that so much weight ought not to be given to the presumption of desertion as was given in this clause.

MR. HOPWOOD read the section—

"If the absent soldier does not afterwards surrender or is not apprehended, such record shall have the legal effect of a conviction by court martial for desertion," —differently to the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Alexander). It appeared that the only object of the section was that the legal effect of conviction should operate by way of forfeiture upon any portion of the pay or allowances to which the soldier was entitled, so that all claims which might be made, say, by his relatives in case of his supposed death, might be quieted by the fact of his being away in a manner not explained. The words, which were simply, "if he does not afterwards surrender or is not apprehended," meant that if he never came back, either compulsorily or voluntarily, the legal effect was to be the same as if he had been condemned by court martial for desertion. That, he presumed, carried with it forfeiture of pay, and all matters of that kind.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, the regimental book was produced as evidence against a prisoner of desertion, when witnesses were not forthcoming.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought the Secretary of State for War ought to have explained to the Committee that this was a very important departure from the existing system. He also wished the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would explain why he had omitted from the Bill the remainder of the clause in the existing Act, of which he had taken the first part only, thereby making a court of inquiry take the place of a court martial?

COLONEL STANLEY agreed that the section was open to the construction placed upon it by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). The words, perhaps, covered more than they were intended to do; and he would introduce words on Report to make this clause agree with the existing Act.

MR. RYLANDS said, the Select Committee were presented with a draft Bill, which was intended to embrace the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War, prepared by a very distinguished draftsman, Sir Henry Thring. But, so far as he had found, the Report contained no recommendation, on the part of the Select Committee, to make the very material change in the terms of previous regulations alluded to by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon). Again, the draft Bill presented by Sir Henry Thring contained the very terms of the existing Act, which the hon. and gallant Member had referred to. How, then, did it happen that this very important change had been made in the Bill presented for the consideration of the Committee? This was not a single instance of the way this Bill had been prepared. There were many instances in which the Bill under consideration departed, very materially, from the Bill deliberated upon by the Committee; and as those alterations could not have been made in accordance with the views of the Select Committee, they must have been made in some other way since the Committee sat.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Select Committee did not go through the Bill in the same way as the Committee of the House would go through it. They simply knew that the Bill was introduced on the authority of the Government, and that it was hurriedly placed before them. He (Colonel Stanley), as was his duty, had introduced improvements in the language, when necessary.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to this point. A soldier might have been absent without leave for more than 21 days; a Court of Inquiry had been held and, according to the judgment of the court, it had been decided that he was a deserter, when, really, the man had fallen into the hands of the enemy. If, after his death, and the finding of the court which proclaimed him a deserter, evidence should be forthcoming, was there any means by which his memory could be cleared, and the claim of his relatives to his effects established? If not, would the right hon. and gallant Gentleman have any objection to the insertion of words in the Bill to meet this case? The effects of a soldier were, occasionally, very considerable, and unpaid balances, amounting to as much as £150 to £200, were, from time to time, advertised; and such amounts as these, unjustly forfeited in the case of men who were afterwards proved not to have deserted, would be matter of very considerable importance to their relatives. Some words ought, therefore, to be introduced to meet this case.

COLONEL STANLEY said, this was unnecessary, as provision already existed for dealing with cases of the kind referred to by the hon. Member for Dungarvan.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 71 (Confession by soldier of desertion or fraudulent enlistment).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the words "or Adjutant General" had been inserted in this clause under an entire misapprehension of the duties of this officer. The Adjutant General had no power of himself, being simply a Staff officer of the Commander-in-Chief, and in precisely the same position as Staff officer, General Officer, or adjutant of a regiment. If the Committee allowed it to remain in this clause, and all through the Bill, that the "Commander-in-Chief or Adjutant General" had power to do certain things, the word "or adjutant" would also have to be used in the same way when a commanding officer was spoken of; because commanding officers gave their orders through their adjutants. He thought it better that these words "or Adjutant General" should be omitted, and therefore moved that they be left out of the clause.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Adjutant General had distinct power, in the absence of the Commander-in-Chief, to act as his deputy; and, as a case in point, the Commander-in-Chief last year went to one of the foreign garrisons for a short time, during which the Adjutant General acted in that capacity. It had been thought safer, so far as concerned cases where the release of a prisoner or other matters which might have to come before a Civil Court were in question, to insert the words "or Adjutant General," which applied only to the Adjutant General in this country, and when the Commander-in-Chief was absent, or incapacitated from acting by illness; but not to any of his deputies.

MR. MUNTZ suggested that the words "or in his absence" should be inserted.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN thought the word "absence" could not be applied with correctness to the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief.

COLONEL STANLEY said, there was clearly some difficulty on this point, and he, therefore, preferred to retain the wording of the clause.

MR. O'DONNELL did not understand the reason for the words—

"Where a soldier signs a confession that he has been guilty of desertion or of fraudulent enlistment, a competent military authority may dispense with his trial and order that, instead of being tried by a court martial, he shall suffer the same forfeitures and the same deductions from pay (if any) as if he had been convicted by court martial of the said offence, or such of them as may be mentioned in the order."

Why should the soldier not be brought up before a court martial? Of course, when it was said that a competent military authority might dispense with the trial by court martial, the phrase did not mean much; but the appointment of these somewhat new authorities between the Commander-in-Chief and the soldier, who were responsible for representing a case in this or that light, was no good reason for not bringing the man before a court martial. The offence in question was a very serious one; and if the soldier signed a confession of guilt, why should not the record be taken by court martial?

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that this portion of the clause was inserted entirely in favour of the soldier, and its meaning, in his opinion, was perfectly clear. It enabled a man who had deserted to make a confession; and, at the same time, it allowed the competent military authority to dispense with trial and with the punishment which, on conviction, might be otherwise awarded to good men about to go abroad. But, although the trial was dispensed with, their effects were forfeited.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought the Secretary of State for War had, by his explanation, rendered the question relating to the Adjutant General more complicated than ever. The Adjutant General of the Army in India, and of any Presidency in India, would have the same authority as the Commander-in-Chief. He wished to point out that the explanation given by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, with reference to the power to the Adjutant General to act in the absence of the Commander-in-Chief, was quite inapplicable.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the words applied only to the Adjutant General in England.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out that the Adjutants General in India were specified in Clause 67.

MR. BIGGAR thought the best way of dealing with those men who confessed themselves guilty of desertion would be to institute a formal inquiry into the truth of their confession. It was well-known that many persons went to the police and said they were guilty of crimes of the gravest character; and the custom was to make inquiry, and formally bring the accused persons before the Court, when, if no corroboration of the charges were forthcoming, they fell to the ground, as a matter of course.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Provost Marshal.

Clause 72 (Appointment and powers of provost marshal).

COLONEL STANLEY desired to bring up a new clause dealing with the duties of the provost marshal, and which he trusted would meet with the approval of the Committee. Owing to the pressure of time this was not yet completed; and he, therefore, begged to move the postponement of the present clause.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE could not help expressing the opinion that it would have been more convenient had the right hon. and gallant Gentleman informed hon. Members who had taken part in the discussion upon the Bill, and especially those who had Amendments on the Paper, of his intention to postpone this clause. But, at the same time, by postponing the clause and making it more distinct, he would, doubtless, be doing that which most of the opponents of the Bill wished. The great objection to the clause was its vagueness. The Committee need not go beyond the first few lines to see how extremely vague and imperfect was the wording employed. And, moreover, the language in which the clause was now expressed differed a good deal from that made use of in the Articles of War. The object of the Amendment which he had intended to move was to restore the wording of the Articles of War, which was much less vague than that of the clause as it stood in the Bill. There had been a Question put to the Government the other day with reference to the flogging of some camp-followers at the time of the occupation of Cyprus; and that Question he would like again to put to the Government at a future date. Some camp-followers had been flogged in Cyprus at the occupation. Now, that, he believed, was not on active service, according to the definition recently given in the Committee. The words "military occupation of a foreign country" occurred in the Bill, and Cyprus was a foreign country; but the Government denied its military occupation. In the clause under discussion there were also the words "active service;" and his impression was, after having examined the subject as well as he could, that those words did not include the operations which had been carried on in Cyprus by our troops. If his view was right, he could not understand on what grounds camp-followers were flogged; and it was very important, he thought, that the Government should give the Committee some explanation on that point, for although some of the stories of flogging might not be true, there was no doubt that in many cases the power of inflicting that punishment had been abused. It was, in his opinion, necessary, therefore, that the clause should be watched by the Committee with the most jealous care. It was a clause which, for its vagueness, was more open to objection than almost any other clause in the Bill; and the Committee had a right, he thought, to complain of the suddenness with which it was proposed to postpone it.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he regretted as much as the hon. Baronet who had just sat down the shortness of the notice which he had given the Committee as to his intention to ask its assent to the postponement of the clause. The fact was, however, that the pressure of Business had made it physically impossible for him to lay the Amendments which he proposed to introduce into the clause on the Table that day.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had come down to the House for the purpose of suggesting the postponement of the clause, which was one to which he had the strongest objection. Such a clause, or anything resembling it, in its present shape could not, in his opinion, possibly receive the assent of the House of Commons. He spoke not without experience on the subject, because he had seen something of the action of provosts marshal in India. Some of the stories which he had heard connected with them might not, perhaps, bear examination; but he had always been disposed to look upon a provost marshal as a most mysterious person, whose powers and actions nobody knew anything about. He was generally, he believed, a non-commissioned officer of strong character and nerve, whose temper, naturally despotic, was controlled only by the rank of the person who happened to fall into his hands. Rank made a great difference in the way in which the duties of a provost marshal were carried out. If some poor and friendless man fell into his hands, he was apt to be very roughly and very severely treated. There was nothing, so far as he could see, to prevent the provost marshal from hanging him or flogging him—in short, from doing with him what he liked. On the other hand, if he had to deal with anyone of position in the Army, he would probably be more careful how he acted in his case. The truth was, that up to the present time—and it would be still more so under the operation of the clause now under discussion—the powers of a provost marshal amounted to nothing more or less than a despotism, tempered by the rank of the offender. He wished to take a practical view of the question, and he was perfectly prepared to say that it was necessary there should be some mode of dealing summarily and severely with offences committed when the Army was in the field. As matters stood, however, there was no alternative in such cases between the provost marshal and the very cumbrous machinery prescribed by military law of a court martial, to which it was impossible to have recourse always when the troops were on active service. It appeared to him that it would be far better to confer the power of summary punishment, now possessed by the provost marshal, on some tribunal in the nature of a drum-head court martial. He at first thought that a tribunal of that kind would be established under the operation of Clause 49; but he afterwards found that that clause had reference only to general field courts martial, which would only deal with the more serious class of offences, and the sentences of which must be referred, for confirmation, to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, who might be at a distance from the spot, and who might, therefore, find it impossible to deal with petty cases. But, be that as it might, there was no tribunal for the purpose of punishing summarily petty offences, committed against the peaceable inhabitants of a country in which troops happened to be marching, except the provost marshal; and it was out of all question, he thought, to suppose that the Committee would consent to give him the enormous powers which the clause would confer upon him. Knowing well that the clause had been considered by very competent persons, he was unwilling to repeat what he heard said by several hon. Members, that it was very badly drawn. In that respect, he entirely concurred in the remarks which had been made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke). There were one or two points in the clause to which he wished especially to call the attention of the Committee; and it was all the more desirable that they should be mentioned, as the clause was about to be postponed, with the view to its re-introduction in an amended form. As it now stood, the powers given to the provost marshal could be put in force only in those cases in which he happened to detect a person, and himself to see him, "in the actual commission of any offence." That was the theory; but how did that theory operate in practice? It was impossible that the provost marshal, who was only one man, could see with his own eyes everything that was going on in the Army. There were, however, other words in the clause by which the provision to which he was referring was very materially varied. If hon. Members would look at the last part of the clause, they would see the words—

"The provost marshal or his assistant has seen the offender committing the act for which summary punishment is inflicted."

But, although he had looked very carefully over the Bill, he could not find a single syllable to explain who the "assistant" was to be. There was no such person mentioned in the Definition Clause; and he should feel it to be his duty to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, when the clause again came before the Committee in its amended shape, who were to be the assistants of the provosts marshal, and whether it would be in the power of a provost marshal to appoint anyone whom he might choose as his assistant, and accept his statement as to an offence having been committed? As regarded the character of the jurisdiction which a provost marshal was to have, and the rules under which he was to act, he could find nothing more definite in the clause than the words, "usages of war, and rules of the Service." Now, it was very difficult to find out what "the usages of war" were; indeed, no one could exactly tell. But there was a more important point still, to which he wished to direct the attention of the Committee. No mention was made in the clause of the character of the punishment which might be inflicted by a provost marshal. For anything he could see to the contrary, he would have power to hang a man by the neck, or torture him, or flog him, for any offence which he might see him commit. He should be glad to know, therefore, whether there was to be any definition of the punishment which might be inflicted by a provost marshal contained in the Bill, or whether there was to be any regulation made on the subject? He would not detain the Committee further, although there were several other points to which he should like to have referred. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would, he thought, find it impossible to induce the Committee to pass the clause in anything near its present shape; and he would again suggest the necessity which existed for supplementing the action of the provost marshal by some power enabling a tribunal, in the nature of a drum-head court martial, consisting of two or three officers, to deal summarily with offences committed in the field.

MAJOR NOLAN thought that some of the objections which had been raised by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down against the clause might be met by introducing into the Bill a provision that corporal punishment should be inflicted only by order of a general court martial. He had been ruled out of Order when, on Clause 44, relating to corporal punishment, he had endeavoured to deal with the point. Discussion on the subject had, he might add, been eluded by the Government time after time, and the Committee ought, he maintained, to insist on their placing their new clause on the Table without further delay; because, if the Secretary of State for War were allowed to go through the Bill, reserving clauses which raised difficult questions as it proceeded, the result would be that the flogging question would be postponed until the House was fagged and weary of the Bill, and that no adequate opportunity of discussing the proposals of the Government would be afforded. Hon. Members, who were opposed to giving the provost marshal the power of flogging, were placed at a very great disadvantage by the course which the Government intended to pursue. They would not know when the question was to come on for discussion, and would be unable to take council together, as they ought to have the opportunity of doing. He was rather in favour of the proposal of the Government, in the earlier part of the day, to postpone another important clause—Clause 69—which conferred the power on Her Majesty to make fresh Articles of War. That clause dealt with the whole question of the powers of procedure of courts martial, and was intimately connected with the question of drum-head courts martial, to which the attention of the Committee had just been directed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). But his principal object in rising was to point out to the Committee that it appeared to be the intention of the Government to pass a number of clauses of minor importance now, and to postpone the more important clauses to a later period, when they would, perhaps, try to push them through the House in one night. The

Sir George Campbell

Committee was not, in his opinion, being properly treated by the Government, who might, he thought, on the previous evening, have made up their minds to lay on the Table the new clause which they meant to propose. They might have announced what it was they intended to do; and he would now put a simple question to the Secretary of State for War. It was, whether he did or did not intend that flogging might be inflicted under the operation of the amended clause, without the intervention of a court martial? That was the practical situation in which the Committee was placed, so far as the question of flogging was concerned. With one important exception, such a case as that of a provost marshal inflicting capital punishment, had never come under his notice. No such punishment had, he believed, been inflicted within the last 50 or 60 years, at any rate, on a European soldier; although cases of the kind might have come under the notice of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) during the Indian Mutiny, when, no doubt, a very large number of persons were executed; but whether by order of the provost marshal, or simply by the order of the commanding officer, he could not say. Putting aside the exceptional case of the Indian Mutiny, the real question before the Committee was, whether a provost marshal was to be entitled to inflict the punishment of flogging or not without the interference of a court martial? If that power was to be given to the provost marshal, the concession which had been made by the Government on the subject of flogging was of very little use. Indeed, for his own part, he did not attach much importance to that concession, and the reduction of the number of lashes to 25, except in so far as it served to show that the opinion of the House of Commons was against flogging our soldiers, and that it was determined to give effect to that opinion as far as possible. If the provost marshal could be prevented from inflicting corporal punishment without the sanction of some sort of court martial, then a great step would be gained. The matter was of vital importance to the future of the Army; and he hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be able to give a satisfactory answer with respect to it.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that what he had already stated was the simple fact—namely, that the pressure of Business had prevented him from placing the amended clause on the Table. There had, in the previous week, been a long discussion, in which he was obliged to take part, on the Army Estimates, and on the succeeding days he had spent the greater portion of his time—except on Wednesday—in the House, trying to pass the present Bill through Committee. There were, besides, some three points on which he wished to take the opinion of persons whose advice would, he thought, be valuable, and he was anxious to have an opportunity of revising the clause. That was how the matter stood, and he hoped to be able to lay the amended clause on the Table of the House on Thursday. Under those circumstances, he should be glad if the Committee would assent to the postponement of the present clause; and he would leave them to judge of the merits of the new one when it was brought before them.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he did not think there was anything like an intention to obstruct the passing of the Bill on the part of several hon. Members who objected to the course which the Government proposed to take. There appeared to him to be great force in what had been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). Hon. Members had been brought down to the House that afternoon to discuss, among other clauses of the Bill, especially the very important one which it was now sought to postpone, and that without Notice. Now, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman had pointed out, the result of such a mode of proceeding would be that some of the most important questions involved in the Bill would be put off to a period of the Session when the attendance of Members was usually thin, and when they would not be likely to receive that consideration which their importance demanded. For his own part, he would venture to suggest, if he might do so without offending the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), the desirability of postponing the further consideration of the Bill itself. ["No, no!"] That might not be the view of those hon. Members who interrupted him; but it was quite clear that the Bill was very unpopular. Nothing, he might add, could well be more painful than to see hon. and gallant Gentlemen squabbling, as they did the other day, over questions which had been raised in the course of the discussion of the measure by other hon. and gallant Gentlemen on some of its provisions. What must civilians think when they witnessed such a state of things? They could hardly avoid coming to the conclusion that the military Members of the House had themselves never read the Bill. He wished also to point out that a new Schedule of offences for which flogging might be inflicted, which the Government had promised should be laid on the Table, had never been produced. He could not help saying, in conclusion, that to discuss, in the month of June, matters which were of comparatively small importance, while questions of considerable importance were postponed, was a mode of proceeding which was hardly fair or just to those hon. Members who took an interest in the subject, and who had come down to the House that afternoon with the view of discussing a most important provision of the Bill, or hardly creditable to the Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT could assure the right hon. Baronet that nothing that he had said had offended him in the slightest degree. He, however, altogether objected to the jaunty way in which the right hon. Baronet, who had just come down to the House, proposed to postpone the consideration of the Bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that when he came down to the House the hon. and learned Gentleman himself was not in his place; for, although he had taken particular pains to ascertain whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was in the House, he could see him nowhere.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had gone into the Lobby, but only for a few minutes, on business; but he could assure the right hon. Baronet that, notwithstanding the great disadvantage of his absence, the Committee had passed 21 clauses on the previous evening. If, unfortunately, he were to absent himself again, they might pass 21 clauses more. But if the right hon. Baronet really desired to postpone the consideration of the Bill altogether, he could not understand why he should be so indignant at the proposal to postpone a single clause. That was a proposal which, at all events, went, to some extent, in the direction which the right hon. Baronet seemed to desire. It was surely, therefore, entitled to some sympathy from him, although it did not go the whole length which he wished. But he would ask the right hon. Baronet, or any other Member of the Committee, whether he seriously meant to persist in going on with a clause which the Government proposed to postpone? It was obviously impossible to go on with it under those circumstances. A horse might be brought to the water, but it could not be made to drink; and it would not, he thought, be possible to compel the Government to proceed with the clause, if they wanted to postpone it. On the whole, the best thing, in his opinion, which the Committee could do, was to go on with the discussion of the next clause.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he wished to point out to the hon. and gallant Member for Oxford—[Cries of "learned"] —well, the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, who must have an element of gallantry about him, from the position he had taken up in connection with the Bill—that the clause under discussion was not the only clause which had been postponed that afternoon. Clause 69 had also been postponed, a fact of which he was aware, although the hon. and learned Gentleman did not seem to be cognizant of it, owing to his being absent from the House.

MR. HOPWOOD, while admitting that the time of the Secretary of State for War was very much occupied in the House, said, he must enter his protest against that circumstance being taken as a sufficient excuse for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman not having fulfilled the pledges which had been given to the Committee. The fact was that the Government had put the Bill down on the Paper for discussion on every conceivable opportunity which offered itself, and hon. Members were kept in the House, early and late, for the purpose of making progress with it. If, however, a day were now and then allowed to intervene between the discussions in Committee, the Government would have time to consider the very important points which were raised, and they would be better able to keep their promises. That was a course which, in his opinion, ought to be more agreeable to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself than to have to postpone clauses in the face of such remarks as the mode of proceeding adopted had called forth that afternoon. He, for one, had come down to the House prepared to discuss the clause. ["Oh, oh!"] Those voices, so far as he was aware, were very seldom raised in the discussions on the Bill with a view to its improvement. Indeed, scarcely any of those hon. Gentlemen who interrupted him had, he believed, been heard to speak in any articulate fashion throughout those discussions. He was not disposed, in any way, to offer a factious opposition to the proposals made by the Secretary of State for War; but he would urge upon him the propriety of not putting the Bill down day after day on the Notice Paper, unless he was prepared to give the Committee the information for which they asked, and with which he himself had admitted it was but reasonable they should be supplied. He would remind the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that he had not yet laid upon the Table the Schedule which he had promised to produce; but he could assure him, on the part of those who sat around him (Mr. Hopwood), that the spectre of flogging would haunt him to the last, unless he was prepared to lay it by proper and judicious concessions.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Committee were placed in this difficulty—that although the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War might lay his amended clause on the Table of the House on Thursday, it could not be discussed, except as a postponed clause, after the other clauses and the Schedules had been disposed of. The Committee was likely, he thought, to be somewhat deluded by the proposal of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; for, in his opinion, the clause might as well have been postponed till next month, for there was not the least probability that the Bill would pass through during what remained of the month of June. There ought, he contended, to be no difficulty, on the part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in stating whether it was his intention that the provost marshal should still retain the power of flogging?

He could only say, for himself, that when he supported the Government in their desire to retain the power of flogging in the Army in time of war, he believed the punishment to be one which could only be inflicted by order of a court martial, and was quite ignorant that it might be in the power of a non-commissioned officer, or a person in the position of a provost marshal, to flog anyone. It would appear, from what had been said by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), who spoke with a long experience of India, that men were sometimes hanged by order of the provost marshal. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: I said a provost marshal had the power to hang.] Surely, then, the Committee ought not to assent to the postponement of the clause until they were informed that the principle was accepted by the Government, that the provost marshal should be obliged to refer for consideration to a court martial before corporal punishment could be inflicted on an offender. If some such explanation were not given on the part of the Government, some hon. Member would, he hoped, move to report Progress. Indeed, if no other hon. Member did, he himself would be prepared to make that Motion.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had expressed the opinion that the Committee could not proceed with the discussion of the clause if the Government wished to postpone it. He would, however, respectfully point out that the clause was in the hands of the Committee; and it was monstrous, he maintained, to suppose that the Committee could not proceed with the Business before it, except by the favour, or with the consent, of the Government. That, however, was the proposition which the hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to have laid down, and it was one against which he (Mr. O'Connor Power) most strongly protested.

MR. O'DONNELL said, it was quite clear the Government had no justification for the course which they asked the Committee to adopt. They must have made up their minds as to whether they intended to give the provost marshal the power of inflicting corporal punishment or not. If they had made up their minds, they ought not to keep their intentions with regard to the matter from the knowledge of the Committee. The Government knew very well that so long as a large portion of the Bill remained to be passed a certain amount of hindrance as to its progress remained in the hands of the Committee; and they wished, therefore, to dispose of all those clauses which were not of the very first importance, in order that they might be able, on some future occasion, by the fidelity of their supporters, to rush the important clauses through Committee, repeating, perhaps, that feat of strength and endurance which was displayed, a year or two ago, in the case of the South African Bill—a measure, he might observe, which had since produced such very uncomfortable consequences, even for the Members of the Government themselves. All those hon. Members who were opposed to the punishment of flogging had made up their minds that there was not the smallest reason why they should yield to the Government on that particular point. Public opinion was on their side; the Army was on their side; a majority of the Members of that House were, he believed, against flogging. Theirs, in short, was the popular view on the question, although there might be in the Army a few wretched flunkies in a regiment who, from a desire to curry favour with their officers, declared themselves as supporters of the present system. Every soldier, however, who was ready honestly to do his duty to his Queen and to his country, objected, in the strongest manner, to the degrading punishment of flogging. It was a question, too, in which the civil population of this country were greatly interested. The treatment of every camp-follower was a matter which was in the hands of the Committee at that very moment; and the Government must have received abundant information from their Friends who sat behind them that there was no question on which a verdict unfavourable to them was more likely to be pronounced by the country than the question of flogging. The country did not like flogging, even by court martial; and was thoroughly opposed to the infliction of corporal punishment by a provost marshal. The Government might say that they had not got official information on many points; indeed, he had never heard, nor had he supposed had the oldest Member of that House ever heard, of a Government who appeared to be so constantly devoid of official information. But, although they might have no official information on the subject, they must be aware that flogging was going on right and left in South Africa; and although Lord Chelmsford might have informed them that he could not expect to conquer the enemy except by means of a well-flogged Army, those Members of the House who were opposed to flogging were determined that, so far as lay in their power, he should be compelled to resort to some other means. He had come down to the House that afternoon to oppose this flogging clause, and to hear what was the policy of the Government with regard to the matter; if, indeed, they had a policy. The clause was one of the most important in the Bill; and if it was postponed it was, in his opinion, absolutely necessary that the rest of the clauses should be postponed also. He had no hesitation in saying, no shame in telling the Government, that he should do everything in his power to oppose the passing of the remaining clauses if that under discussion was postponed, without some satisfactory explanation from the Government as to what their intentions were with regard to flogging. He perfectly well knew that the opportunity was a golden one for gaining favour with the public out-of-doors. He had had no such opportunity for a long time, and he was not, therefore, disposed to miss it. He should like to hear from his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) whether he meant to persevere in his threatened opposition to the proposal for postponing the clause? If not, he himself should move that the Chairman be ordered to report Progress. But he felt satisfied his hon. Friend would carry out what he had declared to be his intention. The Irish Members were determined to prove the sympathy which they had with the soldier on so important a question as that of flogging; nor would they, out of any feeling of consideration for Her Majesty's Government, retreat for a single instant from the position on the question which they had taken up.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS did not think the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down really meant all that he had said in the course of the remarks which he had just addressed to the Committee. He did not suppose that the hon. Gentleman wished the impression to be conveyed out-of-doors that he intended to stop the progress of the Bill by every means in his power. As the clause under discussion now stood, considerable objection was raised to the power which it would confer on the provost marshal; and all that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War proposed to do was to take back the clause to see whether it could not be amended, and presented again to the Committee in a form which would be more convenient and more acceptable to them. He could conceive no more proper course to adopt; and he would remind the Committee that, as the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had very justly pointed out, it would be impossible for the Committee to discuss the clause satisfactorily if the Government were of opinion that it ought to be postponed. The hon. and learned Member did not mean to argue, as the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) seemed to suppose, that the Committee could not, if they pleased, refuse to accede to the proposal to postpone the clause; but that they could not discuss it, with any prospect of coming to a reasonable decision upon it, when it was the wish of the Government that it should be brought up on a future occasion in an amended shape. The remaining clauses of the Bill would not be affected by the postponement of that which was before the Committee; and he hoped the Committee would set their face against the unusual course of attempting to prevent the Government from postponing a clause in a Bill which was a Government measure, and which they thought ought to be postponed.

MR. RYLANDS said, that so far as he was concerned, he should not feel himself justified in refusing to permit the Government to postpone a clause which it was not, in their opinion, desirable that the Committee should at once proceed to discuss. He thought, however, the Committee had great reason to complain of the course which had been pursued by the Government on the present occasion. The clause which it was proposed to postpone was one of the most important clauses in a Bill which was itself the result of very serious deliberations, partly of a Select Committee, which was presided over by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). The Bill was drawn by the Government draftsman, and put through some sort of War Office crucible, out of which this precious piece of legislation came in the form in which it had been presented to the House. Yet the Committee were told that afternoon that it was necessary to postpone one of the most important clauses of the Bill, because, notwithstanding all the preliminary manipulation to which it had been subjected, it required to be altered so that it might have some chance of being accepted by the Committee. The discussion, he might add, was satisfactory, at all events, in one respect—that it showed that the Government were alive to the fact that the clause needed amendment, and that a considerable change must be made in it before it was agreed to. As to Parliamentary practice, he could only say that he recollected very well that when the Ballot Bill was passing through the House, and when the Government of that day desired to postpone some of the clauses, hon. Gentlemen opposite, and even some right hon. Gentlemen who now occupied seats on the Treasury Bench, objected to that course being taken, with a view of obstructing the passing of the Bill. He had no wish to obstruct the passing of the present Bill; and, therefore, he would not vote against the postponement of the clause, although he thought it hardly fair to postpone it, under all the circumstances of the case. He hoped, he might add, that some of his hon. Friends near him would not carry out what they had announced to be their intention—to oppose the further progress of the Bill that afternoon, because to do so might result in involving the Committee in an unseemly struggle.

MR. OTWAY could not see that there was any valid objection to the postponement of the clause; but an appeal had been made to the Government which appeared to him to be of a most reasonable character, and to which they ought, he thought, to give a more satisfactory answer than he had yet heard. The Bill contained, in his opinion, a great deal that was good, and he had no desire to impede its progress through the House. It had, however, one blemish, which several hon. Members had been endeavouring up to the present time, but not quite effectually, to remove. There was, at the same time, no good reason why they should not avail themselves of every legitimate opportunity to discuss the question of flogging; and it was only fair to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War whether he had determined upon the principle on which flogging should be inflicted under the operation of the clause? As he understood the matter, those hon. Members who objected to the postponement of the clause would not be disposed to persevere in that course if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would inform them that it was his intention that corporal punishment should not be inflicted except by order of a court martial. He understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to have declined to answer the appeal which had been made to him in that respect, on the ground that to do so might lead to discussion; but there would be no need for further discussion, if he would merely state the principle on which it was proposed that the new clause should be based. He hoped it was a misapprehension to suppose that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's object in wishing to postpone the clause was in order that he might make more stringent still the rules relating to the infliction of corporal punishment. But so erroneous, he felt satisfied, was that supposition, that he was astonished the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not seen the expediency, in his own interest, of responding to the appeal which had been made to him. He understood the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) to have distinctly asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman on what principle the new clause was to be founded?

COLONEL STANLEY thought that the appeal was a very fair one; but he must, at the same time, guard himself against being led into a discussion of a clause which was not before the Committee. Such a discussion would, in the first place, be out of Order; and would, in the second place, be highly inconvenient. The powers of the provost marshal were very unlimited; but he had, of course, proposed to limit them, to a great extent, by regulation. The discussions, however, which had taken place in that House had satisfied him that it would be possible to print many things in the Bill itself which he had intended should be the subject of regulation. Without, then, absolutely doing away with the power to inflict corporal punishment under the operation of the clause, he would endeavour to introduce words into the clause preventing its infliction except for the most serious crimes; and a list of those he proposed, as he had promised the Committee the other day, to insert in a Schedule. He would define the circumstances under which corporal punishment might be inflicted, and would endeavour, in other ways, to restrict its application very considerably. He was unable to say more at the present moment. The time of the Committee would, he thought, be saved by postponing the clause, and by the production, in its stead, of a clause which would be more acceptable to them. When that clause was before the Committee, it would be for them to consider what modifications, if any, it required. He hoped the Committee would now allow the clause to be postponed without further debate.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had made, earlier in the discussion, some such explanation as that which he had just now offered to the Committee, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) should not have so strongly objected to the postponement of the clause. He had been under the impression that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was about to continue in the hands of the provost marshal the power of inflicting corporal punishment whenever he pleased; and if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had only at once stated, in reply to the very humble appeals which had been made to him, that that was not his intention, much of the discussion might have been avoided, and much of the time of the Committee saved. It was in vain the Fowler spread the net in the sight of any bird; and hon. Members had so often been taken in by the postponement of clauses that they were not likely to fall into the same snare again. He was glad the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had said what he had just told the Committee, and he should offer no further opposition to the postponement of the clause.

Colonel Stanley

MAJOR NOLAN insisted upon the necessity of a correct record being kept of the punishments inflicted by the provost marshal.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to say that, after the explanation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he would not persevere in his opposition to the postponement of the clause.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER should offer no further objection to the postponement of the clause; but need hardly say that, had it not been for the explanation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he should have felt it his duty to move that the Chairman report Progress.

Clause, by leave, postponed.

PART II.

ENLISTMENT.

Period of Service.

Clause 73 (Period of Service).

MR. CHARLEY moved, in page 40, line 32, to leave out "twelve," and insert "twenty." The hon. and learned Gentleman said, he was entirely opposed to the short-service system of Lord Cardwell, which had proved an utter failure. It had given us an Army of boys, instead of an Army of men. It was pitiable to read the accounts of these boys being matched against able-bodied Zulus. Before 1847, recruits might be enlisted for life—practically for 21 years. Various changes had been made since then. The object of his Amendment was to enable Her Majesty, if it were deemed desirable, to enlist men for 20, instead of only for 12 years. One result of the short-service system was that the raw material out of which non-commissioned officers were made was, at the present moment, very deficient in the Army. Boys, too, such as those who now enlisted in the Army, were very apt to run away to avoid punishment for petty offences, and desertion was prevalent. In those circumstances, it was, he thought, extremely desirable that there should be some inquiry as to whether it would not be desirable to return to the long-service system. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who had charge of the Bill, had given Notice, a few days before, of the appointment of a Committee to consider, among other things, if he understood rightly, the question of short service; and he rather inferred, from some observations made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman on that occasion, that he, himself, was in favour of the short-service system. He was sorry that that should be so; but if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would give him some assurance that the question of the expediency of a return to long service would receive adequate consideration from the Committee to which he alluded, he should not press his Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Committee would adhere to the word "twelve." He was in the position, at the present moment, that he could not discuss the question which was raised by the Amendment. There was an important Committee now sitting, who had that very question before them. That Committee was composed of men of very great experience and distinction, whose duty it was, unfettered by any prejudices in the matter, to examine seriously into the advantages and disadvantages of the various periods of service. He, therefore, could not agree to the Amendment, if for no other reason than because of the position which he occupied in that House, and because any opinion which he might express upon it might be represented, rightly or wrongly, as having an influence on the decision of that Committee on an important question which had been submitted to their consideration. He must, therefore, appeal to his hon. and learned Friend not to press the Amendment.

MR. CHARLEY said, he had no wish to press the Amendment, after the explanation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman.

MAJOR NOLAN thought they were too much in the habit, in this country, of not paying sufficient attention to what was going on in the great Continental Armies in connection with the question which was raised by the Amendment. They, he would point out to the Committee, had gone entirely in the direction of short service. The error which they committed was, that when they got a boy of 18 or 19 who did not know his own value, who was picked out of the gutter, and who could not earn anything, to enter the Service, they imagined that he might be kept in the Army for a great number of years, receiving only the same rate of pay as when he first joined it. That a boy enlisted at that age should be bound to remain in the Army for a period of 21 years on such terms was, he thought, a most unfair proposal. What would be said of a manufacturer who, having engaged such a boy for 6*d.* a-day, should refuse, five or six years after, when the value of his services had greatly increased, to give him higher wages, and who would keep him on in his employment for 20 years, still giving him the remuneration of only 6*d.* a-day? A soldier, he might add, after eight or ten years' service, might re-engage himself for nine years more, making a total of 21 years' service; and he entirely denied the accuracy of the hon. and learned Member for Salford's (Mr. Charley) view, that, in order to secure good non-commissioned officers, it was necessary to have recourse to enlistment for 20 years. On the Continent they did not pay their non-commissioned officer for remaining in the Service. In the German Army a man only remained three years in the Army, and then was put in the Reserve. It was quite useless for him to struggle with hon. Gentlemen opposite in endeavouring to express his views to the Committee, if they insisted on talking. He thought that men ought only to remain about four years in the Army, and four years more in the Reserve. What was wanted in the British Army was a better Reserve. If a man were enlisted for 20 years, it was quite obvious that by keeping him in the ranks for that period the Reserve suffered. Viscount Cardwell's system, if pushed to its legitimate conclusion, would produce an addition of 100,000 men to the Reserve. He wished to point out that Viscount Cardwell's system was not carried far enough, and to that fact was due the evils he had spoken of. All the evils at present existing were said to be owing to short service; but he thought that they were really owing to their not having followed the Continental system in one important point. When they introduced the short-service system they ought to have gone a step further. At present, they chiefly enlisted boys; whereas on the Continent they did not enlist under the age of 20 or 21. So long as the military authorities of this country insisted on enlisting at the age of 17 or 18, they would find the Army crowded with boys; but that was not owing to the short-service system. The Army was crowded with boys, because they insisted on enlisting them instead of waiting until they were of a proper age. So long as they enlisted lads of 18 or 19, and kept them only three or four years, and did not allow any man under 20 to go out to India, so long would the Army in England be found to be crowded with boys. If they had too many boys, it was simply because they did not enlist at the proper age, and not because they were following the Continental system. In point of fact, they did not follow the Continental system, because on the Continent they enlisted at a proper and reasonable age. He must apologize for troubling the Committee at the length he had; but, owing to the very interesting conversation on the opposite side of the House, to which he had been compelled to listen, he had not been able to express his views as shortly as he could have wished.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER remarked, that if there were a disposition, as there appeared to be, on the part of hon. Members on the other side of the House not to discuss the Bill on that occasion, the proper thing to do would be to report Progress. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway had no desire to force his views upon the Committee; but he was glad that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made the speech he had just delivered; because the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he was afraid, was inclined to yield to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), who had urged upon him a very re-actionary policy in respect to long service. He was entirely opposed to long service, and considered that 12 years was quite long enough. As had been pointed out by his hon. and gallant Friend, the reason why the Army was now crowded with boys was that they enlisted youths before they were old enough to enter the ranks of the Army. There was another very serious objection to the acceptance of the Amendment; for what did it amount to? It amounted to this—that they sought to force a man to remain in a Service which was disagreeable and irksome to him. A man might gain eight or nine years' experience of the Army, and then should be able to determine whether he would follow it the whole of his life, or would retire. He thought that the change which had been made in the direction of short service was highly beneficial; and he trusted that no step in a contrary direction would be taken.

MR. O'DONNELL had expected that upon this clause they would have had some general and useful discussion by the military authorities of the House. The only reason which had been given them for postponing a previous clause was that they should be enabled to discuss it in a more full and perfect manner at another period. This was a clause of the first importance, concerning, as it did, in a most vital degree, the efficiency of the Army. It was, indeed, a matter of such importance that a Select Committee had been appointed to deal with it. He thought, therefore, that they might have expected that the Committee would have given as much aid as possible in its discussion. There had, however, been a very distinct impression, from the conduct of hon. Members opposite, that they wished this clause to be passed without any discussion. If the Government could not afford time to discuss a Bill of this magnitude, they should not have brought it in. Questions of the greatest moment were laid before the Committee; but if hon. Members presumed to discuss them, feelings of very great impatience were exhibited on the other side of the House. He must emphatically protest against the marked discourtesy exhibited by some supporters of the Government during the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. The hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had urged upon the Government to do away with short service. It seemed to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War might have pointed out, as the hon. and gallant Member for Galway had done, that short service was not responsible for the evils which were now complained of. The real evil was that the military authorities admitted boys into the ranks, instead of enlisting more hardy men. He believed that it was altogether a wrong principle to go upon, to enlist men for a service of 12 years, which was facetiously called short service. If the Government wished to introduce a more soldierly class in the Army, they ought to offer better inducements than at present. When the Government asked men to enter for 12 years into the Army and Reserves, they ought to hold out some better prospect than they did at present. That prospect ought to be improved in two ways. There ought to be a better future for a man in the Army, and out of the Army. There ought to be a better prospect of promotion for soldiers in the Army, and old soldiers ought to have a better prospect in civil life when they left it. Committee after Committee had recommended that retired soldiers should have a better prospect of employment in the Civil Service opened to them; but these representations had been consistently disregarded. If the Government wished to find out why our soldiers were different from those of foreign countries, they would ascertain that they were given no superiority over other candidates for employment in the Civil Service after leaving the Army. Much good would be done if they made service in the Army a recommendation for after employment. There ought, also, to be more prospect of promotion for a deserving soldier than existed at present. It was a positive scandal, at present, the number of obstacles that were put in the way of promotion from the ranks of the Army. It ought to be the object of the Government, if they wished to make the Army popular, to give more facilities for obtaining promotion. Several hon. Members had received numerous letters from soldiers of long-standing, and also from such commissioned officers as quartermasters, complaining of the ridiculous character of the promotion now open to deserving soldiers. There was hardly a commissioned rank open to a deserving soldier but that of quartermaster, where he could get no rise at all, and was shelved for his natural life. It must be the wish of everyone to bring about a time when our Army would be able to compare itself with Continental Armies, and that could never be done until the same facilities were given with regard to the promotion of deserving soldiers as existed in Continental Armies. It was not only a case of justice to deserving soldiers, but many instances could be adduced to show they required more experienced men in the position of officers than they had at present. They would never have a due proportion of experienced men as officers, so long as they confined officers to the class obtaining first commissions. A much larger number of soldiers ought to be allowed to serve the Queen as commissioned officers than was now the case. The effect upon the Army would be very great if better prospects were open to the deserving soldier, both during his continuance in the Army and after his retirement.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 74 (Terms of original enlistment).

MAJOR NOLAN hoped that the 1st sub-section of this clause would not be that upon which enlistment was usually made, but that the 2nd sub-section would be usually acted upon. The distinction was this—they had now got into a totally different stratum of the Bill from what they had previously been considering. They had hitherto been discussing judicial questions; but now they came to consider questions of administration. He hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not yield to the pressure that had been brought to bear upon him from outside to induce him to enlist for a long period of service in the Army, but would enlist partly for service in the Army, and partly for service in the Reserve. A great deal of pressure had been put upon the Government to revert, wholly or in part, to the old long-service system. He believed that no greater mistake could be made than to do that. What they had to look to was the possible contingency of a great war; and, in that event, their chief dependence must be upon the Reserve. If the long-service system were reverted to, they would have no Reserve; and a great portion of the money which had been spent upon the Army would be absolutely wasted. Under the 1st sub-section of this clause the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War could enlist men for 12 years in the Army. He strongly hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not revert to the old system, and take men only for service in the Army. He thought it necessary to tender this advice to the Government, as he found exactly the opposite was being given them from other quarters.

COLONEL STANLEY had no hesitation in answering the question which which had been put to him, and in stating that his opinion was in favour of service in the Reserve following short service. As to the precise term of service in the Army, that was another question. As regarded any alteration in the clause to which attention had been drawn, it was done with the view of removing any doubts under the existing Enlistment Act, and to meet the case of men extending their service to India. It was found inconvenient to send men to India with very short services. Some years ago the House passed a Resolution that a man under a certain age should not be sent to India. Great difficulty was sometimes experienced in filling up drafts for India; and the authorities there complained that the men sent were under too short a term of service. If the hon. and gallant Member for Galway would ask him a question on this subject at another time, he would then be able to show him how slight the effect of this clause would be in allowing a man to extend his period of service in the Army two years longer. At the same time, it had been held that the extension of two years' service would have a good practical effect upon the Army in India. The 1st sub-section was necessary for the purpose of meeting some cases. A man might enlist whom it was desirable to send at once into the Reserve. They did not want to enlist for the purpose of filling up the Army; but they only wanted some men who had gone through the Army, but had left it, to have a short service, perhaps, for half-a-year, in the Army, and then to pass into the Reserve. A power of that kind would meet the case of men who, for private reasons, had left the Army by buying themselves out, and wanted to return to it again. It was for reasons such as that, that it was desirable to allow the Secretary of State for War to alter the terms of services.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL rose to express his regret that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had committed himself to an opinion in favour of short service only while the subject was before a competent Commission.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had expressed an opinion in favour of a short term of service, followed by service in the Reserve.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought it should be recollected that our Army was not like a Continental Army, and that a very different state of things existed here to that on the Continent. It was absolutely necessary that there should be a very large number of men under long service in our Army, for the purpose of undertaking service in India and the Colonies.

MR. O'DONNELL was of opinion that it would be better if there was a distinct enlistment for service in India. He had consulted a good many Indian authorities; and he believed that the present system by which the Army was drafted for service in India resulted in injury to the Army and in enormously increasing the expenditure. The much cheaper and better plan would be to have a distinct enlistment for service in the Indian Army, or the institution of an Indian Army, such as had existed before the present system came into operation.

LORD ELCHO disclaimed any intention of acting discourteously to hon. Members; but he did not think they had any title to complain of not being listened to. The questions which had been discussed were very large ones, and he thought that the proper time to debate them was not upon this Bill, but rather upon the first Vote for the Reserves on the Army Estimates. Then was the proper time for going into these matters; and he should reserve what remarks he had to make upon the subject until that occasion. It seemed to him that the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had not chosen the proper time to introduce the question he had. He objected to its being supposed that everyone was bound to listen to hon. Members when they chose to address the House; and whenever he perceived that anything like obstruction was going on he simply talked to his Friends, in order to express his disapproval of the proceedings.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE suggested that the discussion of the clause should be postponed.

MR. O'DONNELL hoped note would be taken of the avowal which a distinguished supporter of the Government, who had just sat down, had made. He had avowed that when a political oppoment differed from him in the views he took of a certain Bill, and when he rose to express an opinion on the subject, he was to be prevented giving his opinion as to the opportuneness of the measure by ostentatiously loud remarks made on the opposite side of the House. He did not think a less worthy avowal had been made in Committee for a long time; and he only hoped that very few hon. Members on his side of the House would take that conduct as a pattern. He regretted to observe that there had been no apparent haste on the part of Members of the Government to disavow the conduct of their supporters. If that disavowal was not made, they must take it as an indication that the Government approved of loud conversation on private affairs as one of the legitimate forms of conducting the Business of the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT entirely agreed that this was not the proper place for the discussion of this point. The hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had thrown the ball over to that side in order that it might be returned. These enlistment clauses were only put in as consolidation clauses; and, certainly, he was sorry to see them in this Bill at all. This Bill was called the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill; but it was, practically, two Bills. One part was a Discipline Bill, and the other part was a Regulation Bill. If they had not the enlistment clauses, they would get rid of half the clauses of this Bill. Were they to go into a long talk on these clauses, why there was hardly anything that could not be brought into a discussion on this Bill; and the House must come to some determination as to the ensuing clauses, whether they meant to discuss them in detail, and the whole question of the principles of enlistment in the British Army. If so, it was turning this Bill into a discussion on the Estimates.

LORD ELCHO said, he only wished to ask a question. Yesterday he asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, whether he would bring on the Army Estimates at such a time that his hon. Friends opposite could bring forward their Motions in going into Committee, rather than in Committee? His right hon. and gallant Friend did not hear his question distinctly, and did not give the answer which showed the spirit which animated him.

COLONEL MURE said, his object was to call attention to the state of the Army in Zululand, and not to raise the question of the condition of the Army generally. Since then, they were aware that a Committee had been appointed to inquire into this question; and it was at the suggestion not only of military men outside the House, but others inside the House, that he withdrew the Motion from the Paper. He had felt that it would not be convenient, perhaps unfair, to the Committee that there should be a discussion in that House. As to the question of enlistment, they were divided into two camps. His impression was that short service, as it at present existed, would not answer. It was felt that it would not be a good thing to go into the matter with a Committee about to sit on the question; and, above all, it would not be wise, with the Committee about to sit, to make this a Party question in a Party discussion. This was the reason why he withdrew the Amendment on the Paper. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) had pointed out that on the Estimates the question would arise; but that discussion would not be from his (Colonel Mure's) initiative. When raised, however, it would be difficult for a military man to refrain from entering into it; but he hoped there would be no Party feeling introduced into this discussion. He sincerely hoped the Committee would consider the question on its merits, and not allow itself to be influenced by any partiality for Viscount Cardwell's scheme, or against it.

COLONEL STANLEY joined with his hon. and gallant Friend who had just spoken in expressing a sincere hope that anything as regarded the Army would not be made a question of Party politics. He hoped, whatever their views, they would all work with one common object. There might be a divergence of view; but he hoped they could reconcile that with full Party allegiance. With regard to the question of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), he must apologize for not having answered it. He had not been able, owing to the indisposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to communicate with him in order to ascertain the date when the Estimates would be taken. As regarded the question of enlistment, of course, there was a great deal that might be urged why it should not form part of this Bill. For his own part, he found it better to deal with the whole subject, and endeavour to consolidate the existing regulations. He quite agreed with his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir William Harcourt), that it was inconvenient here to discuss all the vexed questions which might be involved; but after the explanation he had given to the Committee he hoped hon. Members would be induced now to proceed with the consideration of the other clauses; and he did not think they would find any matter which would cause any serious amount of discussion.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON reminded the Committee that they were about to pass a permanent Act; and he thought, if ever they were to discuss it, now was the time. He entirely disagreed with the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) that the proper time to discuss this question was on the Army Estimates. They could not alter the Act in a discussion on the Estimates. In the Estimates there was simply a long talk, and nothing came of it, unless they refused the Estimates, which he did not think the noble Lord contemplated. They would have no other opportunity but this until the Continuance Act came into operation. He hoped the enlistment clauses would be withdrawn from the Bill.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought, after the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), the Government would act wisely in withdrawing the enlistment clauses from the Bill altogether. There were sufficient difficulties in the way of the passage of the Bill without loading it with irrelevant matter. They were told by the noble Lord opposite that they must not discuss this matter now, and that they must wait until they came to the Estimates. He remembered that they had the Army Estimates on a short time ago, and they were told that it was useless to raise questions on the Estimates, as they could not give effect to their opinions by legislation. It was said, within the last few days, that it was a waste of the time of the House to discuss this important question on the Army Estimates. They then came to the Bill, where they had the only chance of affecting legislation, and then they were told, coolly, "Wait until you come to the Estimates." This was playing fast and loose. The course which the Government was pursuing did not seem to him to meet with the approval of any large portion of the House of Commons. That was unfortunate for the Government; but the fact was, they were making no progress at all. They were travelling in a vicious circle, in which there was a good deal of useless talk. He specially referred to the contributions to the debate made by hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House. What was to be done? Expunge from the Bill all immaterial matter. Do not persist in dragging into the Bill things which did not belong to it. He would appeal to the Secretary of State for War, considering what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, to expunge from the Bill the enlistment clauses.

MAJOR NOLAN said, short service would always be approved by the democracy, and long service by the aristocracy. The reasons were obvious; and there was no use ignoring the tendency. When they were asked—"Why do you enlist boys?" they were told that they could not get men for the money. That was quite true. They did not pay the soldier near so well as the agricultural labourer was paid in the Northern half of England. Taking Mr. Caird's figures, the labourer was paid 18s. and 19s. a-week; whereas, making all allowances, the soldier received 15s. 6d. a-week. That was at the root of the short service.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 75 (Change of conditions of service).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had an Amendment to insert words after line 5. He was sorry he had not given Notice of the Amendment, which might do good, and could not do any harm. It seemed to him that while the Secretary of State for War might make regulations by which long-service men might be made short-service men, and go into the Reserve, the case might arise in which, with the consent of themselves, the short-service men might be made long-service men. It might be found that men, after one or two years in the Army, liking the Profession, would be willing to re-enlist for a longer term, and to take service in India and distant parts of the world. He, therefore, proposed to insert the words—"To extend the term of his original enlistment up to the period of 12 years." He hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would favourably consider this.

COLONEL STANLEY: I have no objection to the words—to the power being given. The principle exists under certain circumstances now.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved the further addition to the clause at the end of line 7, of the words "or any period of time not exceeding 12 years on the whole."

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 76 (Reckoning and forfeiture of service).

MAJOR NOLAN said, the two systems of counting service in the Army—one reckoning for discharge, and the other towards pension—were very bad. This way of reckoning had no effect upon the men, but gave endless trouble to the officers and their clerks; and he believed that an officer had stated that, by the adoption of a uniform system, the services of, at least, a dozen clerks could be dispensed with at Woolwich. He intended to move the insertion of the words, after line 14—

"Any man absent without leave more than five days shall have those deducted from his service towards pension."

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. The pensions were matters that were dealt with partly under the Estimates laid upon the Table of the House and partly under Royal Warrant, and it appeared to him wrong to insert the words proposed, inasmuch as the Bill, as drafted, did not include anything relating to them. At the same time, he quite agreed with the object of the hon. and gallant Member, and would communicate with the Financial Secretary to see whether the suggested improvement could not be made under the Royal Warrant.

MAJOR NOLAN begged to withdraw his Amendment. The question of the documentary system was one which could be settled by the Secretary of State for War alone. At present, the system was in an exceedingly bad state, giving endless trouble and labour; but, at the same time, it could be easily simplified.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the clause provided that a soldier's service should reckon from the time of attestation; but it went on to say that the whole of his prior service should be forfeited if he was convicted of desertion, fraudulent enlistment, and certain other offences. This clause was a very vindictive one, and would lead to the aggravation of any punishment which might fall upon a person guilty of any of the offences named. Let a deserter be punished by all means; but let his punishment be adequate to his offence. But when a man had been convicted and punished for any of the offences in question, it must be regarded as a great aggravation of punishment that all his prior service should be forfeited into the bargain. He, therefore, moved the omission of all the words of the clause from "but," in line 16, inclusive.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the clause was, no doubt, an alteration from the existing law, and had been made more severe, for the crimes were such that could be committed on a man's own responsibility; nobody could force a man to desert, that must be entirely at his own option. The crimes named in the section were the cause not only of great loss to the Service, but also to the State; and, therefore, considering how great a blot upon the Service were desertion and fraudulent enlistment, he hoped the Committee would agree with him in thinking that they should be punished by the forfeiture of previous service. He did not wish to tell the Committee that this was not more severe than the present practice. A man did not forfeit service for any absence or imprisonment; but if he was convicted of these particularly serious offences, he would forfeit his former service. He hoped the Committee would accept the clause as it stood.

COLONEL COLTHURST thought the change proposed by the Government in respect of these crimes a very good one, and likely to be of great advantage to the Service. It would, amongst other advantages, enable a court martial to give less imprisonment. Everyone knew that the well-conducted men formed the great majority of the Army; and it would be a great advantage if the comparatively small number of ill-conducted and irregular men in the Army could be punished in a way which did not affect the well-conducted soldiers. He had known the authorities over and over again, as they had power to do, restore a man's service after five years' good behaviour. The inconvenience pointed out by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), with regard to the two systems of reckoning service towards discharge and pension, was nothing to the complication caused, under the present system, of forfeiture of service. He thought the change proposed by the clause should be accepted.

MR. HOPWOOD thought that if Her Majesty's Government relied upon severity of punishment for the repression of the offences in question, they would rely upon a broken reed. He could not agree that a man should forfeit all his prior service besides the punishment awarded for the offences by court martial. A man of 12 years' service might be taken prisoner of war by want of due precaution; and thereupon, without leaving it to the court to decide, this Act of Parliament would require that the whole of that period of service should be forfeited. The Bill said "it shall be forfeited," and not even the Commander-in-Chief could set this aside. Further, the Act said the soldier should begin over again, and be liable to serve for the term of his original enlistment. Here, also, this was not ordered by court martial after due consideration, but rendered compulsory; while the justification of this course, it was said, was to be found in the number of entries which would be saved in the Regimental Books. He should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell).

COLONEL ALEXANDER pointed out that in the case of a man who had, perhaps, lost 10 years' service, and then kept clear of the Regimental Defaulters' Book for five years, his commanding officer would at once recognize him as entitled to restoration as a matter of course.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that power of restoration did not appear in the Bill. He wanted some words to be inserted that would insure this benefit to the soldier; and it was highly desirable, if a new clause was proposed, that some provision should be introduced for good-service restoration. With regard to the sub-section relating to soldiers taken prisoners of war by want of due precaution, the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) upon this point were very important; and he agreed with him that it was much too severe to make a man for such an offence necessarily and irretrievably lose the whole benefit of his former service, on conviction by court martial, who were only sworn to find out whether he was absent from the Service. He hoped that the words "by want of due precaution" would not be allowed to stand.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, that each deserter cost the country £35; and, in his opinion, under a system of short service, the punishment for desertion could not be too severe.

COLONEL COLTHURST explained, that he had supported this clause under the impression that the Bill contained powers for restoration of service; but he now was obliged to withdraw his support from the clause in its present form, because he found that the Bill contained no such powers. He agreed with the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), that sub-section C was much too severe, and he (Colonel Colthurst) would say the same of sub-section D. His remarks were directed entirely to the good of the Service.

COLONEL STANLEY thought that there should, at all events, be power to restore service after a sufficient period of good conduct.

MR. O'DONNELL asked leave to withdraw his Amendment. He thought that the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst), having changed his opinions with regard to the clause, should also have withdrawn the imputations cast upon his Colleagues in his first speech, when he said that a number of Members were opposing this Bill in the interest of the ill-conducted soldiers of the Army. Of course, he had not meant to imply anything offensive, because it would have been quite out of keeping with his character to utter such a calumny upon any Members of the House. The efforts of hon. Members had been directed to the humanizing of this Bill, and to getting altogether a better class of men into the ranks of the Army, and he could not help thinking that the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member were exceedingly out of place; and he trusted that he would see the propriety of withdrawing them in the presence of the Committee and of his constituents. At the same time, he was sure that the Committee would entirely repudiate the suggested imputation cast upon those hon. Members who were endeavouring to humanize the Bill.

Colonel Colthurst

COLONEL COLTHURST did not feel under any necessity of withdrawing the supposed imputations, because he did not intend to cast them. What he meant so convey was, that many hon. Members, in their laudable anxiety to prevent undue severity of punishment being applied to the ill-conducted and irregular soldier, had forgotten the interests of the well-conducted soldier. He was perfectly sure that neither his Colleagues nor constituents would accuse him of having intended to convey any other meaning.

MR. BIGGAR objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment. He considered there should rest some option with the court martial who tried a soldier for these offences. No doubt, desertion was a very grave crime; but the distinction between desertion and absence without leave must, in some cases, be extremely slight. He thought the court should have power to say whether or not all the punishments contained in the Bill should be inflicted for the offences in question. It was, in his opinion, very wrong to maintain a hard-and-fast line, and leave them no discretion in the matter.

MAJOR NOLAN said, there were many kinds of fraudulent enlistment. Of course, when a man took a second kit and bounty, that was a very serious form of the crime. But there were other classes of this crime for which he considered the punishment too heavy. For instance, was a boy of 17½ years of age, who enlisted as 18 years of age, on being found out a number of years afterwards when, perhaps, he had become a good and efficient soldier, to forfeit all his service? Again, would the clause apply only to men who enlisted after the passing of the Bill, or would men lose for desertion committed before?

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Act would not be retrospective in any degree, except in the case of a man who re-engaged.

SIR HENRY JAMES understood the clause to affect any soldiers whose time had to be reckoned after the passing of the Act. He would be liable to have his time taken from him if he deserted at any time.

MR. O'DONNELL thought that fraudulent enlistment should be dealt with by itself; and as the Secretary of State for War had agreed to take out sub-sections C and D, he thought he might agree to leave out sub-section B also. This might be very easily done without disregarding the interests of the Service. The same thing should be done with the last part of the clause. He could then move that the whole period of a deserter's absence should be forfeited to him, and this would entirely do away with the aggravation which the present clause imposed. He maintained that boys, and men who had enlisted as boys, should not be punished with extreme severity for desertion. Moreover, the punishment of forfeiture of service, to which a deserter was liable, prevented men, who might otherwise be so disposed, to come back to their regiments; while he considered, on the other hand, that some gate should be left open to the deserter by which he could voluntarily re-enter. He, therefore, asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to take out the words "Fraudulent enlistment," and to allow desertion to be punished by itself.

COLONEL STANLEY could not agree to that proposal. He thought the Committee could hardly be aware of the extent to which this crime of fraudulent enlistment had been carried on. It had become the regular trade of men, perhaps never more than a week out of prison, and as such it must be stamped out. He hoped the Committee would allow the clause to pass.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the hands of the authorities were tied by these sections. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman kept his eye too much fixed upon the cases of men who enlisted fraudulently over and over again. But he should remember that there were other cases to be dealt with, which did not require such strong treatment as that proposed. He would suggest that Progress be reported, and that some Amendment should be added at the next discussion of the Bill.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it would be rather hard to do this at that moment; he had already given the assurance that certain words should be added, which he hoped would be sufficient for making the clause more clear.

MR. RYLANDS could not consent to the passing of the clause; and urged upon the Secretary of State for War that he should put upon the Paper the addition which he intended to make to it. He thought the Committee should be told, on the next occasion, why it was that some portion of the Articles of War had been omitted from the Bill altogether, while others had been made more harsh?

MR. BIGGAR said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman appeared to him to have entirely misapprehended the intention of the opponents of the clause. He (Colonel Stanley) had given the case of a soldier who enlisted and re-enlisted over and over again; but he appeared to forget that such a person, who spent all his time in gaol, would have nothing either for service or pension.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

PUBLIC LOANS REMISSION BILL.

Resolution [June 23] reported, and agreed to :—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 218.]

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at ten minutes after Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 25th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—School Boards (Duration of Loans)* [219].

Second Reading—University Education (Ireland) [183], debate adjourned.

Third Reading—Consolidated Fund (No. 4)*, and passed.

Colonel Stanley

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 183.]

(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Kavanagh, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Lord Charles Beresford, Mr. Parnell.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [21st May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was—

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while this House recognizes that the funds set free by the disestablishment of the Irish Church should be devoted to the benefit of the people of Ireland, provided they are not again applied to the support of any sectarian religion, it is not desirable to devote additional public funds to the further promotion of higher education in Ireland till adequate provision is first made for elementary teaching in that Country without aid from Imperial funds exceeding that given to other parts of the United Kingdom,"—(Sir George Campbell),

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. SYNAN: In rising to continue the adjourned debate upon this most important question, I may be allowed to call the attention of the House to the fact that we are obliged, by the refusal or the inability of Her Majesty's Government to give us a day, to debate this great question on a Wednesday; and we therefore appeal to the forbearance and the honour of the Members of this House who propose to speak to confine themselves to the principles of the Bill, which is the only question at this stage, and not to countenance any attempt to prevent a Division or talk the matter out. There is another preliminary question which I feel it my duty to make an observation upon, in order to give it an answer that I hope may be satisfactory and final. It has been made a subject of complaint by some of the Press of this country that we, the Irish Catholic Members, have not produced any declaration from our Bishops that they accept this Bill as a settlement of this question. I will not question the right to ask the question, nor the spirit in which it is asked—whether to discredit and prejudice the cause of the Catholic laity of Ireland by introducing the names of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, or for a bond fide object of ascertaining our and their views. We consider this the question of the Catholic laity of Ireland. On their behalf we bring in this Bill, which is accepted by them as a settlement, and whatever they accept the Catholic hierarchy accept. That has been done in the case of the National Education, in the case of the Intermediate Education, and will be equally the case upon this great question, which we regard as the crowning of the edifice you have raised for the purposes of Irish education. As there was no opportunity of answering the objections made to the second reading of this Bill on the last Wednesday, it becomes my duty now to answer them briefly; and if I do so conclusively, I hope that course may be the shortest and the most satisfactory. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) will excuse me if I pass by his irrelevant Resolution on the subject of Irish primary education. Having India and Egypt on his hands, he cannot be expected to have time to devote to this question; but in order to satisfy my hon. Friend, I make this offer to him on the part of the Irish Members. If he will give us facilities in passing this Bill, we will give him facilities in discussing his Resolution at the proper time. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) would do well to vote for the second reading, in order that he may have an opportunity of repeating in Committee the speech he has delivered. If he does so, I undertake to answer him in Committee, and show him that he is completely mistaken as to the details of the Bill, and to prove to him that the University under this Bill will be one to which he can send his grandchildren, as his ancestors, ten centuries ago and earlier, did to the Irish Colleges of that day. I now come to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), which has been considered by our opponents, but particularly by his Friends at the other side of the House, a complete answer, and an unanswerable argument against the second reading. I hope I shall satisfy the House that it is an argument in favour of the second reading. The noble Lord, from his University standing, family connection with Ireland, and knowledge of her affairs, must be taken as an authority upon this subject; and, therefore, any conclusion that can be fairly drawn from his speech in favour of this Bill must have great weight with the House. The noble Lord began by admitting that Irish Catholics had a grievance upon this subject—I hope he has converted his Friends to that view—and that the House ought to apply a remedy to the grievance. The noble Lord said — “Trinity College is practically the College of the Protestant Episcopalians; the Queen’s Colleges are the Colleges of the Secularists. The Catholics should have a College of their own, affiliated to the Queen’s University.” Shade of Rip Van Winkle! has the noble Lord been asleep all these years? Was not his remedy that of the Bill of 1873? The noble Lord says he was not asleep—he was wide awake, and he admits that he helped to kill and bury the Bill of 1873. Is it worthy of the noble Lord to go to the grave of that Bill and dig up its dusty remains in order to defeat the present Bill? Is the noble Lord a worker of political miracles? He is ambitious; he is able; but surely he does not hope to vivify the dry bones of the Bill of 1873? Why, then, this argument? If the noble Lord’s character was not above such a suspicion, I would say it was merely to defeat the Bill; but, being what he is—and from his political connections and associations likely to occupy the Treasury at some future time—I have come to the conclusion that he wishes to keep this question open until he is able to be a party in the settlement of it, and likely to acquire the honour that may arise from settling it. Whether he expects to convert my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard), and my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and to take them to the Treasury Bench with him to settle it, I will not say; but it is well to be hopeful of conversion. The noble Lord had a word, also, to say upon the question of endowment. He knew—nobody knew better—that the Irish people were too poor to endow a University, although they have out of their poverty subscribed £200,000 to build a Catholic College, for which they asked a charter and were refused; but the noble Lord endowed it for them out of the property of the rich English converts. The millionaires of Manchester, said the noble Lord, have endowed a College and asked for a charter; let the millionaire Catholic converts endow the Irish University. The noble converts, to whom the noble Lord refers, stand as high in the ranks of the English aristocracy as the highest; their abilities, their virtues, their bounty to the charities of the country, their profuse gifts in the cause of education and religion, require no panegyric from me—they speak for themselves. But, greatly as we admire them, we do not ask them, nor would we allow them, to endow our University. Ireland is rich enough, and able enough, to endow it, if you allow her, out of her own funds. But does the noble Lord see the consequences of his own argument? The rich aristocracy endow their own Universities. This is admirable doctrine; but I will venture to say that it will not be used except against this Irish Bill. There is a common saying that any stick is good enough to beat a dog with. Now, I ask, what is the conclusion to be drawn from this speech? The grievance is admitted; the remedy proposed by him has been rejected. The endowment proposed is a joke. What greater argument in favour of this Bill than the non possumus speech of the noble Lord. To be consistent, the noble Lord should follow his speech, and vote for this Bill. I will now refer briefly to the speeches at the other side of the House. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Trinity College (Mr. Plunket) was sent up as the pilot balloon on this occasion. He drifted with each current—now at one side, now at the other. He had nothing to say for the Bill, and not much against it; but the little he did say was an exaggeration and a mistake. Full of the millions given to the Irish Church, he quadrupled the figures in this Bill. He turned twenties into hundreds, and conditional endowments into certain ones. He followed the endowments of the Irish Church and of Trinity College. I hope he will be as good as his word in Committee. All he wanted was that Trinity College was safe. If I were in the place of my hon. and learned Friend I would vote for the Bill to make Trinity College safe, and, in my opinion, he will do the same. Now, come to the speech of the day—that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Some of my Friends look upon that speech as unfavourable. I took the opposite view. The right hon. Gentleman, in his usual conciliating manner, did not oppose the Bill, but made objections with a view to being answered and obtaining assurances. I think I am in a position to answer the objections and give the assurances. He states that the sum in this Bill was £500,000 more than in the Act of last year. I admit the fact, and need not inform the right hon. Gentleman that that is a subject for Committee. He then objected that there were no rival institutions in the case of the schools under the Intermediate Education Act. The Chief Secretary might have informed him there were; there were the Endowed Schools, the Royal Schools, the Erasmus Smith Schools; and the Act of last year protected the new candidates for prizes from unequal competition. The Home Secretary, if favourable to this Bill, might answer, in his quick, legal, incisive manner, the case runs all fours with the case of last year. The right hon. Gentleman then objected that he saw no Conscience Clause in this Bill, and he wanted assurances on that head. Certainly, on the part of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), I give the assurance. My hon. Friend was of opinion that it was not his part to introduce such a clause—that it should come from the Government. A Conscience Clause objected to by Irish Catholic Members in this House! That would be a practical contradiction. Our raison d'être here is a Conscience Clause. Our whole history from the Union to the present time is one long Conscience Clause. In the cause of conscience we won Emancipation; in the cause of conscience we won back our National schools to save our children from violation of conscience. In the cause of conscience we got the Intermediate Act of last year; and in the same cause we now bring in this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman then came to his last and apparently weightiest objection—that this Bill excluded Parliamentary control over the endowment, and that it was a very strong proposal to vest this sum in the Senate under this Bill. I admit that; but must remind the right hon. Gentleman that my hon. Friend anticipated that objection, and left it altogether to the Government and the House. By all means let it be on the Estimates, if the Government so wishes. The right hon. Gentleman has evidently a voracious appetite for Estimates. I do not know if the appetite of the Secretary to the Treasury is equally keen. We have no fear on that subject as long as my hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) takes his part as watchman below the Gangway. I think I have now exhausted the objections made to this Bill, and I ask any unprejudiced Member in the House, has there been one single objection made to the principle of this Bill? I admit that objections have been made to some of the details; but I implore the House to reserve them for Committee. I was, however, near forgetting one hon. Member, the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). The Cassandra of the Tory Party rose from his mountain, and, in solemn tones, warned the Government to beware. He pointed to the Christian Brothers' Schools in Mallow; informed us that they were a branch of the Jesuits; that both were in rebellion against the Bishops; and that he has it on the best authority that the Bishops appealed to the Pope in vain. Here is a pretty quarrel. Here is an extraordinary junction—the Pope and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. What do the planets say? No wonder the weather is bad and the farmers in their present condition. But what has this to say to the Bill? Everything. The Jesuits want this Bill to blow up the Bishops. But my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) has told us, at the meeting of himself and the Members for Calne and Liskeard, that my hon. Friend has brought in this Bill for the Bishops; that my hon. Friend, with all his mild looks, is a wolf in sheep's clothing. He is going to eat up all the Irish Nonconformist lambs. The force of folly, and prejudice, and contradiction, cannot go further than this. I cannot deal with such a subject in a serious manner, and must only appeal to Horace's defence of himself in similar circumstances—

"Quamquam videntem dicere verum, Quid vetat"

If I were dealing with opponents who agreed in their opinions and in their objections to this Bill, I have made out a conclusive case for this Bill; but, unfortunately, the adversaries of the Bill assume as many shapes as Proteus himself. The grievance is admitted by the noble Lord who leads the opposition to this Bill. Will the Members for Liskeard and Merthyr admit it? If not, how do they happen to hunt with the noble Lord? Do they only use him as an ornamental performer?

"Quo teneam vultus mutantem Protea nodo."

It is objected—first, that there is no Catholic population in Ireland from which a University could be supported. It is said—"The Papists are only a parcel of bog-trotters. There are 4,500,000 of them, it is true; but what pretensions can they have to University Education." That allegation is made in open defiance of the Returns on the Table of the House. I hold in my hand the Declaration of the Catholic laity in favour of the Bill, signed by 8 Peers, 3 right honourables, 392 Justices of the Peace, 6 baronets, 3 knights, 36 Members of Parliament, 41 deputy lieutenants, 12 Queen's counsels, 2 LL.D.'s, 25 A.M. and A.B.'s, 200 doctors, barristers, and solicitors, 200 merchants, 200 Poor Law guardians, 100 mayors and town councillors; in all, 1,230 of the very class from which University students are likely, nay certain, to come. Previous to the Intermediate Act, there were 1,500 Catholic students each year in voluntary intermediate schools. Under that Act there are 4,000 candidates for examination. Of these, 3,000 are certain to be Catholic. How many of these in Trinity College and Queen's Colleges? In Trinity College, 75 out of 1,200 students; Belfast, 5 out of 463 students; Cork, 133 out of 261; Galway, 73 out of 175—that is, out of 1,500 that ought to be students, you have 300; out of 3,000 that you will have, you are not likely to have more, unless you give them a University. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), a few years ago, said—

"Throw open Trinity College and the Roman Catholics will flock into it. There are already two or three waiting for Fellowships."

But the fact is, the millennium so much desired by the hon. Member for Merthyr will arrive before any such result as the hon. Member for Hackney desired will be attained. Take it, now, in relation to population. In Ulster the Catholic population is as 60 per cent of the whole. What is the number of Catholics in Belfast College? Five? The 18 Professors in that College are all Protestant, mostly Presbyterian. There is a Divinity School. Belfast College is practically a Presbyterian College. No wonder they wish to keep things as they are. Take, now, the question in relation to the Catholic population of Ireland. The Catholics of Ireland are 4,150,867 out of 5,500,000, and they have only 300 University students, out of 2,100—that is, the proportion of Catholic population is 7 to 1, and the proportion of Catholic students is 1 to 7. The grievance is so great, and the injustice so monstrous, that the great Liberal statesman who tried in vain to apply a remedy has expressed himself in his usual strong and eloquent manner on the subject. The right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) said—

“It comes to this—that there are still in Ireland civil disabilities on account of religious opinions. There is not a single educational institution in Ireland in harmony with the religious sentiments or with the feelings of the great majority of the people.”

I do not know whether that opinion is to have some weight with the right hon. Gentleman's followers, or whether we have come to a time in the history of the Liberal Party when the followers will not follow. Since that language was used, six years ago, the Intermediate Education Act of last year was passed, which has removed the inequality as far as Intermediate Education is concerned; but that very Act renders the present Bill or some similar measure absolutely necessary, for otherwise it would only increase the inequality with respect to University Education. But we are told the present Universities are open to them. That is the argument upon which the Church Establishment was supported. The churches were open to them; why not adopt the State religion? That was the argument upon which the Kildare Street Schools were supported. The difference is only in degree; but the Irish Catholic laity will not have the secular system which excludes all religious teaching. The exclusion of all religious teaching is the exclusion of Christianity in any definite or positive form, and is the parent of all the systems that have led on the Continent to Communism and Socialism. At all events, the Irish Catholic parent will not have it, and this Bill is brought in for the vindication of parental authority and the freedom of education. For 300 years the Irish have resisted the compulsory system of education that England endeavoured to impose upon her. She has emerged from the contest, after persecution and penal laws had been tried in vain to break her spirit, comparatively victorious, and in that career of history she will not be arrested until she reaches the goal and is crowned with the prize of free University Education. In matters of this kind you must consider the feelings, the religious sentiments, the genius, and habits of a people; you cannot apply the law of Procrustes to a nation. Laws must be made for the people, and not the people for the laws; and to act in any pedantic or absolute system, whether you be a Parliament or a tyrant, is to defeat the object you have in view, and render all law impossible of execution. The other day I came across some language of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), in relation to India, which, I think, he might well apply to Ireland and to education. My hon. Friend says—

Mr. Synan

“In considering questions of taxation, nothing can be more unwise than to conclude that that must be best which is most in accord with the principles of science. The tastes, the habits, the wishes of the people ought to be most carefully considered.”

That was Burke's opinion, both in relation to Ireland as well as India, and I offer the example of Burke for imitation to my hon. Friend in relation to Ireland on this question. This Bill, as far as the principle to be decided on the present occasion is concerned, is very simple, very concise, and very clear. It is this—Will you give to the Irish people a University where the competitors may obtain degrees in secular knowledge which is to be maintained by result fees and prizes to the best students upon secular subjects? Theology is expressly excluded, and no religious teaching is to be paid for. All the other parts of this Bill are matters of detail and for discussion in Committee, and are only introduced by the opponents of the Bill for discrediting and defeating it. What is the objection to such a Bill? It is this—that some of the Colleges in which these students are to be trained are superintended by ecclesiastics. The Colleges are selected by the parents; the teachers are not to be paid for religious teaching, but, because they may and will teach religion, the Bill cannot be accepted. That objection applies to the denominational Colleges of England; it applies to the Act of 1870; it applies to the National system in Ireland; it applies to the Intermediate Education Act of last year. If it is resolved by this House that religious education must be expressly excluded, and, for that purpose, that ecclesiastics cannot be allowed to be at the heads of Colleges affiliated to Universities supported by the State, then you are bound in justice to repeal the Act of 1870, and put an end to denominational education in England. And this opposition is made in the name of civil and religious liberty. Oh, Liberty! what crimes are committed in thy name. This is the liberty that the Emperor Julian proclaimed, when he issued his decree against the teaching of Christianity in the schools. That decree concluded with these remarkable words—"For no restraint is laid on any young man as to the source from which he will seek education." So the opponents of this Bill declare to the young Catholic Irishman, Catholic Christian education is to be expressly excluded from all Colleges, so that no young Catholic Irishman may be prevented from getting degrees. The young Irish student may be a Deist, a Positivist, a Pantheist, an Atheist, and get degrees in a University endowed by result fees; but he cannot be a Catholic. Surely the Christianity and common sense of this House must revolt at such a doctrine as that. It appears to me that such an argument is an insult to our common Christianity. And by whom is this opposition supported? By persons who have no common bond of union, but who are at the opposite poles of the educational system. By Protestant denominationalists at the opposite side of the House, by secularists, and by opponents of denominational education at this side. And why? Because the Irish Catholics, who are now practically excluded from degrees, are to be the persons benefited. You have refused to give them a charter for their University—you have refused them affiliated Colleges. This is the only mode in which they can obtain degrees, and you resist it. And this unholy, unprincipled alliance is maintained against the Representatives of the Irish people, Protestant and Catholic. Does not the House see that if you do this you practically repeal the Act of Union? If in a matter entirely Irish, and a fund belonging to the Irish people, you overwhelm the Irish representation by the weight of your numbers, the Irish people will see that the Act of Union is maintained by force. Canada is free, and has her free Universities, Catholic and Protestant; and Ireland is bound by the Act of Union, and will not be allowed to have a free University where a conscientious Catholic can get a degree. To reject this Bill is to tell the Irish people to bide their time and do as Canada has done. We present to you in this Bill a compromise which, I hope, the good sense and statesmanship still to be found in Parliament may induce you to accept as a settlement of this question. An outcry has been raised outside this House by interested parties against the Bill as the endowment of religion. That cry is false, and false to the knowledge of the people that make it. We are threatened by the organ of a small Party with ostracism if we persevere with this Bill. We support our principles, and despise the threat. If any attempt to break up the Liberal Party is made in this House or out of it, it will not be made by us. Our principles have been tried in the furnace of persecution and will stand the assault of faction, whether influenced by bigotry or hostility to Christian teaching. Let those who want to introduce into this country the educational principles which have led in other countries to Communism, and Socialism, and Revolution, take care and not break up the Liberal Party, of which they are a small and contemptible part. I am not afraid, as long as we have on the Opposition Bench a man true to the principles of Fox—the equal of Fox in eloquence and statesmanship, and the superior of Fox in devotion to the interests of England and of the human race. Six years ago the right hon. Member for Greenwich tried to settle this question, and risked power and place to do what he considered an act of justice and of true statesmanship. He failed; but I have that opinion of him that the remembrance of the conduct he then met with will not prevent him from supporting this Bill if he considers it contains the germs of a satisfactory arrangement; and I have equally no fear that the Liberal Party will follow him, and not the organs and the howling of an ignorant, an exclusive, and an intolerant faction. I do not know what effect an appeal to the Protestant denominationalists on the other side may have, or whether they will remain true to their principles. But I beg to remind them that nine years ago the cause of Protestant denominationalism in this House hung in the balance, and the Irish Members were appealed to. Did we hang back? We owed you nothing—we had nothing to be grateful for—you were the persistent enemies of our country; but we forgot everything but our principles. We answered your appeal, went into the Lobby with you, and saved denominational education. Will you imitate that example this day? Will you be true to your principles, or, clinging to your prejudices, will you—but it is impossible; I will not insult you. I am sorry to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is absent, who, from his speech on the last occasion, I thought was favourable to the second reading of this Bill. Illness, I understand, has deprived us of his presence. I regret his absence, and I regret the cause; but that absence is ominous. However, we must take the consequences, come what may. And now, in conclusion, a word to the Government. Is this a Government I see before me, or is it only a number of individuals. If it is a Government, let it declare its policy, and let every individual Member of it go into the Lobby in favour of this Bill. If it is a Government, let it call upon that solid body of supporters which sit behind it, which has followed it even when it was wrong; let them now follow the Government when it is right. If they will not do this, the Government is without a policy, and an Irish policy is as important in the history of this country as an Eastern policy—aye, they will find it even more important. If, on the other hand, the Government make this appeal to their supporters, and if they follow them like loyal men to vote for the second reading of this Bill, they will do much to complete that edifice the foundation of which has been laid last Session, and thus they will send another message of peace to Ireland.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that as he was anxious the House should divide that afternoon on the Bill, he would not detain it long. The hon. Member who had just addressed the House had alluded to the exceedingly eloquent and able speech of the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) when this Bill was last under discussion, and had stated that the noble Lord would have no objection to Roman Catholic Colleges being affiliated with the Universities; and, before that, the hon. Member had asked whether the noble Lord had forgotten what took place in 1873? None of them, he supposed, had forgotten what took place in that year; but the proposal to affiliate Roman Catholic Colleges with the Universities was rejected, because the Bill by which it was to be effected proposed to bring down the studies of the Universities to the level of the Colleges proposed to be affiliated. Some said there was, no doubt, a grievance; but he believed it was sentimental, and created by the highest authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. They would not allow the members of their denomination, if they could help it, to attend Colleges which were not Roman Catholic, because they feared the effect of association with persons of a different faith. What would be thought if a town had a large supply of water of excellent quality open to all, and one portion of the community declined to go near it because persons of a different religion from theirs drank it! If the Belfast College was practically Presbyterian, it was because the Presbyterians took advantage of the education offered, and not because there was any interference with religion there; and he thought it would be found difficult to get any of the Roman Catholic students to say that his religious principles had been in any way tampered with. Those who attended the Colleges of Galway and Cork were equally free from any interference with their religion. Was any Roman Catholic who ever attended these Colleges since 1861, when they had come fully into use, able to say that there had been any attempt to influence his religious opinions; or could any person be pointed to who, while a student, was brought over from any one religion to any other? Before the principle proposed to be established by the Bill could be fairly brought before the House, it should be proved that the Queen's Colleges were a failure on their own account, and not on account of the Roman Catholics declining to attend them, owing to the opposition of the heads of their Church. From 1861-2, they had gone on increasing, notwithstanding the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy. In 1861-2, the number of students who entered was 310, and those attending numbered 758; in 1864, there were 288 entrances and 837 attendances, eight more than the average entrances in the University of Dublin for many years. In 1869, 1870, and 1871, there was a slight decrease; but there were in attendance 732 students; and last year and the year before the number was 898, the largest ever known, the entrances in the year being 321. The religion of the students was as follows:—In 1877-8, the number of Church of Ireland students was 221; Roman Catholics, 242; Presbyterians, 347; and other denominations, 88—making 898. The small number of Roman Catholics, in comparison with their proportion to the population, was to be accounted for, not only by the antipathy of the Roman Catholic clergy to the College, but also by the circumstance that the greater number of the University students were destined for the Church, and Roman Catholics had the Maynooth College, with large endowments out of the Disestablished Church. In 1845, there were 430 students at Maynooth, and it was difficult to get any statement of the number since then; but taking it at 300, which was 130 less than in 1845, the number of Roman Catholics receiving University Education in Ireland, including 150 attending Dublin University, would be brought up to 692 out of 1,606 of all denominations. They were told that the Bill was not connected with religion at all; but that was the very objection made by the Roman Catholics to the Queen's Colleges. They were said to be godless institutions. Would hon. Gentlemen opposite tell the House that they were proposing to establish another godless institution at a cost of £1,500,000, to stand side by side with the Queen's Colleges, to which Roman Catholic gentlemen would not send their sons? If the Bill came forward honestly and fairly, and with a plain face, he would know better how to meet it. If it had been proposed as a Bill to establish a Roman Catholic University which should be exclusively open to Roman Catholic students, and which should be under the exclusive control of the Roman Catholic clergy, and managed from Rome, there would have been no difficulty in inquiring straightforwardly and honestly into a claim fairly and openly set up. The question was, whether it was just for such a purpose to take £1,500,000 out of a fund derived from the Disestablishment of a rival Church, which had been disestablished for the purpose of conciliating the Roman Catholics, in disregard of the feelings and sentiments of the Protestants of Ireland? When that was done the principle was laid down, and distinctly and universally accepted, that no part of the funds taken from the Church should be used for religious purposes, or any purpose that might possibly become matter for religious discussion; and, though this was not the same Parliament, he thought it was equally bound to maintain that decision. He did not wish to make use of irritating language; but he could not conceal from the House the great and strong feeling that was among the Protestants of Ireland against this measure. The hon. Member who last addressed the House spoke of the unanimous feeling of the Irish Members as being in favour of this Bill; but there were at least 33 of the Irish Members who belonged to the other side; and all that could be said was, that there were two to one of the Irish Members who were in its favour. He now came to the question of the constitution of the Governing Body of the proposed University. It was said by the promoters of the Bill—"We make a most fair proposal, because we leave it to the State to appoint the Governing Body, which shall consist of 24 members, with one Chancellor and a Vice Chancellor." The State, of course, meant the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and anybody who had the slightest knowledge of the manner in which appointments were made in Ireland would well know what was likely to take place. The Lord Lieutenant would be advised to appoint 12 Roman Catholics, a certain number of Episcopalians, and a certain number of Presbyterians. After a few years, when a constituency had grown up that could elect its own members, there would be six more elected by the graduates. The students of the new University, he supposed, would be Roman Catholics. It was intended they should be. They, of course, could elect Roman Catholics, so that three-fourths of the Governing Body would ultimately be of the Romish persuasion; and he did not believe that anybody in the House would dispute that 18 out of 24 would not conduct everything in accordance with the dictates of their belief. If they did not do so, they would be acting in opposition to every tradition and idea which had been adopted by their co-religionists previously. That being the case, he concluded that it was intended—although it did not appear so on the surface—to be an exclusively denominational University. There were many Roman Catholic Colleges in Ireland managed entirely by the Prelates of the Roman Church, and if they were to be affiliated, and if the students proceeding from these Colleges were to form the constituency which was to elect the Governing Body, he thought he was not wrong in concluding that they would naturally elect those who had given them their education. He imagined, therefore, that before many years had elapsed this University would be exclusively a Roman Catholic institution, to which no Protestant would dream of sending his sons. What had been the tenour of the legislation of the past 50 years with regard to education? Why, it had been a constant opening of the Universities to persons of every denomination. The Dublin University was now perfectly open to men of all creeds. In fact, the only connecting link in the old association that prevailed was that the students belonging to the University, who happened to be members of the Church of Ireland, were required by the Fellows to attend Divine Service in the Chapel belonging to their own persuasion. Others were equally free as regarded matters of religion. Then, again, the Fellowships were open to the competition of all; and although the hon. Gentleman opposite sneered at the thought of a Roman Catholic being admitted a Fellow, he (Mr. Macartney) understood that if there had been a second vacancy at the last competition a Roman Catholic gentleman would have been elected who had been the second best answerer, and had run the successful candidate very close. To sum up the argument; if this was not to be a denominational institution, proposed to be endowed by the State, contrary to the whole tenour of the legislation of the last 50 years, he asked what would be the use of establishing it? If it was to be a denominational institution, it would be repugnant to all the principles which had been advocated in Parliament for many years. He wished to add that if the hon. Member who had moved the first Amendment withdrew it, as he believed he proposed to do, he would himself be prepared to move the Amendment he had placed on the Paper.

Mr. Synan

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: In one sense, I am in a different position from my political Friends on this Bench. The late Cabinet brought in a Bill to do justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland in regard to University Education. They, therefore, must look favourably on any practical attempt to satisfy what they consider the just claims of Roman Catholics to receive higher education. But I opposed the Bill of the late Government, on two grounds—first, because it pulled to pieces an existing University system which was doing good work; and, second, because I thought it was constructed with too great submission to the ecclesiastical prejudices of the Irish hierarchy. This Bill avoids my first objection, because it leaves the Dublin University and the Queen's University to work in their own way, and to continue their salutary influences on University teaching and graduation; and my second objection does not appear to lie in the framework of the Bill, for it provides that the State, and not the Roman Catholic clergy, shall have full authority in the management of the new University. The initial question, however, must be considered—is there need of a third University in Ireland? The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) says there is not. But there is one consideration which all will admit. When a country is poor in the natural resources for manufacturing industries, this disadvantage can only be compensated by improving the intellectual condition of her population, so that by increased intelligence applied to production they can compensate for the higher price of the raw materials of manufacture. Instances of this kind are seen in Holland and Switzerland, where manufactures flourish in the absence of coal, the source of power, and iron, the material for strength. In a less obvious degree it is seen in Scotland, which possesses these materials only in a narrow and confined district. Ireland is washed with an ocean communicating with all great producing countries, and if her population were adapted for manufacturing industry, there is no preponderating disadvantage which would prevent its development. She chiefly requires that all classes of her population should be so educated as to compensate for the natural poverty of the country by the superior intellectual productiveness of the people. Scotland has more or less obtained this result, not in the most scientific way, but after a rude fashion, through primary schools which teach secondary subjects, and through four Universities suited to the genius of the Scotch people; and Scotland, now with a population not much more than half that of Ireland, has double the number of University students. Why is that the case? We must admit the only conclusion which is legitimate—that the Roman Catholics, as a body, do not find the existing Irish Universities suitable to their wants. Personally, I deeply lament this fact, for I think it is a doleful thing that religions which aim to unite men in eternity should separate men in time, and prevent them growing up in a common brotherhood at the same schools and Colleges. I go further, and wonder that intelligent Roman Catholics do not conquer their prejudices, and insist, in spite of their priests, that they should use more largely than they do the Colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway, or the very tolerant Protestant Trinity College of Dublin. I do not at all admit that either the Queen's University or Trinity College has failed. The Queen's Colleges, on an average, have 31 per cent of Roman Catholic pupils, and Trinity College has also a considerable number. Both, taken together, have many more University students in proportion to the population than England. But I do not think this an argument against University extension in Ireland. It is fairer to compare a poor country like Ireland with Scotland. Both are countries with such a poor population that special facilities are required to enable their population to study at Universities; and here is the broad fact that while Ireland, with between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 of people, has only about 2,000 University students, Scotland, with between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000, has more than double that number. Again, in Ireland, a country with 76 per cent Roman Catholics, the Protestant students are to the Catholics as four to one. The poverty of the Catholics is an obstacle, but not a bar, to University Education; and if the obstacle were made surmountable, as it is in Scotland, by a system of bursaries and Scholarships, we might expect a great development of University students, provided we make the University system suitable to their wants. At present, the learned Professions are most unequally represented in respect to religion in Ireland. Even as regards the clergy, the Roman Catholics have only one priest to 1,500 of the population, while the Protestants have one to about 500. In law, the Roman Catholics have one barrister to 21,000 of the population, and the Episcopalians one to 1,400. In medicine, the Roman Catholics have one physician to 4,600 of the population, the Episcopalians one in 500, and the Presbyterians one in 1,600. Hence it is clear that the learned Professions are not largely recruited from the existing Universities by Roman Catholics. Will this Bill enable them to have fair play in this respect? Now, I desire to obtain a fair hearing from my Roman Catholic Friends to my criticism of this Bill. They are inclined to think that every Scotch Member is their natural enemy. Above all, they must deem Scotch University Members to be in this category, for they have intimated the intention of attacking the Scotch Universities on the Estimates. Now, I desire to remove this idea. It is true that Scotland is as intensely Protestant as Ireland is intensely Roman Catholic. It is true, also, that I, individually, am thoroughly imbued with the Protestantism of my race. But, individually, my opinion is of little worth, for it is only as the exponent of nearly 6,000 Scotch graduates that I have a claim to be heard in this debate. Now, what has been their action in regard to this University Bill, which has excited keen hostility in many quarters? The remarkable fact is, that I have not received a single communication hostile to the Bill from either a constituent or from the Governing Bodies of the two Universities which I have the honour to represent. My interpretation of this is, that they trust their Representative to discuss the Bill in its relation to the interests of higher education, but above the prejudices which are apt to influence popular constituencies. I know that my Universities would be glad if we could devise any measure which would provide higher secular education among Roman Catholics. They have no sympathy with the "No Popery" cry which has arisen in certain quarters against this Bill. Such a cry has little meaning, and vast insult to a country which has 76 per cent of Roman Catholics among its population; and I am quite sure that I would misrepresent the Liberal feelings of my Universities if I were to refuse fair consideration to any scheme for promoting higher education among Roman Catholics because it provided that their religious faith should be preserved during the acquisition of secular knowledge. The demand for a new University may be, and is, I think, based on purely conscientious and sentimental grounds; but do not conscience and sentiment lie very nearly at the roots of all religion? At all events, they have been strong enough to prevent the development of University Education among Irish Roman Catholics; and we ought not to imitate the Papal cry of non possumus, which Protestants so often condemn, by refusing fair consideration to a scheme because it joins secular education to securities for religious belief. The Bill is founded on two principles, which must be considered separately as well as in combination. The first principle is to stimulate education by paying students for the results of secular knowledge as attested in their graduating examinations. If the Bill stopped there we would have a University in Dublin on the principle of the London University, only vastly better endowed. There might be sectarian institutions attached, as there are in London University; but the State funds would have no direct payments to make to any person except the successful students. The second principle is to follow the student to his College, and pay that College for having taught him successfully. I assume this to mean that the promoters of the Bill see that a mere Examining Board is not a University in its fullest sense, and they want to cluster around it well-ordered Colleges for systematic teaching under a recognized curriculum of study. Let me take the College of St. Stephen's Green as an example. Here we have a College chiefly under ecclesiastical management, but with Lay Professors for lay subjects, and professing instruction in arts and sciences, as well as in professions. According to the scheme, such a College would be richly paid by the Bill for successful secular results. To see the effect upon the College, let us assume that it gets annually 100 new students in arts, 50 new students in medicine, 30 in law, and 15 in engineering. Then, according to the scale of payments in the Bill, allowing one-fourth of the students to win honours and one-tenth of them exhibitions, St. Stephen's College might get about £17,000 per annum under the Bill. This, no doubt, would be a grand endowment for such a small number of pupils. But that is a detail. Let us look at the principle. Because this College is superintended by Roman Catholics, are you prepared to refuse any aid to a distinctly Lay College, supposed to be well ordered and well taught, when good secular education is attested by a Senate appointed by the State? No doubt, it might be wise to impose some conditions before giving aid, and to bargain for an infusion of lay management in the Governing Body. But are you prepared to deny aid to purely secular education because an institution is superintended in morals and discipline according to Roman Catholic views? I fear, then, that you may tell the Roman Catholics of Ireland at once that they must go on without facilities for their higher education, and that no more Irish University Bills will be considered by this House. I, for my part, am not prepared to refuse to well-ordered Lay Colleges in Catholic Ireland pecuniary aid for attested secular knowledge, simply because they are supervised by a Governing Body exclusively of Roman Catholics. But is this all that the Bill asks? Let me take another well-constituted College, with distinguished ecclesiastical Professors—in no sense a Lay College, but one for the training of the priesthood—I allude to Maynooth. Let us examine the possible application of the Bill to Maynooth under its two principles—the payment of students for attested secular knowledge, and the payment of the College for having taught them. In regard to Maynooth, for instance, I might approve the first principle and utterly reject the second principle. I beg the House to observe that there is not one word which would exclude Maynooth or other Theological Colleges from large endowments under the clauses of this Bill. By no practical process that we could devise could we, in such cases, separate secular from theological teaching in these priestly seminaries. If Maynooth, for instance, sent its pupils in tolerable numbers, like St. Stephen's Green, it might win some thousands a-year under the Bill. In such a case it would be useless to assert that we were not practically adding largely to the endowments of that already well endowed Theological College. I wish, again, to consider the two principles apart. I would not deny to any students coming from Maynooth the prizes which they might win in arts graduation simply because they were preparing for the priesthood. That would be to me a high recommendation. If we can enlarge the education of the priesthood in secular subjects, and bring it within the region of public education, so that the priest may become a cultivated citizen, I would rejoice in that result. But it is one thing to pay for the results of secular education in the form of prizes and Scholarships to the successful students, and another thing to pay large subventions to the strictly Theological Colleges teaching them, over which a University Senate could not possibly have control. Of course, payments to students may indirectly mean some sort of aid to the Colleges which teach them. But, in the one case, you have absolute security that you are paying for secular education; in the other, you are practically supporting Colleges which have a theological purpose. Of course, it may be argued that if we pay a theological student for taking a degree in arts, we do, in fact, give some degree of warmth to religion, which we desire to keep out in the cold. If I feed a sheep in order to produce mutton, some of the food, no doubt, goes to the wool which grows on its back; but my primary and main purpose is achieved notwithstanding this accident. If I am to starve the sheep because I cannot help part of the grass going into wool instead of mutton, I am unworthy of participation in the practical affairs of life. It is not such an accident that would prevent me, as an opponent of concurrent endowment, from paying to students money prizes for secular results, whether the students were lay or clerical. It would be a vast gain if the close education of the Irish priests were opened up to the enlarging influences of modern knowledge and thought, and if their secular education became an object of national concern and a part of the common education of the people. If this can be done through result payments to students without endowing Theological Seminaries, I am very willing to do so. But I am not prepared to endow even mixed Seminaries when they are entirely beyond public control or supervision. A well-ordered Lay College, under the immediate supervision of the University Senate, might properly be aided; but Ecclesiastical Seminaries stand on a wholly different footing. I know my Catholic Friends in the House protest that that is not the object of the Bill. Yet, the Bill by its clauses carefully excludes Trinity College and Queen's College from any participation in its benefits; but its wording is wide enough to include Maynooth, the Diocesan Seminaries, and all the monastery schools of Ireland, and, in fact, any boarding-school with 20 pupils. There is no limit to the affiliated Colleges. If they are of a like kind to many of the affiliated Colleges of the London University, there would be very small guarantee indeed of their well-ordered fitness for Collegiate Education upon a type that would compare favourably with Trinity College or the Queen's Colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway. Putting aside the College of St. Stephen's Green, where are the Lay Collegiate institutions in Ireland? Do they exist, or have they to be created? There are 18 diocesan and other Catholic Colleges in Ireland. Some of them are almost wholly devoted to the training of future priests; but others are mixed, lay and clerical. Let me take three examples of Colleges which profess to prepare for the degrees of the University of London, and, therefore, may be considered as likely to come under this Bill. The best College is probably St. Patrick's, at Carlow. It has five clerical and ten lay Professors. St. Stanislaus, at Thurles, also professes to prepare for the London degrees. It has 15 clerical Professors, and two lay

Mr. Macartney

Professors. Then there is St. Kieran's, at Kilkenny, which is connected with the London University by Royal Charter. It has nine clerical Professors, and five lay. Clongowes also prepares for London degrees, and I believe all its Professors are clerics. If we take the Protestant Magee College at Londonderry, as another College of the kind likely to be included, it has eight clerical Professors and two lay. Now, it may well be that a cleric is the best Professor you can have for a particular subject, but this would be an accident; while the rule of a preponderance of clerics in these institutions shows that religious teaching is of much more account than secular instruction. These Colleges are just now under the Intermediate Education Act, and as long as they continue to be so would be excluded from the Bill. But this Bill offers Collegiate prizes of such unparalleled magnificence that it would be their interest to affiliate themselves to the new University. Never in the history of the world was it proposed to start a perfectly new and untried University with such grand endowments. I should like to show how they would act. There are sectarian Colleges now affiliated to the London University. In fact, the very Irish Colleges likely to range themselves under the new St. Patrick's University, are actually in affiliation with London. But the London Alma Mater offer few inducements for affiliation except those resulting from the reputation of her degrees. There are a few open Scholarships; but, practically, no money is given to Colleges. Let us consider how the new University of St. Patrick's would work. I must make some assumption on which to base calculations. I assume, then, that the Roman Catholics, in return for their magnificent endowment, would think their University a failure unless it were as successful as Trinity College, Dublin, and drew together 300 fresh students in arts annually. I distribute 100 of these to the Central College in Dublin, and 200 to three provincial well-ordered Lay Colleges in the Provinces, to compare in efficiency with Cork, Belfast, and Galway Queen's Colleges. Of course, I am aware that the Bill speaks of a College with 20 students; but that is altogether so preposterous a limit for a well-ordered College to participate in great endowments that I cannot be unreasonable in asking 70 new entries for the Roman Catholic Provincial Colleges of the future. Unless this was achieved, there would be no justification for the new University. These three Colleges would, under the Bill, for 200 first year passes—calculating honours at one-fourth, exhibitions one-tenth—for 187 second year students, 167 third year, and 133 fourth year students—these decrements being the result of experience—receive as result fees alone in the single Faculty of Arts a sum of £22,464, or, in round numbers, £7,500 each College. Well, with such splendid prospects, have not the most liberal-minded among us a right to ask securities under the Bill that these sums shall not be frittered away among Diocesan Seminaries of second or third-rate rank, partly engaged in lay and partly in clerical teaching, but that well-ordered lay Roman Catholic Colleges shall be created, and then be clustered around the new University of St. Patrick? But, under the Bill, there is not one line showing that such is the intention or that such will be the working of the measure. If such well-ordered Lay Colleges were established, instead of the present Diocesan Seminaries of Ireland, no doubt, lay students intending to enter the liberal Profession would largely use them in order to procure a basis of liberal culture for their professional training. I am glad that the promoters of this Bill have seen, though, perhaps, not with perfect clearness, that any University in a poor country must chiefly rely on professional degrees. England is, perhaps, the only country in Europe in which Arts' degrees form the chief part of University training. This is because the students belong chiefly to the wealthy classes. In Germany, Belgium, Holland, France, Scotland, and Ireland, the Universities must and do devote themselves largely to professional training, and depend mainly upon it. Take one Profession alone—that of medicine. Of medical licentiates, only 3 per cent come from the teaching Universities in England, 30 per cent from those of Ireland, and 36 per cent from those in Scotland. In Germany, nearly all the professional men pass through the Universities. The poorer the country, and the greater the struggle for existence, the more must the Universities throw themselves upon professional training. The framers of the Bill have recognized this fact in their provision for professional degrees. They justly look at the Arts Faculty as a preparation before professional study is begun. But do not the promoters see in this wise recognition that their affiliated Colleges ought to be well-ordered Lay Colleges, embracing all the faculties, and that the Professors ought to be laymen, experienced and wholly devoted to the subjects which they teach? I know that Roman Catholics fear that while they gain knowledge they may lose faith. I, therefore, would give to their Colleges what securities were most agreeable to them for the preservation of faith and morals, provided these were not paid for by the State; but would make it a condition that the Colleges, with regard to secular instruction, were completely under the supervision of the University as to the curriculum of study, and as to the appointment of properly qualified Professors. I know that there are several of my hon. Friends in this House who would see even in such Colleges the cloven hoof of concurrent endowment; but, on the other hand, there are many who would gladly aid Roman Catholics to obtain a higher University Education, suitable to their wants, if they and their hierarchy would consent to give legislative assurances under this Bill that the affiliated Colleges are not to be Diocesan or Ecclesiastical Seminaries, but genuine well-ordered Lay Colleges partly under lay government and lay teaching. As the Bill is framed just now, there is no security whatever that such is the meaning or such the end sought. The organization of the Governing Body of the new University is on a liberal basis. Its introducer has rightly understood that it would be impossible for him to pass any Bill through this House which submitted the government of a University to ecclesiastical authority. Science and literature have flourished vigorously both in Roman Catholic and in Protestant countries, when their religions have allowed liberty of thought and action. But they have been equally strangled in both, as much by the Calvinism of Geneva as by the Popery of Rome, when ecclesiastical authority became paramount over the intellectual development of the nation. This Bill chiefly reposes upon the State. To the State, as proctor for the nation, the welfare of the Roman Catholic ought always to be as great an object of interest as that of the Protestant population, and, whatever be the form of Government, that feeling should remain the same. Under a Senate in which the State is so largely represented, the question in relation to a curriculum of study and examination ought always to be not "How will the Bishops like our scheme?" but "How is it best suited for the intellectual development of the Roman Catholic population?" At the same time, I cannot help remembering that Irish Governments have generally been favourable to the pretensions of Irish Bishops to get a preponderating influence in educational establishments. The first Charter of Maynooth College contained the condition that the Governing Body should always be half lay and half clerical. It is now wholly ecclesiastical. I intend to move in Committee that the graduates of the Universities should equal the nominees of the Crown on the Senate. I have a great belief in the liberality of well educated lay Roman Catholics. The students and pass-men of the Catholic College in Stephen's Green have shown a liberality of thought and culture far in advance of the ecclesiastical rulers of that institution. In the future management of St. Patrick's University, I would like to see a larger influence among its graduates, and a smaller influence among State nominees, who may possibly be appointed more in reference to political exigencies than to the higher interests of education. That, however, is a detail, and not a principle. But, to my comprehension, there is no clear enunciation of the only principle upon which I would feel justified in voting for this Bill—that the Colleges intended to be affiliated are to be Lay Colleges, under the complete supervision of the Senate of the University, as to its curriculum for lay teaching. Even then, I cannot say that I think the Bill will constitute a high type of University. There is too much about it of the Examining Board, and too little of well-ordered teaching, to suit my ideas of a good University. That which pleases my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) displeases me. But I do not intend, at this stage of the Bill, to state my objections to its proposed machinery. I would only now say that I see it will intensify the evils of examination to a great degree. The demon of examination, not only through Universities, but also through competition for public services, is beginning to prey upon the vitals of intellectual life in England, as it has already done upon those of France. Examination is, no doubt, necessary as an evidence of knowledge and of accuracy; but it is not the end of educational or professional training, but only a necessary evil connected with it. Education aims at giving slowly intellectual food, not more rapidly than it can be healthily assimilated. But examination defeats this healthy intellectual nutrition by forcing the student to cram in ill-assorted and mechanically accumulated learning. When education and examination are united in the same teaching institution this evil is at its minimum; but when the teaching College and the examining authorities are separated it rises to its maximum. Now, this Bill runs madly on examination. Before a student can become an M.A. he must stand five University examinations. If they are really worthy of academic rank, the student will be rendered intellectually sterile by the time he has attained his degree, and will be worth nothing to himself or to the nation in intellectual productiveness afterwards. This is not a chimerical, but very grave evil to be guarded against. In France, the incessant examinations stimulate the intellect into excessive activity during youth, and the discoveries and writings of youthful philosophers are brilliant but evanescent. After 40 years of age we look for them no more in modern France, because the brain has become prematurely sterile. Now, this must be guarded against in the case of Ireland, for we have to deal with a people excitable by nature, and liable to injury by mental as well as by physical stimulants. Now, I know what reply the Irish Members will give in regard to my criticism of this Bill, which I hope that I have not attacked in an unfriendly spirit. They will say—"You are unfair and illogical in refusing to our Theological Seminaries that State aid which is given to Scotch Universities with Theological Faculties." But I would remind them of a difference. These Theological Faculties had scanty aid afforded them during the reign of William III., and by the Treaty of Union the State is bound to continue this aid. But whenever the State has in modern times added to the resources of the Scotch Universities, as it did in 1858, it has distinctly refused to give any new recognition or support to the Theological Faculties; and whenever the State has aided a University in modern times, as in the case of the London University, it has distinctly refused to mix itself up with theological training. There was a time when theological teaching was the only thing thought worthy of State support; but that time has gone by. Will the new University Charter which is likely to be given to Owen's College in Manchester contain a Theological Faculty, or, if it did, would Parliament vote to it one shilling of State support? Roman Catholics ask us to legislate according to their sentiments; but they must recollect, when they ask the State to give large endowments for University teaching, that there are deeply-rooted convictions and sentiments throughout all parts of the United Kingdom that such State aid should be given for secular education alone. This is, no doubt, the profession of the Bill. But the stream of money is so overflowing, and the secular dam to keep back its waters so low and insecure, that it will rush over it, and fertilize all the Theological Roman Catholic Seminaries of Ireland. I believe that the day is past when the public feeling and conviction of this country would sanction such a result. Honestly anxious as I am to see higher secular education promoted in Ireland in accordance with the religious convictions of Roman Catholics, I cannot vote for a Bill which is so loosely constructed as to include all Theological Seminaries under the assumption that we are confining our aid to institutions for the promotion of secular education.

Mr. Lyon Playfair

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): As one of the Members for the University of Dublin. I desire to make a few observations on the Bill now before us. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Assheton Cross) will, before the discussion closes, speak on behalf of the Government. I feel that the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken must be under a misconception if he thinks that the Bill will work no injurious consequences to existing institutions. But the main object of the speech we have just heard seemed to me to make an amiable apology to hon. Members from Ireland for not supporting the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has given us some reasons for certain clauses in the Bill; but he has also given us some powerful criticisms against the major portion of it. In fact, it seemed to me, a considerable part of his remarks was addressed to the disarming of criticism upon the Scotch University Votes. As to the effect of the Bill upon existing institutions, no one who examines the matter with any care can question or deny it. The fact has been assumed, and must be admitted, that the Bill, if passed in its present state—and we can only deal with its present form, and I have heard no suggestion of modification—must obviously and immensely damage the Queen's University and the Queen's Colleges. Of course, it would be optional for all Roman Catholic students to withdraw from these. This would be regarded as only a legitimate exercise of free choice; but it must be borne in mind that—to use the words of the right hon. Gentleman—the extravagant prizes and rewards offered at the new University would subject the Queen's Colleges and University to a competition against which they could not stand for a moment. A clever student without an exceptional effort could, if diligent, under this Bill, acquire Scholarships, honours, passes, and a Fellowship, and win, in the aggregate, a sum of £1,100; while the equally clever student, laying himself out for every prize, could not win at the Queen's University as much as £200. And here, it must be obvious, is a kind of competition that must seriously impair the success of the Queen's Colleges. Then, it has been assumed that the University of Dublin will not be affected, or only to a very trivial extent, by the Bill. But this is an entire and complete mistake. The University which it is sought to call into existence would at once become the richest and best endowed in the country. At once it would become the richest; and how? It cannot be forgotten that the source of this great wealth is a source specially distasteful to Irish Churchmen—Irish Protestants, who have not yet learned to forget that it was the product of the Disestablishment of their Church, one grave and sad effect of which they recognize in the fact that by its operation many of the clergy of long standing and of high character at the present hour are in suffering and distress. This attempted use of the surplus funds of the Irish Church is open to another criticism, assuming that this Bill is right in principle, assuming there is a question to be settled, at all events it must be conceded that the funds produced by the disestablishment of one denomination should not be utilized for even the indirect establishment of another denomination. My remark just now, that this University would be the richest of the country, seemed to be questioned by a gesture from an hon. Member opposite; but there cannot be the slightest question of this. £1,500,000 is to be at once handed over; and the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), computing the minimum rate of interest, estimates this will produce £45,000 a-year. This is a tolerably good income, and even that is a larger public endowment than exists in the case of any other University in Ireland. But it is ridiculous to take it at this sum, because the Irish Representative Church Body have succeeded in placing investments so well that they, on an average, produce something over 4 per cent; and, taking this to be the case, the revenue of the University would receive by the transfer and without the slightest difficulty very little short of £60,000 a-year. There is another circumstance I may here add. The income of this £1,500,000 could not, even with the most prodigal expenditure, be spent at once. In four or five years they might get into good working order, and during that interval very likely some £200,000 savings would be added to the sum. So I may be justified in assuming that the revenue of this University, with its £60,000—as I think it would be, and which, at any rate, will not fall far short of £50,000—would be the largest in Ireland. And this large sum is to be absolutely in the unfettered control of the Senate, the constitution of which has been already criticized. Contrast this with what is done in the case of the Queen's University. There, every shilling of the money provided by the State is placed upon the Estimates, subject to criticism, and granted by Parliament. The gross amount of the payments for the University and the Queen's Colleges is about £31,000 a-year; and if we add to that the interest on account of building grants, about £5,000, then from all sources there is debited to the Queen's University and Colleges about £36,000 a-year. My hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket) has already referred to the incomes of Dublin University and Trinity College. They are something like £40,000 public revenue, with a few thousands from private revenues, together much under £50,000; so I am justified in my statement that the new University would be distinctly richer than the Queen's University and Queen's Colleges, and very considerably richer than Dublin University. A circumstance never to be lost sight of is that existing institutions are entitled to consideration, and it is not fair to handicap them too severely in the race. The Queen's University and Colleges charge very reasonable fees, I believe £8 or £9 a-year, and Dublin University charges very substantial fees, taking into account that the country is poor and the University going classes are, in Ireland, mainly professional. Dublin charges for matriculation £15, and charges 16 guineas a-year to each student—not large, perhaps, when stated to the House, but large when taking into account the circumstances of the country. But there is no provision in this Bill, and I do not know that there is under the Bill any necessity to charge a student of the new University one farthing; and so parents will have to consider the propriety of sending their sons to the Queen's University at moderate charges; or to Dublin University, where the fees are considerable; or the new institution, where not one farthing is charged, where the education is assumed to be liberal with result fees and prizes extravagant in value. It is obvious that very many would be attracted by this more than gratuitous University Education, and thus the two existing institutions must suffer. The mode of dealing with existing institutions is emphasized by the 18th clause, to which reference has been made. This is the clause which excludes the Queen's Colleges and Trinity from having, under any condition, any participation in the benefits of the Bill, or competing in any shape for one of the prizes. Now, this cannot be defended. This is not a part of the Bill which has been introduced much to the observation of this House; but, I suppose, other hon. Members who take an interest in the Bill will speak upon the subject. But I should like to know why this clause has been introduced; or, being in, how it can be defended? No University should object to fair competition. Dublin does not. Anyone who chooses may matriculate there without condition as to where he comes from; and, in fairness for ourselves, we ask that the Queen's University and Dublin University should be allowed to compete for prizes. Why, London University has seen her prizes carried off by Cambridge men, and others distinguished in the English Colleges, and the competition is, on the whole, a healthy one. There is no reciprocity in this. No matter what may be done in other institutions, Dublin University has no intention of closing its portals under the influence of unworthy jealousies. No matter whether this Bill pass or not, we shall not narrow the bounds of our competition. As a proof of the fair working of this, I may mention that at the recent examination for Fellowships a Moravian gentleman (Mr. Purser) was declared at the head, and next came a Roman Catholic gentleman of great attainments (Mr. Maguire), who will probably be a successful candidate next year. This is the result of the Bill for removing tests, because this same gentleman, Mr. Purser, was successful on a previous occasion, and was previously accredited first in the order of merit and elected for the Fellowship; but he had to forego taking it, because he could not accept an oath disagreeable to his conscientious convictions. Another part of the Bill, which again will largely affect the existing institutions, is the proposal of result fees. As well as I can understand the observations of the right hon. Member who spoke last—I am not going fully into the principle of result fees—but following his argument, I believe he stated that if ever this principle should be applied to University Education, it should be so applied as to exclude all institutions like Maynooth. All I desire to say on this principle of result fees is, that it is unusual in University Education, and only last year was it introduced into the Intermediate Education Act, where I trust it will work advantageously; but when it is attempted to apply it to the system of University Education, it is incumbent, I think, upon those who advocate its extension, to show that it can be applied without derogating from the true interests of academical learning, and without damaging existing institutions. It is obvious that, from an academic point of view, the principle cannot be applied in the case of a University without the exercise of the most jealous caution, and for this reason. If a College or a University are given a direct pecuniary bonus for each graduate educated within its portals, the institution will be subject to a grievous temptation to lower the standard of its examinations, in order to manufacture as many graduates as possible. What, again, is the effect of the result fees as stated in the Bill, even assuming they are somewhat modified, in reference to existing institutions? These will be still so heavily weighted in the race that it will practically be impossible, in many cases, for them to continue competing in many branches of learning in which they are very successful at the present time. Take the case of a College with 20 students, that is a College within the definition of this Bill. Suppose four men passed with honours in the arts and professional courses, 13 obtained ordinary passes, and three failed, that would secure an income for an institution with 20 students of £900 a-year—something like £45 income for each student. No College could stand in competition with an institution so subsidized; and, in fact, it would come to this—that it would be to the interest of the affiliated Colleges, so far from exacting fees from their students, actually to pay them to come and win these large rewards. I am disposed to think, from the manner in which the Bill has been introduced, that the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) does not intend that the measure should damage any existing institution. Many of the consequences of the Bill which I have pointed out were not, I believe, contemplated by the hon. Member. We are, nevertheless, bound to deal with the Bill as we find it. I take it as it has been proposed to the House, and before I close my remarks I cannot forbear one or two words on the extraordinary attempt to apply the novel principle of result fees to professional schools. However desirable it may be to encourage the study of arts and all liberal education in Ireland, and however necessary or desirable it may be to satisfactorily settle the pecuniary difficulties surrounding the question, no one, I think, can suggest that Ireland is not sufficiently professional. We have enough doctors, engineers, barristers—and if anything can be urged against us on the point, it is that we are too professional. There has been absolutely free trade between the five different medical licensing Bodies in Ireland; but if you disturb the balance by giving one or two of these institutions result fees, it is perfectly obvious that by these advantages you cripple and ruin other schools, and you will have an outcry from one end of the country to the other from those who have worked under free trade in medical education. It cannot be denied, when examined on principle, if the Bill passed in its present shape, with its professional result fees and prizes, the effect would be practically to empty the professional schools both of the Queen's University and Dublin University. It would be impossible for them to stand against the competition with result fees and other extravagant prizes against them. The Bill and its prizes would also have the effect of drawing away from existing institutions many of their Arts' students. In conclusion, I wish to remind the House that the University of Dublin is admittedly open to all, and is afraid of no fair, reasonable competition. It has never been illiberal; never taken a bigoted or intolerant part in dealing with any public question. Its portals are open to all religions, and if Roman Catholics come they are very welcome; while if they find from conscientious objections they cannot come, we deeply regret it. The University is always willing to consider any suggestion having for its object the extension and development of education; but, for the reasons I have given, as well as for other reasons the House has heard before, and will hear hereafter, I am unable to give my support to the second reading of this Bill.

MR. LEATHAM: Sir, the arguments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Gibson) bear mainly on a subsequent stage of the Bill. I do not rise, therefore, to endeavour to reply to them, nor, for that matter, to speak in favour of the Bill, but rather to attempt to show why I venture to think that we ought to pause before offering it our uncompromising opposition. Some hon. Members, no doubt, are prepared to resist, almost to the death, anything and everything which they are led to believe has received the assent of the Pope and of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland, however reasonable and moderate the proposition may appear to others. My argument is not addressed to them, but rather to hon. Friends of mine with whom I have had the honour and pleasure of voting and acting for more than 20 years; from whom I should separate myself with pain even for a single day, but who seem to me, judging from speeches which they have made out-of-doors, to press their opposition to this measure beyond the point which even the most rigid interpretation of our principles requires. Now, what is the object of this Bill? Is it not to give to the Roman Catholics of Ireland University Education in a form which is worth having, and, at the same time, in a form which they will accept? To give it in any other form, I need hardly say, is not to give it at all. Now, first, as to whether the proposed education is worth having? Some hon. Gentlemen are opposing the Bill upon this very ground—and with some degree of plausibility—for we all remember that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich introduced his Irish University Bill, one of the most formidable objections which were brought against it was that the proposed University was a teaching University, from whose teaching almost every object of human interest was carefully excluded—for example, philosophy, and modern history. Now, if the exigencies of the case were such that, in order to bring his Bill within the concurrence, as was supposed, of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, the right hon. Gentleman was compelled thus to limit and thus to emasculate the education given; what are we to think of my hon. Friend's Bill, which, as we understand, has received the assent of the Roman Catholic hierarchy? Are we to have true science, and are we to have true historical investigation? If we are, then we must congratulate the Roman Catholic hierarchy upon a great march of opinion; if we are not, then I must plainly tell my hon. Friend that I shall be unable to support his Bill at a subsequent stage, because I cannot vote what is, practically, public money for the endowment of a University Education which, in the view of the public, is no University Education at all. My hon. Friend will, no doubt, tell us that the State will have taken ample guarantees under his Bill for the bona fide character of the education to be given. At this stage of the Bill, I think we may assume that this is the case. At all events, before the Bill becomes law, we shall have ample opportunities of seeing that it is so. And, upon the assumption that the Bill will give to the Roman Catholics a University Education of the highest grade, it is hardly possible to exaggerate the importance of what we shall have done. We shall have done that which, in my humble opinion, may change the whole current of the history of Ireland. For what is it against which we have had chiefly to contend? Before all things, against the consequences of our own misrule—against fanaticism, exasperated to the utmost by our whole political demeanour towards Ireland for centuries. But, in the introduction of the highest University training, in a form which will be heartily embraced by the Irish people, I see, by-and-bye, the end of that fanaticism, because it will be the end of the ignorance upon which it is based: I see, at all events, an honest attempt to wipe away some more of the traces of an injustice which is past, and I discern the dawning of a nobler era for Catholicism itself, when the "faith which can remove mountains" shall dare to leave the twilight, and ascend into the day. Well, if there be any truth at all in these anticipations, what importance are we to attach to the arguments of those who are opposing this Bill upon the ground that the affiliated Colleges will be sectarian? What we are endowing is not the Sectarian Colleges, but the effort of the State to wring from the Sectarian Colleges an education which shall be worthy of the name. Believe me, we have not done enough for University Education in Ireland, in offering it to the Catholics in a form in which, if they were not Catholics, they ought to accept it. If this were all that we had to do, we have nothing to do, for we have done it already. But will anyone seriously maintain, after what took place in the House a few years ago, that the University question is not a real and living question in Ireland? Now, when a question becomes a living question, there are only two courses open to you. You must solve it somehow, or you must refuse to solve it anyhow. Of course, you could draw yourselves up and say—"Unless we can solve this question in strict accordance with our principles, or with the interpretation which we choose to put upon our principles, we will not solve it at all, and Ireland may remain without a congenial University until Doomsday." But it is precisely because I am a stickler for religious equality that I cannot bring myself to this ungenerous and, as I think, this unjust conclusion. We have, no doubt, done much for religious equality in Ireland; but, with all our doing, we have left what is, perhaps, the greatest inequality of all untouched. The Presbyterian is in full enjoyment of his University, and the Episcopalian is in full enjoyment of his University; but the Irish nation, which is neither Presbyterian nor Episcopalian, but Roman Catholic, is in the enjoyment of no University at all. Now, this is a great and very painful anomaly. There is no use in blinking the matter. The disability is a religious one. It is because these people are Catholics, rigid, conscientious, and consistent Catholics, that they are debarred from all the advantages of our Universities. I may be told, perhaps, that this is the result of prejudice. "Prejudices," said one of the most acute of modern writers, "are the stop-gaps in the hedge of truth, and, like other stop-gaps, are often more difficult to get through than the hedge itself." And when prejudices are national, when they become the prejudices of an entire nation, they seem to me to rise almost to the dignity of principles, and to command respect. At all events, the statesman who would legislate just as though they did not exist is no statesman at all. But are these merely prejudices, after all? We all know that the Roman Catholic attaches an eternal importance to the belief in particular dogmas. Why should it be matter for surprise or ridicule that he should hesitate to plunge his son, at an age when we are peculiarly susceptible of new impressions, and when religious principle is proverbially weak, into an atmosphere which is so completely impregnated with Protestantism as to be almost deadly to the belief in particular dogmas? Why are we to draw a sharp line round all who feel this hesitation, and say—"You must throw over your apprehensions, or there is no University Education for you. You must do violence to the conviction that in sending your son to our College you are sending him, I may say, with his religious life in his hand, or you must forego all the emoluments and distinctions, all the social prestige, which goes with high University training?" And we are told to do this in the name of religious equality, forsooth! Every College and University which the Catholic is debarred by his scruples from entering is piled high with endowments. There are to be no endowments for those which he might enter; even although the fund from which it is proposed to take those endowments was, in its origin, essentially and exclusively Roman Catholic. Now, perhaps, those who are the most prominent in their opposition to this Bill are Nonconformists. I should like to ask my Nonconformist Friends what has been their experience of the opening of the old Universities in this country? We have opened the Universities, and the sons of Nonconformists have flocked to them. What has become of their Nonconformity? It is notorious that, in many cases, the air of the place has been too strong for it, and that they are adorning the pulpits of the Church. Well, if this be the case, why taunt the Roman Catholic with his fears? Now, if these fears are to be respected, the measure which gives University Education to Ireland must either be a measure granting everything which the Catholics desire, which this does not; or it must be a measure of compromise, which this is. Now, the question which I wish to put to my hon. Friends is this. Granting that this measure must be one of compromise, are we ever likely to see a compromise, so harmless, so little dangerous, or which makes so small an inroad upon our principles, as that which is now before the House? My hon. Friends seem to me to argue as though the legislation of the last 50 years had been one unbroken series of triumphs for the principles which we profess. There can be no greater fallacy. The Irish Church Act itself, which is the fulcrum upon which you work, was a compromise, and a compromise of the most liberal and generous kind. If it had not been so—if you had really stripped the Church naked—then I could understand the argument against levelling up in place of levelling down. But if by the very Act to which you appeal as your great precedent, and which was passed in a Radical Parliament, with the full light of voluntarism turned upon us, we practically re-endowed the Episcopal Church, why should it be so monstrous to take some portion of the remaining spoils of that Church and to endow with them a non-sectarian University, just because the endowments will filter and trickle down from the University which is not sectarian to the Colleges which are? I am afraid that I must tell my hon. Friends a home truth. They hardly approach this question with dispassionate minds. The thought will obtrude itself, not simply and solely what is just, but how will this measure affect the future of Roman Catholicism in Ireland? How will it help our Protestant Propaganda? For my own part, if I could entertain such a thought in such a connection, I should despise myself; I should feel that I was a traitor to my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, and never again, so long as I lived, should I have the courage to ask a Roman Catholic elector for his vote. And this leads me to say just one word before I sit down, with reference to the taunt which, happily, we have not heard to-day, though we have heard it loudly out-of-doors. I mean that those of us who are not prepared to turn our backs at once upon this Bill are actuated by the desire of purchasing, by a sacrifice of principle, the Roman Catholic vote. I am surprised that such a taunt should have been heard at all. I think that it speaks ill not only for the moral and intellectual acumen, but the political acumen of those who use it. There are hon. Members who have enjoyed the honour of a seat here, it may be, for 20 years, and who have never hesitated, when the occasion required it, to give votes which must and which have insured for them the active hostility of every Roman Catholic elector. Against which of us is this taunt levelled? It may be that by the course which we are now pursuing we may provoke the anger of some of those with whom we have habitually acted; it may be that we shall incur the displeasure of certain formidable organizations; but the very fact that we are willing, if necessary, to run these risks, ought to clear us at once from the imputation that we have arrived at our decision upon selfish or unworthy grounds.

Mr. HOLT said, it appeared to him that the speech of the hon. Member who had just addressed them was one in favour of concurrent endowment, and had been made in view of a General Election, under the conviction that there were Roman Catholic voters in Huddersfield. It seemed to him (Mr. Holt) that the Bill before them was a new method for dealing with an old subject. The method, as far as he could learn, was not one which found particular favour with the country. The opposition to this Bill was not great at first, but had grown day by day more powerful, for the more people saw of the measure the less they liked it. As to the subject, the House was pretty familiar with it. Successive Governments had burnt their fingers in endeavouring to grapple with it, and they had found that any possible solution of it was impossible. Hitherto the demands made from Ireland in respect to that question had come from the Roman Catholic Prelates, who desired to have a University in which they should have absolute and exclusive control. He would do those gentlemen the justice to say that their claim had been advanced in terms perfectly plain, if not, somewhat peremptory—terms which were liable to no misapprehension and admitted of no compromise. The result was that the country had learnt to look on all negotiation with the Roman Catholic Prelates with the gravest suspicion; and he hoped they should hear nothing more of anything of that kind. The occupants of the Treasury Bench must be aware that recent rumours, whether well-founded or not, had caused the greatest anxiety among many of their followers. The negotiation with the late Lord Mayo was not forgotten; and it was no secret that there had been a fear out-of-doors that the Government might possibly attempt to meet Irish obstruction by concessions to Ultramontane claims. He, for one, had been most unwilling to attribute any such policy to the Ministry. It was perfectly natural that such an idea should be encouraged by hon. Gentlemen opposite; for they knew how to take advantage to the utmost of any mistake of that kind, and they would be glad to see the Government meeting the country with a shattered Party and a damaged reputation. He congratulated Ministers on their having the courage and prudence to decline to take up the question; but he hoped they were aware that the country expected, and their interests required, a frank disavowal of any such policy. If by such concessions, or promises of concessions, they hoped to get the support of the Irish Party, they would soon repent of their error. It would be a support on which they could never rely, and it would cause the alienation of friends whose confidence they would never regain. Hitherto, as he had said, the demand had been made by the Roman Catholic Prelates, and in discussing the question he could not ignore the fact that that demand had never been withdrawn. When he was asked to vote for this Bill the question arose in his mind, what was the need for such a measure, and what object was it to attain? In introducing this Bill, the hon. Member for Roscommon said it was intended to meet the demand of the Irish laity based on conscientious convictions, and also to provide a system of University Education for a number of young men who were ready and anxious to avail themselves of it. The hon. Member did not say the Bill was one which would satisfy the demands of the Irish laity; but he did say that it was a compromise, and was not to be regarded as a complete measure; but he did not state who were the parties to the compromise, nor whether it was to be of a permanent or a temporary character. The Bill might be looked upon as an instalment of the demands of the hierarchy—an instalment of a debt hereafter to be paid in full. The measure was so drawn as to veil its sectarian character, but it must be read in the light of the speech of the hon. Member who introduced it; and, in that light, it seemed to him (Mr. Holt) its policy was clear. The reasons which had been given to induce the House to adopt it seemed to him to be totally inadequate. If the necessities of the Irish laity might be satisfied with something less than a denominational University, the House ought to be shown why the existing University institutions of Ireland did not satisfy or could not be made to satisfy those necessities. If they were asked by this Bill to provide a secular University, he asked why they should not improve and extend the existing Universities. The Queen's University and the Queen's Colleges were non-sectarian, they were easy of access, they were not full, they were capable of expansion, and if more accommodation than they could afford was needed, they could be enlarged. The Queen's Colleges appeared to be gradually making way with the Irish people, notwithstanding the serious opposition of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. If that opposition were withdrawn, he understood there would be a large accession of students to those Colleges; and their steady progress ought not to be interfered with by a scheme like the present one. The hon. Member for Roscommon had not shown that the system proposed by the Bill was superior to the existing institutions; and, therefore, he would submit that if the demand which came from Ireland could be satisfied with a non-sectarian institution they ought to avail themselves of the existing institutions, and reform them if necessary, but not to create a new University. But was not the defect to be remedied rather this—that the existing institutions were not sufficiently narrow and exclusive. They were asked to provide by that Bill to establish and endow Colleges which would, or might, be Sectarian Colleges, to be affiliated to a colourless University which should hereafter assume a denominational character under the control of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. That was the scheme which the Bill was calculated to promote; and he was, on that account, compelled to give it his opposition. It was, as he conceived, a scheme for a Roman Catholic University in disguise. The Bill contained no Conscience Clause, and no provision for freedom of religious opinion in the case of the students and Professors in the proposed new University of St. Patrick. In short, there was nothing to prevent that University from becoming the most Ultramontane institution in the world. What were the safeguards provided by the Bill? It provided that there should be no payment in respect of religious instruction, no theological degree, and no theological Chair. These were really all the safeguards in the Bill, and they applied rather to the University than to the Colleges. He objected to the proposed definition of a College, and contended that there was nothing in the Bill to prevent the Senate of the new University from becoming a body composed exclusively of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics. The University itself would be of an exclusive character, as its Scholarships and Fellowships could not be competed for by persons belonging to any of the existing Universities. He could not think that a Bill containing such provisions would commend itself to the approval of Parliament. The speech delivered by the hon. Member for Roscommon in introducing the Bill contained a demand for concurrent endowment, based on a threat of ceaseless agitation. Surely, the hon. Gentleman must have forgotten that the noble Lord now at the head of the Government had pledged himself, in 1869, and again in 1873, to oppose anything like concurrent endowment? He denied that those who objected to the Bill were committing an act of intolerance. They had no objection to Roman Catholics having perfect freedom for the education of persons of their own faith. What they objected to was the establishment by the State, and the endowment with public money, of an institution to be exclusively under the control of the Roman Catholic priesthood. That was not only a religious, but also a political, body, whose avowed aim was to destroy the Protestant Constitution of this country. But, putting aside all considerations of a religious kind, he maintained that the establishment of a Catholic University was not the way to promote sound, liberal education in Ireland. On that point he would not trouble the House with arguments, but would give them a few facts, which would show the inferiority of the secular instruction given in Colleges and Seminaries which were under the control of the priesthood. In his Report to the Italian Government, in 1870, on the Colleges and Seminaries of the City of Rome, the Italian Minister of Public Instruction said—

Mr. Leatham

“The well-known fame of the various Colleges induced us to believe that if certain studies were thought dangerous or useless, and were, therefore, prohibited or neglected, others, on the contrary, were cultivated with so much the more assiduity, and we expected a solidity and profundity of knowledge in certain branches of learning that would almost compensate for the effect of the timid, mistrustful restriction of others. . . . As for mathematics, we can say all we want in two words. The pupils who were examined were found in a state of total ignorance, not having the slightest idea either of geometry, algebra, or arithmetic. Such was the instruction of young men who came from the schools of the humanities and rhetoric, and who asked to be admitted into the first or second class of the Lyceum. After six or seven years of study, according to the particular school from which they came, all their instruction was limited to an imperfect knowledge of Latin.”

With regard to the study of history and geography, the Report said—

“The students who were examined showed that they had not the most elementary knowledge of the earth's form and surface. They were even ignorant of the geography of Italy—as seas, mountains, rivers, and populous and celebrated cities. ‘Questioned by me,’ says a Professor, ‘as to what they knew of geography, some did not even know the meaning of the word; others, after having assured me that they had studied it for two years, said that the Adriatic was a mountain, Sardinia a city, Milan the capital of Sicily,’ &c. ‘One told me Brutus was a tyrant, another that Dante was a French poet.’”

That was the result of putting education in the hands of the Roman Catholic priests; and he believed this country would never approve of putting the education of Ireland in their hands. The advocates of denominational education in this country were sometimes taunted because they refused to extend the system to Ireland. His answer was that, in his opinion, denominational education was itself a compromise adapted only for a country where there existed an Established Church. In Ireland there was no Established Church, and, with disestablishment, all reason for compromise came to an end. In 1869, Parliament was distinctly told that State endowments of religion in Ireland were to cease for ever. Moreover, the denominational system, as it now prevailed in England, would not be acceptable to the Irish Roman Catholics. He sympathized with the desire for religious education; and if the Roman Catholics demanded to send their sons from Roman Catholic Seminaries to take degrees at Queen's University or at Dublin University, and to compete there for prizes, he should offer no objection; but he could not for one moment consent to support a measure that was calculated to establish a third University in that country. He believed the Bill now before the House was calculated to have that effect, and that he should express not only his own conviction, but the opinion of the majority of his constituents and of his countrymen by recording his vote against the proposition.

MR. RICHARD: I confess, Sir, that I listened to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) with no little surprise. I do not in the least impugn the perfect purity of his motives, or wish to insinuate that he is moved, in the course he has taken to-day, in separating himself from his political Friends by any electioneering purposes. But how he can reconcile the speech he has made with the Nonconformist principles which he has so often and so eloquently advocated, wholly passes my comprehension. It seemed to me that his speech went entirely in favour of denominational education, and, as the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Holt) has said, for concurrent endowment. I do not see how, on the principles which my hon. Friend has laid down, he could resist a proposal to take the remnant of the fund accruing from the disestablishment of the Irish Church and apply it to the endowment of the Roman Catholic priesthood. When my hon. Friend said that those who opposed this measure had more regard to the effect it might have upon their Protestant propaganda in Ireland than for what was just, I venture to say that he made an utterly unfounded imputation. My hon. Friend had justified the reluctance of the Roman Catholics to send their children to the Queen's University by the alleged experience of the Nonconformists in the English Universities. He said that the results of the Nonconformists sending their sons to the Universities was that their convictions as to the faith of their fathers had been undermined. I utterly deny the accuracy of that statement. I believe that, in the immense majority of cases, the young Nonconformists who have gone to Oxford and Cambridge have bravely held their own in religious matters. But if it were otherwise, if Nonconformists could not stand against the arguments which might be brought to bear by those who were the advocates of Establishment, why let Nonconformity go. I do not admire what Milton calls "a fugitive and cloistered virtue," which is afraid to come into the open field where truth and error are in conflict. I, therefore, regret to hear our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects declaring that they could not avail themselves of the advantages of mixed education, because they were afraid that if they did so, their young men would no longer adhere to their faith. I wish I could convince hon. Gentlemen from Ireland by whom I am surrounded, how sincere is the reluctance—I might almost say the pain—I feel in being obliged to oppose them on a matter that is so near to their hearts as this University Bill. If any proposals had been laid before us that I could have supported with any show of consistency, I was prepared to lend a willing and indulgent ear to such proposals, in the hope that this difficult and perplexing question might be finally settled. But I cannot accept this measure without practically repudiating principles which I have professed and proclaimed all my life, and recanting everything I have said in this House, ever since I have had the honour of a seat here, whenever questions connected with education have come up for discussion. What are those principles which we Nonconformists have always avowed? I do not know that I can explain them better than in the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). He was speaking in this House, many years ago, when an Education scheme of the Whig Government was before the country. The Nonconformists had opposed that scheme on account of its strongly denominational character. Their agitation against it had been stigmatized in the House by a distinguished man, as "the clamour out-of-doors." Adverting to that phrase, my right hon. Friend said—

"Just recollect, when the whole of the Nonconformists are charged with clamour, what they mean by being Nonconformists. They object, as I understand, at least I object, to the principle by which Government seizes hold of public funds to give salaries and support to the teachers of all sects of religion, or of one sect of religion; for I think the one plan nearly as unjust as the other. Either the Nonconformists hold this opinion, or they are making a sham. They object to any portion of the public money going to teachers of religion belonging either to the Established Church or to Dissenting bodies; they object to receive it themselves. . . . Their very principle is that the Government has no right to appropriate public funds for the purpose of religious instruction."—[3 Hansard, xci. 1094-5.]

That is the principle on which I take my stand. I can assure my hon. Friends from Ireland, for myself, and I believe

I am correctly interpreting the sentiments of the Nonconformists if I associate them in the assurance, that we are not moved in the course we are taking on this occasion by any "No Popery" feeling, by any bigoted hostility to the Roman Catholics or the Roman Catholic Church. No doubt, ecclesiastically, we, the Nonconformists, are at the furthest remove from the Roman Catholic Church. Nor do I affect to believe that the points on which we differ are trivial and unimportant. On the contrary, I think they are of the gravest character in their influence not only on religious, but on political and national life. But we Nonconformists have always maintained that, however widely we may differ on such matters from our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, they are entitled to perfect equality of civil and political rights with ourselves. And we have always aided them in acquiring and maintaining those rights. When they were engaged in the struggle for Roman Catholic emancipation, we stood loyally by their side, and contributed in a considerable degree to the success of their agitation. I am anxious to make this point clear, because a few years ago a very able and distinguished man, Lord O'Hagan, in pronouncing an eloquent eulogy upon the character and services of Mr. O'Connell, stated incidentally, but quite mistakenly, that the Dissenters were opposed to Roman Catholic Emancipation. I think I can disprove that allegation by the most conclusive evidence. At that time there were in existence two Bodies which might claim to be emphatically representative Bodies of Nonconformists. One was the deputies of the Three Denominations. The other was the Board of Dissenting ministers of the three denominations—Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists. Both these Bodies petitioned in favour of Roman Catholic emancipation. The Petitions of the latter Body were raised into great prominence by the speeches made on their presentation in the House of Commons by Lord John Russell, and in the House of Lords by Lord Holland. If the House will permit me, I will cite two or three sentences from the speech of Lord Holland on that occasion. After stating who the petitioners were, he said—"They were distinguished for their attachment to the Reigning Family. They were decidedly opposed to the errors of the Church of Rome. They had always been keen in detecting anything like an approach to civil or ecclesiastical tyranny, and the first to oppose and defeat the attempt. Such were the men who now approached their Lordships, praying them to extend the principles of civil and religious liberty to all classes of His Majesty's subjects. He would confess that if he required any new fact to render him favourable to the great measure of Catholic Emancipation, if he required any authority to induce him to support that cause, the authority of such men would weigh more with him than that of almost any other body of men in the Kingdom."

Mr. Richard

If any additional evidence were required, it might be found in the language of Mr. O'Connell, who, in 1829, the year after Roman Catholic Emancipation, came of his own accord to a meeting of Protestant Dissenters held in the City of London, and used these words—

"I have come here as the representative of the warm-hearted feelings of the people of Ireland. I stand here, in the name of my country, to express our gratitude, in feeble but in sincere language, for the exertions made on our behalf by our Protestant Dissenting brethren. I have come here to express my thankfulness for the support which they have given to the great cause of my country."

And ever since, we have also helped them in their endeavours to assert their rights. My honoured friend, Mr. Miall, was one of the first to call attention in this House to the evils of the Irish Church Establishment, and there were no more strenuous advocates of the Disestablishment of that Church than the whole body of Nonconformists, and that expressly on the ground of its injustice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. But, certainly, we did so with no intention or expectation that the funds of that Church were to be handed over piece-meal to another Church. The best proof I can give that I am not opposing this measure from any sectarian motive, is to point to the course I have always taken when Bills for English and Scotch education were before the House. I resisted strongly and consistently the denominational character given to those measures. And for myself, I can say with all sincerity, that if every penny of the money proposed to be dealt with under this Bill were to go, not to Roman Catholic, but to Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, or Congregational Colleges, I should none the less strenuously oppose it. My objection is not that the money should pass to Roman Catholic institutions, but that it should pass to sectarian institutions. There may be hon. Gentlemen in this House who may find it difficult and embarrassing to vindicate their own consistency in this matter. When hon. Gentlemen opposite were strenuously contending for denominational education in England and Scotland, we did not fail to warn them that the time would come when they would have to confront this Irish question, and might then be placed in a position of considerable perplexity. It is not for me to find an apology or justification for them. But we have nothing to reproach ourselves with.

“ Let the galled jade wince,
Our withers are unwrung.”

We have not swerved from our consistent protest against endowing religious opinion with public money, against promoting sectarian education by authority of law. At the same time, I am bound to say that the argument from English and Scotch precedent does not hold good to the extent that is sometimes assumed. It does not hold good at all as respects the higher education. So far from confirming and extending sectarian education in Universities and Colleges, the whole tendency of our legislation has been to unsectarianize these institutions, to make them less denominational and more national. And even in regard to primary education, though that is far more denominational than I like, there is in the introduction of the Conscience Clause a distinct and formal recognition of the fact that schools receiving public money are not to be exclusively and purely sectarian. But it may be said—“ This Bill is not an endowment of sectarian education.” Well, let us see. No one pretends to deny that the affiliated Colleges, into whose hands will pass by far the greater part, I believe the whole, of the money proposed to be appropriated, will be denominational institutions of the most pronounced character. Well, what does the Bill propose to do to these institutions? It first gives rewards in the form of exhibitions, scholarships, and fellowships to the students trained in them, and to that I, for one, have not the slightest objection. But it goes much beyond that. It pays directly to the institutions themselves, result fees for all the students brought up within their walls who pass examinations. It pays lecturers for teaching the students. It pays for providing and keeping in repair Colleges, museums, and laboratories for the use of those institutions. And this is done, observe, by grants that are final and absolute, without the protection of a Conscience Clause, without power of revision or control by Parliament, without the right of inspection by the State, without which no public money has ever been given to educational institutions. And to tell me that, after all this you do not endow these institutions, is really to make a demand on one's simplicity and credulity which I cannot yield to. It may be said that you only pay for the secular education given in those institutions. Those who say that, do not understand what the essential theory of the Roman Catholic education is. No Roman Catholic will say it, for the very gist of their contention is that there ought not, there must not, there cannot be any separate secular instruction—that all knowledge and learning must be saturated with Catholic teaching; so that hon. Gentleman must not try to pacify their consciences on the plea of only paying for secular instruction. I am willing to give Roman Catholics everything that I would accept for myself. The Nonconformists of this country have a considerable number of denominational institutions of their own, where they teach their own theological and ecclesiastical views. But they support those institutions out of their own pockets, and they would be ashamed to come to Parliament to ask for a grant of public money to support them, on the plea that along with those theological and ecclesiastical views they teach also some amount of useful secular knowledge. If such an impossible thing could be imagined as that the present Government, or any Government, should come down to this House and propose an endowment for those Dissenting denominational Colleges, I am confident that not a fortnight would elapse before every Member of this House that has Nonconformists among his constituents—and there are none who have not some—would be overwhelmed with letters and Petitions from those Nonconformists, praying to be saved from such a degradation. But I should be wanting in candour if I did not add that, apart from these objections, which, I urge, on the special grounds of my principles as a Nonconformist, there are other objections I feel to this measure, though I do not wish to implicate anyone else in the avowal I am about to make. I object to this Bill because its tendency, I may fairly say its object, is to place the education of the youth of Ireland wholly under priestly influence, and that influence deriving its inspiration from a foreign and alien source. No one could have studied the history of this question of Irish education without finding that the difficulty has always been here. I believe that if the Irish people were let alone they have no objection to avail themselves of the mixed education offered to them. When Mr. Stanley, afterwards Lord Derby, brought his scheme of National Education before this House, the leading Catholic Representatives, including Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Shiel, and Mr. Wise, accepted it with satisfaction and gratitude; and I believe the Queen's Colleges would have been accepted by all, as they were by some, were it not a dead set had been made against them by the Roman Catholic hierarchy and priesthood. That this opposition sprang, as I have said, from an alien and foreign source, is clear from the distinct utterances of the Roman Catholic Prelates themselves. Monsignor Woodlock, Rector of the Catholic University, writing in 1866, with regard to a proposed affiliation with Queen's University, to the Catholic author of a Lay University scheme, says—

"Permit me to say that I think you have fallen into two or three mistakes. First, in supposing that the Bishops would for an instant entertain the thought of affiliating their University to the Queen's University as at present constituted. . . . Where is the line to be drawn in a system of affiliation? I answer, it is to be drawn so as to secure for the Catholic University the positions it is entitled to at the head of the Catholic education in Ireland. Less than this the Sovereign Pontiff will not sanction.

In a pastoral of Bishop Derry, in 1865—

"Our Most Holy Father has caused to be sent to all Bishops a list of more remarkable errors condemned by him in the course of his Pontificate. To one or two only of these errors do we mean to call attention. They relate to education; and it may be observed that no one thing appears to alarm the Holy Father more than the false principles on which it is sought to found educational systems. He sees the conspiracy that has been organized to withdraw the education of youth from the influence of the Catholic Church. . . . It is expressly enjoined on us to use our best efforts to keep youths away from Colleges of that description. Parents and guardians of young men are to understand that by accepting education in them for those under their charge they despise the warnings, entreaties and decisions of the Head of the Church. Adhering to the discipline in force in this diocese, we once for all declare that they who are guilty of it shall not be admitted to receive the Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist or of Penance while they continue in their disobedience."

Mr. Richard

Far be it from me to say one disrespectful word of the Head of the Roman Catholic Church. I feel no such disposition, and, if I did, it would be unpardonable to indulge it in the presence of so many hon. Gentlemen who hold his office and character in so much reverence. But, perhaps, I may say this without offence, that we, as a Legislature, owe him no allegiance, and I confess I do not relish the idea of our legislation in this House being controlled and dictated by a foreign sacerdotal Power. It has been said that we ought to make concessions. Well, I am willing to make concessions, but they ought not to be one-sided. At present, the attitude of Irish Members, and of the Roman Catholic hierarchy by whom they are controlled, is one of unbending and uncompromising exaction. Again and again have efforts been made to found a system of superior education, but they have peremptorily rejected all those efforts. Nothing will satisfy them but a system endowed by the nation and controlled by the priesthood, and against such a system I, for one, most earnestly protest.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, this House ought to determine for all time if that were practicable, at any rate so far as it was possible, the lines upon which education in Ireland should be based, and he fancied, at least he had thought, they had already determined that great question. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), in far from a complimentary speech, had said the Government had been coquetting with Ireland on the subject, and by letters and telegrams had been asking on what conditions the question could be settled. He did not intend now to inquire into that matter. It might be true, or it might not be true; but this they did know, that the great majority of the people of the United Kingdom had determined upon what lines the question should be settled. Both front Benches had endeavoured to settle it, but in vain, because the majority of the people in England and Scotland, and a large class in Ireland, were determined that it should not be settled by the direct endowment of a Roman Catholic University in Ireland. This was a question of fact. We had disestablished the Irish Church, and had also established a national system of education. On what ground were we to endow a Roman Catholic University, when we would not give any endowment to Roman Catholic primary education? It had been hoped by this system that religious animosities in Ireland would as far as possible be put on one side, and that all classes should be brought up together, so that they might live together without those heart-burnings which were sometimes engendered by denominational education. These things being so, no Government would be able to deal with this question on the lines of this Bill. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), in his admirable speech, hinted at the affiliation of any number of Roman Catholic Colleges with St. Patrick's College in Dublin. But before this House granted a farthing, it must be shown that there was some absolute necessity for the endowment. In looking over the Papers, and in carefully considering how the Queen's Colleges had worked, so far as he knew and had been able to learn, so far from being the failure which hon. Members had stated, they had practically been a great success, and there had been educated in those Colleges, since the time they had been formed, between 2,000 and 3,000 Roman Catholics, which was quite as many as could be expected, considering the number of Roman Catholics in Ireland who might be supposed to wish for higher education. Had those students been tyrannized over? Had their faith been tampered with? That he most positively denied. So far as he was aware he had only heard of one man, and that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), who complained of the education he had received in the Queen's Colleges, and he was surprised that any man who had such an education as the hon. Member had, or, no doubt, he might have had, should stand up in the House and denounce those Colleges. At all events, it could not be denied that they had received him within their walls. He believed that it would not be for the interests of Ireland that a great denominational College should be endowed, but that the better plan was to encourage, in every way unsectarian places of education such as the Queen's Colleges. He would not say a single word against any Roman Catholics, nor did he wish to exclude them from any of the benefits of education; he only hoped that the supporters of the Bill would believe that their opponents in Scotland and Ireland as well as in England alike desired that Roman Catholics should share all the benefits of citizenship; but he felt that the Bill had been rightly characterized by the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) as a retrograde measure, and that the question could never be settled upon the lines laid down by the hon. Member for Roscommon. He could not for a moment suppose that the House—or, indeed, any Parliament—would allow the funds of the Disestablished Church, which by a clause in the Disestablishment Act were to be made available for purposes totally different from this purpose, to be dealt with, not as the House might order, but according to the dictation of others. The proposed solution of the difficulty would not for one moment be tolerated by the country, and he should, therefore, vote against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the hon. and gallant Baronet who has just sat down has spoken with great energy, and with the directness with which he always addresses the House. When he speaks we always know exactly what he means. He never leaves the House in doubt about his views or opinions. He has addressed the House, not simply on his own behalf; but he has spoken on behalf of the majority of his country, not only present, but future, and he declares most positively that there shall be no alteration made in the system of Irish University education, either by this Government or by any other. That is a statement of very great comprehensiveness; and I observe that the hon. and gallant Baronet bases it upon an assumption made not only by him, but by others, that my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) proposes by his Bill the religious endowment of Roman Catholic Universities in Ireland. But my hon. Friend has disavowed any such intention, and I will address myself to that part of this subject, and give my reasons for believing the hon. Member is correct in his views of the results of the Bill. It appears to me that this most difficult matter must be considered not only as an educational question, but also as an Irish question. Undoubtedly this is a matter upon which a good deal of disagreement exists, and I do not altogether agree with the remarks of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lyon Playfair). He treated the question almost entirely as an educational question, and many of the criticisms which he made, I think, demand the serious attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. But the right hon. Gentleman's objections appear to me to be eminently matters for consideration in Committee. Now, will the House let me look at the question for a moment as an Irish question, and as a subject affecting legislation for Ireland by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. We have heard a great deal with regard to the Roman Catholic Bishops, and the influence they exercise. To my mind it is not a question of the influence of the Roman Catholic Bishops in respect to this question, but I believe it is a question upon which the Roman Catholic people of Ireland have a conscientious opinion. I respect the views of the Roman Catholic Bishops. It would be most unreasonable and unwise that we should not give their opinion and wishes full weight. I do not, however, consider that their wishes and opinions alone ought in any way to determine the conclusions of this House on the educational question, or any other question. But I am forced to believe that in this matter the large majority of the Irish people of all classes, and especially of that class most deeply interested in higher education, do agree with their Bishops, and that we have to deal with them and not with their Bishops. It is a mistake to say that they are under the control or order of the Bishops in the matter. They are acting, so far as I can see, from their own voluntary and sincere conviction, and not from the conviction of the Bishops. The large majority of Irish Roman Catholics—that is, the large majority of Irishmen—tell us this—"We want University education." My right hon. Friend has clearly shown in his speech why they should want it—why the circumstances of Ireland, poor as they were, especially demand it. They say—"We want higher education and University education, but we prefer a religious education combined with secular education." The hon. and gallant Baronet says they ought to prefer mixed education. Is he not a little more enthusiastic for a mixed system for the sons of Irish parents than he would be for the sons of English parents? Many of us have a strong feeling that a mixed system would be better. We see its advantages; but how are the religious animosities, which are said to exist, to be got rid of by this united system? After all, however, it is not what the English Members say—not what the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) says—not what the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) says. What we have to consider is what the Irish people themselves prefer. Do they prefer this mixed system? "No," they reply—"It is a fundamental conviction of our faith that religion and education are inseparably connected." I am not saying whether that is right or not, but we have to deal with the Irish view of the matter. But then they go on to tell us that, notwithstanding that conviction, they are our fellow-citizens and fellow-taxpayers, and, therefore, they have a right to their share of State aid and State acknowledgment in the settlement of this education question. That appears to me to be the first fact to take into consideration; but there are two other facts which I think the House ought not to lose sight of. If we had let Ireland alone in the past, if we had not conquered her, and treated her for centuries as a conquered nation, who would deny that the University of Dublin at this moment would have been as completely a Catholic institution as it is now Protestant? Again, if we were to repeal the Union, or pass the measure of Home Rule which is pressed upon us, and which I trust we never shall pass, who would deny that not merely this Bill would be passed by Parliament sitting at St. Stephen's Green, either upon the principles of Home Rule or upon those of repeal of the Union, but a very much stronger Bill, or a Bill, I may say, very much more objectionable to Englishmen? Well, then, this is an Irish demand with which we are brought face to face. The question is how to deal with it. I do not think it is a question of votes either in this House or out of it. We very often say that matters are not Party questions, and the statement is often received with incredulity; but I think this is not a Party question, and for this reason. What with English and Scotch opposition on the one hand, and Irish support on the other, the cleverest political manager or electioneerer would be at fault if he attempted to deal with this subject solely with regard to its Party results, and I would defy him to make his calculations. I am quite aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr, and the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh, have no notion of viewing it in that light. But there is a much deeper question than the one whether English Members or the Conservative Party, or any special candidate would gain or lose by any attempt to settle this University difficulty or by supporting or opposing this attempt to settle it, and that is, how legislation for Ireland by this Parliament ought to be conducted, how the union which we wish to preserve can be cemented, and how the desire for disunion can be discouraged and diminished? I think we are beginning at last to realize what ought to be the conditions of union between Great Britain and Ireland. What are, in fact, those conditions? That the wishes of the Irish people, expressed through the majority of their Representatives, ought to be considered, and most fairly and carefully considered. I do not say that those wishes ought to be conclusive in any matter; but I do say that their clear and unmistakeable expression makes a strong prima facie case in favour of any measure, and throws the onus probandi on its opponents. I think that when this House rejects the clearly expressed wish of the Irish people, stated through their Representatives, it ought to have good reason to believe that the fulfilment of that wish would be contrary either to justice or to high policy—and by high policy, I mean the safety and prosperity of the Realm. I think you, the Irish Members, have a right to tell us that in purely Irish matters we should not legislate for you, or for Ireland, merely in accordance with our preconceived opinions, or prejudices, or sentiments. But you have no right to ask us to do an unjust thing, or what we believe would be contrary to the interests and the security of the United Kingdom. Perhaps I may be allowed to appeal to my own conduct. I resisted the demand for Home Rule, because I believed it would greatly injure the welfare of the United Kingdom—of Ireland as much as or even more than of Great Britain. But I say that there would be a stronger argument for Home Rule than any argument used by the hon. Gentleman who so ably brought it forward if we got into the habit of taking the ground taken by the hon. Member for Lancashire (Mr. Holt) and by the hon. and gallant Baronet who has just sat down, that we should decide Irish questions purely in accordance with English opinion, when Irish wishes are not contrary to the principles of justice and equality. I feel that we could not put a greater weapon into the hands of Home Rulers than to treat Irish questions thus—a weapon which they would use with effect, and with which they would strike with force on the sentiment of the English and the Scotch people as well as on that of the people of Ireland. I have said that in resisting a demand we ought to have good reason to believe that it is contrary to justice or high policy. Now, with regard to justice—I am but speaking my own opinion—but I confess that I think justice and fairness are on the side of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. I cannot see why it is just that a Roman Catholic student should not have quite as good a chance of getting his degree and obtain quite as much State help in the acquisition of high University culture as the student who is not a Roman Catholic. [Admiral Sir WILLIAM EDMONSTONE: So he may now.] So he may now, says the hon. and gallant Admiral. So he does not now—and why? Because, in accordance with the religious sentiments and opinions in which he has been brought up, and in obedience to the convictions of his parents, he prefers to have his secular teaching combined with religious teaching. The hon. and gallant Admiral may be right or not, but the youth of whom I am speaking, is not the hon. and gallant Admiral's son, and he is not to lose the State help because he differs from him. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), that to inflict such disadvantages upon him is in reality to foster a religious disability. To inflict it is not an assertion of the principle of equality, as is so often stated, but to maintain the contrary of the principle of equality. To my mind there is no religious equality in putting A in a worse position than B, because A is a strict Roman Catholic, and B is not. Now I come to the question of policy. There are many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House who strongly believe that this University Bill would increase the power of the priests in Ireland, and that that power is a power of evil, and, therefore, this Bill must be opposed. I think there is some little misapprehension with regard to the power of the priests, and I am not sure that, after all, we should find Ireland much easier to govern if this power of the priests were entirely destroyed. But however that may be, I do not believe that this Bill will increase their power for evil. It is possible that the influence of the priests—especially of the Ultramontane priests—may be, in many respects, opposed to civilization, and what I count the spread of true knowledge, and even to the principles of free government. But when is the power of the priests a bad influence for having that effect? When it can be brought to bear on uneducated men, on half educated men, or badly educated men. It is powerful just in proportion to the want of education of those on whom it is used. Remember this, that you cannot force your Roman Catholic youth to attend your Protestant or Secular Colleges; you cannot make them go to the Trinity College in Dublin, or the Queen's Colleges in Belfast or Cork; but, practically, you have to choose between their going to a Roman Catholic College or no College at all. It will be the fault of this House if the secular education obtained in these Colleges is not comprehensive and sound; and depend upon it, even if that secular education be given by priests, or by professors who are under the guidance of priests, the youth who gets it will have his mind widened, and not narrowed. He will be less bigoted and less prejudiced than if he did not get it. If, then, there be no ground either of justice or high policy why this demand should not be granted, I would ask English and Scotch Members whether there can be a more purely Irish matter than the promotion of Irish education out of Irish money? My hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon does not bind himself to this particular fund of the surplus of the Irish Church, but no one will deny that it is an Irish Fund; and when it is stated that it is a breach of faith to apply it to Irish education—which I do not think it is—it is such a breach of faith as a very large portion of the House has already committed. It is precisely what was done last year, and what was proposed to be done by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) when he brought forward his Bill. I think it will be exceedingly difficult for the Government to say that though they proposed to apply the Irish surplus to intermediate education last year they would not appropriate it to University education this year, because, last year, there was no breach of faith committed, and this year there would be. The last speaker thinks we ought to leave the matter alone. We cannot leave it alone. It comes on every year, and, I suppose, must do so until it is settled. We seem to be driven to the conclusion that some such plan as that proposed by my hon. Friend is the only possible mode of settlement. I should myself have preferred only one University in Dublin, but my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) proposed this and failed, mainly owing to the opposition of the present Government. My noble Friend the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) remarked how much better it would be to affiliate the Roman Catholic Colleges to the Queen's University. There would be many advantages in that plan. I am not sure that it would not be the best. But does he propose to give the same State aid to the Roman Catholic College which is now given to the Queen's Colleges? Without such aid, I think his proposal would be almost a mockery; and with it, would not the opposition be as great as to the present Bill? We have not heard yet what the Government intends to do. When the Bill was last under consideration the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a very ingenious speech; and if he meant that no hon. Gentleman on either side should understand what course he was going to take, he was completely successful. The Attorney General for Ireland has taken care to do no more to-day than defend Trinity College. I think it is hardly generous for the champion of that very rich and powerful institution to look with so much suspicion on the proposed University, and I cannot but believe that he is needlessly alarmed at the prospect of future competition. For instance, he seemed to have calculated what sums might be attained by a student at the new University, and he stated it was £1,100. I think all these matters require careful consideration as to whether they are not on too large a scale; but the Attorney General for Ireland must remember that calculations have also been made as to the value of the prizes at Trinity College; and I have been told that if you go to an actuary, he will say that the value of a fellowship at Trinity College may be £9,000 or £10,000. The hon. Member for Roscommon would, no doubt, be only too delighted, as I should be myself, if the Government would take the matter in hand and bring a Bill forward. I fear they will not. The hon. Member for Lancashire (Mr. Holt) warned them not to try to settle the matter because of the effect the attempt would have on their own Friends; and the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) who last spoke, seemed inclined to take the same view. He alluded to the negotiations which were said to have taken place at the beginning of the present year; and I hope that when the Home Secretary speaks, he will tell us that there is some public reason why those negotiations should not be disclosed to the House, or will say whether it is or is not true that a man in very high authority—no less a man than the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—I am only speaking of what the rumour is—that an offer was made on behalf of the Lord Lieutenant—or, rather, that a message was sent by him to gentlemen having the confidence of the Roman Catholics—asking them whether a Bill almost precisely the same as the present one would receive their support? I think that is a matter we ought to know something about. Possibly the Government may say that the negotiations were of a private character, and cannot be made public; but, in my opinion, when matters have gone so far, the Government should make a clean breast of it. The House will not be surprised to hear if I say now that I shall feel it my duty to vote for the second reading of the Bill. But, in doing so, I vote for the principle and the principle only; and I understand the principle to be, in the words of a Petition I presented, that “the religious convictions of a Roman Catholic are to be no bar to his educational career.” That the State is in this matter of University education to look to the secular teaching, and to the secular teaching only. That it is to require the same qualifications for a degree from an undergraduate at a Roman Catholic College as from an undergraduate at any other College. That it is to appropriate State aid simply and solely in payment for secular results. That it is not to concern itself with the questions how far the students may or may not prefer to combine their secular with their religious, or denominational teaching, or whether that denominational teaching be Roman Catholic or Protestant. I believe that to be the principle of the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. But when the Bill comes into Committee I think that the statements of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) will have to be most carefully considered. He says, in effect, that there are provisions in the Bill which, under the colour of secular endowments, give a religious endowment; and we shall have to consider whether payments to individual students, which certainly seem to be large, and also whether the payments to Colleges warrant this statement. My hon. Friend (the O’Conor Don) disavows any intention to obtain any religious endowment, and when the Bill comes into Committee I shall hold him to his assurance, and I have the most perfect faith in its sincerity. He has shown in this House again and again that he is not the man to say one thing and mean another. And now a word as to our present Parliamentary position. It seems to me to involve the fact that both Parties and the Governments of both Parties have failed in dealing with this difficulty. We have it now brought forward with all the disadvantages of its being brought forward by a private Member. I do not think a private Member can be held responsible for omissions as a Government might be. I do not think, for instance, the omission of a Conscience Clause is such a fault in my hon. Friend’s measure as it would have been if brought forward by any Government. But we have the advantage that now we have the Irish demand stated by Irishmen in a proposal carefully considered, and, from their point of view, as reasonable as they think they can make it. It is now quite late in the Session, and we have a good deal of work before us; but I doubt if we have any work so urgent as the settlement of this Irish demand. I hope there will be a Division to-day. Even if my hon. Friend succeeds in carrying the second reading, the Bill will still require to occupy much of the time of the House. I have observed it stated in the Press that my hon. Friend wishes to rush the Bill through the House; but I am sure my hon. Friend is far too sensible a man to have any such idea, and the matter is far too difficult to be disposed of in that manner. But the great thing, after all, is that there is an opportunity of settling this difficult question. Have we anything better to do? If we succeed we shall relieve a somewhat barren and dreary Session of the reproach of having done almost nothing. It would be a very great credit to the Government to have this question settled, even by their affording help to a private Member, and that credit I should not begrudge them. Although I do not agree with the Bill exactly as it is proposed, I appeal to hon. Members on both sides of the House to read it a second time, with the intention of fairly considering in Committee all objections that may be urged. None of them seem to me to affect the principle of the Bill; and I think the House ought to be willing to sacrifice some time, and give some trouble to the solution of a question which it is necessary to deal with, and which the present affords an opportunity of dealing with in a satisfactory manner.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Although my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is present, it is impossible for him to speak now, having already spoken in this debate. I should, therefore, like to offer, on behalf of the Government, and on my own behalf, a few observations before this debate closes. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has appealed to the Government and the House to settle this question, and he treated the matter as if the solution was very easy; but I would ask him whether he could settle it among his own Friends on the bench on which he sits, and whether, if we came to discuss this question in Committee, he could offer on any one clause the united support of those Gentlemen with whom he acts? He has stated that it is a question which ought to be treated as an Irish question, and so ought to be carefully considered. I most entirely agree with him in one observation which fell from him—namely, that any Irish question on which the large majority of the Irish Members bring before the House, with positive evidence that they are united in asking the consideration of the House, a matter so brought forward ought to receive the most careful consideration of the House. I entirely agree with that. I am one of those who would not impose a civil and religious disability on any of my fellow-subjects, whether in Ireland or in any other part of the United Kingdom; but when the right hon. Gentleman pushes his argument further than the mere words, and goes on to say that because this demand is supported by a large number of Irish Members, we are forced to adopt it without consideration, he is putting before us an entirely different question. If we accept that principle as a whole, of course, we accept Home Rule and everything else; and the argument which justifies him going on that ground, quite irrespective of the merits of the case, would, of course, support him in any demands he made on any other subject. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Yes.] The right hon. Gentleman says "Yes;" but I differ from him, it being a question of high policy, and, as I think, injurious to the Empire; and what we have to consider, when such questions come before us, is, whether the measure brought forward is consistent with the principles of justice, and is required by justice to the Irish people, and also whether it is consistent with the high policy which is demanded of a Government. We must ask, in considering this question, whether the measure brought forward so fairly by the hon. Member for Roscommon is necessary in order to do justice to our Irish fellow-subjects, or not. That is not a question to be decided merely because Irish Members say it is so. We are all to decide the question for ourselves by the dictates of common sense, and with the most full and fair and candid consideration which we can give to it. But, when we come to this question of high policy, then I must remind the House that there is a question of high policy involved in this Bill, which was put forward by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr Richard), and it is contained in the clause which gives the endowment to the University. That is a question of high policy on which the opinion of Irish Members has been taken again and again, and they have joined with the Liberal Party, and a great number on this side of the House, to affirm that this practice of endowment for religious purposes shall not be allowed to go on any further. I am not going to follow the right hon. Gentleman through all his criticisms; but I wish to state, on the part of the Government, as thoroughly as I can, one or two points on which they feel strong objections to the Bill—objections which I will put to the House for their consideration. Some of them have been stated by the Attorney General for Ireland; but there are also some questions of principle, on which I think the House will be nearly unanimous. In the first place, the hon. Member for Roscommon, when he brought forward the measure, himself admitted that it was an inherent evil of his Bill that in his scheme he had to propose a third University for one single nation. On that particular point, the Government have undoubtedly a strong opinion that the creation of the third University is a great evil, and that, if this matter is to be dealt with at all, it had better be dealt with on some other principle than that. I do not, and the Government do not, agree with the principle of affiliated Colleges, as proposed in this Bill. I cannot help thinking that, if the University question is to be dealt with at all, it had much better be dealt with without a measure of that kind restricting the University examinations, as such affiliations must necessarily do. On behalf of the Government, I also must say this is not a question to which, after the understanding of 1869, they could consent that Irish Church surplus funds, or any of them, could be applied. True, the hon. Member for Roscommon says he does not care from what source the funds come, provided he gets funds. But there is another question to be considered. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, while saying he would vote for the second reading of the Bill, could not pledge his support to any one clause, and when we got into Committee we would find ourselves completely at sea, and even without his guidance as to what clauses should be passed, and what not. Now, we cannot read the Bill through without seeing that, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh, it is practically a theological endowment with State money, which we are asked to sanction by passing this Bill. I should have thought that, at any rate, the practice of money coming from annual grants for this purpose had been swept away when we cleared the ground for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church by taking away the Maynooth Grant. What has been the policy of the Government, and of all Governments of late years, in regard to this matter? The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge have been thrown open. There is no endowment for any religious teaching of any sort in the London University. A proposal has been made for the establishment of a University in the North, and we have not had the slightest hint or suggestion that any endowment for religious purposes from the State could possibly be obtained. The whole tendency of modern legislation has been the other way, and the House has set its face against any such endowment, for religious purposes, whether with respect to Roman Catholics, or to any other denomination of Christians. Then the question comes, what is the precise nature of the Irish grievance, and what is it that the Government are asked to support? It has been said upon one side, on that point, that all the Roman Catholics, if they choose, may go to the Queen's University or Trinity College, Dublin. I quite agree with that, as far as it goes. You cannot say that the funds given to the Queen's Colleges form an endowment for any denomination. It is a State endowment to an institution to which all parties are free to come, whatever their religious opinions may be. But, even with this fact before us, we find that out of 4,500,000 of inhabitants in Ireland, the great majority of whom are Roman Catholics, there are about 1,250,000 belonging to those classes in which University education would be required; but that, as has been stated, there are out of that large number only about 300 at present in the enjoyment of University education. I quite agree that it is of great service to the State that you should go even beyond the pale of those who naturally expect University education, in order to place facilities in the way of those who, in ordinary circumstances, would not go to a University—that is, in cases where distinguished talent or aptitude was shown; but, taking the figures as they have been given, we have the fact that the Roman Catholics, although they may, to a certain extent, have taken advantage of the Queen's University and Trinity College, Dublin, yet have not, as a body, done so to the extent that might have been expected. You must take people as you find them. We may say to the Catholics—"We have made you a fair offer, we want you to come, and we cannot understand why you do not come." But the fact remains that they do not come. I see no reason why the Roman Catholics should not come and receive this University education; but it must be admitted that the Roman Catholics, whether by the advice of the priests or not, do not take that advantage of these Queen's Colleges which they were expected to do. That being so, the question is whether any remedy can be found for that state of things? After what I have said regarding the Bill itself, I am quite willing to admit that there is a particular grievance pressing upon the Irish population, and that it undoubtedly ought to be remedied. It is clear that if Roman Catholic students do not go to those institutions to which I have referred, the only way they can get their degrees is to come to the London University, and that is a question which ought to be taken into serious consideration. Therefore, we are willing, and nobody on either side of the House would be unwilling, to remove, as far as possible, any real and substantial grievance which rests on the Irish population, subject to those conditions to which I have alluded in taking exception on the part of the Government to the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon. It is quite true, Sir, that in the earlier part of the Session, when a great number of measures were brought forward, some of which would take a long time in passing, we came to the conclusion—in which, I think, we have been fully justified by events—that there would be no time in the present Session of Parliament fairly and adequately to consider this question. We had just passed an Intermediate Education Act, and we wished to see how it would work. I think we may congratulate ourselves upon that measure having been a success. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, and the Government joined with him in coming to the conclusion, that it would be unwise, for these reasons, to bring forward any measure on this question, looking to its extreme difficulties. Now, has anything happened to afford ground for changing our views in that matter? The hon. Member for Roscommon has brought forward a measure which has been much discussed in Ireland and out of it. I have pointed out the serious objections we entertain to that measure on the question of endowments; but there is another question which also presses on the Government considerably. We understand that a great agitation has taken place in the North of England in favour of a Northern University being formed, and a Petition will be presented to the Queen, asking that a Charter may be granted for it. I do not want to anticipate for a moment the advice that may be given by Her Majesty's Government with respect to that Petition when it is presented; but, undoubtedly, it is a matter seriously to be considered whether, if that Petition should be brought forward in such a way that it cannot be resisted, we should give facilities for establishing such a University for the North of England without saying anything at all about the state of University education in Ireland. Under these circumstances, and bearing in mind the objections I have raised to the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon, the Government have come to the conclusion that it would be right, at all events, to put in form their views of what might be done on the question of Irish University education; and the Lord Chancellor will, to-morrow, ask leave, in "another place," to introduce a measure on that subject.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. MORLEY wished to see some proposal that would give a guarantee against this measure dragging them into a system of ecclesiastical endowment. Not only had obstacles been removed out of the way to Oxford and Cambridge Universities, but these Universities themselves were vying with each other in extending their benefits. It appeared to him that what was good for England was good for Ireland; but if there were impediments that were not consistent with the ecclesiastical opinions of Irishmen, he thought that greater facilities ought to be given. Therefore, if they could get into Committee, he would vote for the second reading of the Bill. He would accept the assurance of the hon. Member for Roscommon that he was prepared to make large concessions. He objected to the theological part of the Bill. He objected to the 18th clause, and he objected to so enormous an amount of public money being transferred to this object; but he should be glad to give his support in obtaining a measure which would secure the result they were all aiming at.

THE O'CONOR DON wished to know what was the concluding sentence of the Home Secretary's speech, as it had only been imperfectly heard? Did he understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Lord Chancellor would, to-morrow, in the House of Lords, introduce a Bill dealing with University education in Ireland? [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS assented.] Then, under these circumstances, he thought it was undesirable that they should go to a division on the present occasion, and he, therefore, begged to move the Adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(The O'Conor Don).

MR. SHAW appealed to the Home Secretary for a distinct explanation of what he had promised.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: What I said was, that we had strong objections to many parts of the present Bill, some of which I stated, and that, therefore, we should vote against the second reading; but, at the same time, I stated that the Lord Chancellor would, to-morrow, in "another place," and on behalf of the Government, introduce a Bill upon the subject of University education in Ireland.

MAJOR NOLAN asked, whether there was any chance of the provisions of the Government Bill becoming known this Session, or would the Bill be just read a first time in dummy form, and never get printed at all? Would the Bill be printed and circulated?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Oh, yes.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I hope that a division on this important subject will not take place under any misapprehension or misconception. The right hon. Gentleman has stated the objections of the Government to the Bill, and has just announced their intention, in consequence of what has taken place, of bringing in a Bill, and I think that they ought not to be anxious to have an opportunity of voting against the present measure; but that they should be perfectly willing that the proposal of the hon. Member for Roscommon should be considered at the same time, and in competition with their proposal. It appears to me that my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon was perfectly justified in bringing forward his Bill; but only for this reason, that the Government had shown no disposition to undertake the introduction of any Bill on the subject. Now, however, we know that the Government do intend to lay such a measure before Parliament; and, under these circumstances, I think my hon. Friend has exercised a wise discretion in agreeing to postpone the consideration of his own proposal until he sees how far that of the Government goes. I cannot conceive that in any part of the House there will be any desire to force a division. We should divide in complete misapprehension, if we were to do so now. I should, therefore, think there will be an unanimous agreement to await the provisions of the Government measure before we arrive at a conclusion on this Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that if no one else opposed the Adjournment of the debate he should, because he knew it was only desired in the interest of a measure to which the majority of the House objected.

MR. COGAN trusted the House would unanimously agree to the Motion for Adjournment. He confessed he did not, after the Home Secretary's speech, look with any strong hopes to the Government measure as likely to be satisfactory. His belief was, that the postponement of the measure of the hon. Member for Roscommon, and, consequently, of legislation to remedy an admitted grievance, would cause great dissatisfaction in Ireland. He complained also that the Home Secretary had not given any answer to the Question of the right hon. Member for Bradford as to the negotiations which were said to have taken place between certain persons connected with the Government, and persons supposed to be in the confidence of the Catholics in Ireland, and the promise which the Government were alleged to have held out of bringing in a Bill on the subject of Irish University education; if this was so, some information ought to be given to them on the subject. He entertained strong hopes that this question would be dealt with by the Government, as it was a measure of justice. He urged the House to adjourn the debate, as was proposed by the noble Lord the Leader of that side of the House; and he trusted that, in the event of the debate being adjourned, the Government would give facilities for its being resumed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think we are entitled to know what the proposals of the Government are before we adjourn. The Government has placed the House in an unusual, and, I must say, in an unexampled condition. The Government has been in the habit of treating this House with surprise, and I think a better device, a better concealed secret to themselves, has never yet been accomplished; but it has been a surprise accomplished at the expense of the time of the House. If Her Majesty's Government intended to bring in a University Bill, why is it brought forward on the 26th of June? Why was it that the Government told the hon. Member for Tralee, months ago, that they did not intend to bring forward a measure in regard to this subject? What has the Northern University to do with the question; and what are the circumstances to induce the Government in a single sentence at the end of a speech to state that they must now do what for months they have been steadily refusing to do? Are we ever to get to the bottom of the secret and the mystification of this Bill? We have not heard what were the negotiations that have taken place between the Government and the Irish Bishops on the subject of University education. All of a sudden, we hear what the Government have to tell us as regards this question. Why have we been debating all day? If the Home Secretary had got up immediately after the first speaker to-day, the whole matter would have been at an end, and we might have been engaged on another subject. Why have we sat for nearly six hours, and then, after 5 o'clock, to have this announcement on the part of the Government made? And yet the Government complain of a waste of public time. The public time of Parliament has never been more wasted. First, there is the forcing of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon to introduce a measure which has brought about a two days' debate, and which has led to all sorts of negotiations; and all the time it was in their power, and it was their duty, to introduce a measure on the subject. I want to know whether this is a ten minutes' University Bill to meet the exigencies of the debate, or is it a well-considered measure which the Government have had in their pocket during the whole of this discussion? If it is a ten minutes' Bill, I do not know where is the sagacity of Her Majesty's Government; but if it is a well-considered Bill which they had in their pocket, I hardly know what to think of their candour. It is certainly the most extraordinary way of dealing with Public Business on a question of such importance I have ever known; and I think, under the circumstances, we are entitled to know what Her Majesty's Government are going to do with regard to this question of adjournment? I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give us an explicit answer to that Question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has indulged in a good deal of criticism, very much in his peculiar style, to which I do not feel it necessary to reply. I had risen with the hon. and learned Gentleman to express what our feeling is with regard to the question of adjournment. What we feel regarding the Bill has already been expressed through the mouth of the Home Secretary. It is that, having very carefully considered this Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for Roscommon, having listened to his explanation, and considered the views expressed since the debate commenced on the second reading, we have come to the conclusion that it is impossible for the Government to accept this Bill, even as a basis for any measure upon this subject, and, therefore, that it is essentially necessary for us to vote against the Bill. My right hon. Friend has stated in brief and terse, but in perfectly clear, language, what it is we object to. We object to the proposal for a third University. We object to the system of affiliated Colleges. We object to anything in the nature of religious endowment. Although we have been told by some speakers that they supported the Bill in the expectation that when it got into Committee it might be largely amended, yet we see no possibility or probability of such an amendment as would bring the Bill into a form in which we could approve of it. At the same time, feeling that we are called upon reluctantly to reject the Bill proposed by the Irish Members in order to deal with a real Irish grievance, we have felt that it was our duty to consider whether we could not offer to Ireland what we thought might be done in order to meet that grievance. We are asked—Why not propose it at an earlier period? We had thought that this was a matter which it were better not to attempt to deal with this year, and that it might have stood over; but when we were pressed to give a vote, which we do most reluctantly, against a measure which is proposed in a temperate way with considerable authority by the Irish Members to meet that which we cannot but consider a grievance, we thought it was but reasonable that we should say what we ourselves propose. If we were merely to content ourselves with saying in speeches that we objected to this measure, but that we would be ready to vote for some other, we should be doing a thing which would not be very convenient to the House or the country, and we thought it was far better that we should bring forward our counter-proposal, which will be introduced in the regular form of a Bill and laid before Parliament, and about the provisions of which there need be no mistake at all. As to this question of adjournment, there is no time for two divisions now. If the House will come to a decision upon the merits of this Bill which we take by itself, we are prepared to express our opinion; but a division on the question of adjournment is not expedient, and I think it would be far better that such an Amendment should be withdrawn, and that we should rather go at once to a division on the second reading of the Bill. As far as the Government are concerned, however, it is a matter of indifference to us whether such a division is taken or not; but it must be thoroughly understood that if there is to be an adjournment, the Government cannot be expected, and will not consent, to give another day for the renewal of the debate.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA rose to address the House, when—

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

SCHOOL BOARDS (DURATION OF LOANS)

BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HANBURY, Bill to amend the Elementary Education Amendment Act of 1873, by reducing the period during which the repayment of Loans contracted by School Boards may extend, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HANBURY, Mr. PELL, and Mr. REGINALD YORKE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 219.]

House adjourned ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 26th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PRIVATE BILL—Referred to Select Committee—London Bridge.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Consolidated Fund (No. 4) *.

Second Reading — Trustee Acts Consolidation and Amendment * (98); Dispensaries (Ireland) * (88).

Committee—Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) * (76-129).

Report—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment (83-130).

Third Reading—Metropolitan Public Carriage Act Amendment * (105); Children's Dangerous Performances * (122), and passed.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND).

NOTICE.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : My Lords, I desire to give Notice that I propose on Monday next to invite your Lordships' attention to the subject of University education in Ireland, and to the present arrangements under which University degrees are conferred in that country, and to present a Bill on the subject.

SOUTH AMERICA—CHILI AND PERU—
LETTERS OF MARQUE—THE HOS-TILITIES.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he could give the House any information with respect to the reported issue, or threatened issue, of letters of marque by Bolivia?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: A report to the effect that a proclamation of letters of marque had been issued by Bolivia came to us from Chili some time ago. On the other hand, I have received to-day a despatch from Lima, stating that the Bolivian Agent in Peru was ignorant of any such proclamation having been issued, and was quite certain that no such idea would be acted upon. Communication with Bolivia itself, as your Lordships know, is not a very easy matter; it is almost entirely an inland State; what coast it has, or had, is separated from it by a large extent of desert, and that coast is now entirely in the hands of the Chilians. I cannot think that there is anything serious in the report of the threatened issue of letters of marque from a State without a seaboard.

DEPOSITION OF THE KHEDEVE.
QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR: I wish to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, Whether it is true that the Khedive has abdicated, or if he has been deposed?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My information is that the Khedive was deposed by command of the Sultan this morning, and I am informed that a subsequent telegram—which I have not seen—announces the installation of Prince Tewfik.

LONDON BRIDGE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose to move that the Bill be read the third time that day three months. The noble Earl said, that when the Bill was passing through its previous stages he was not aware of the importance of the question at issue. The Preamble of the Bill declared that it was desirable to widen London Bridge with a view to the traffic which passed over it; and there was a clause giving power to the Corporation of London to carry out the work, without specifying in any manner the form or extent of the proposed alterations. It was a serious objection to the Bill, that Parliament should be asked to give such unlimited powers even to the Corporation of the City of London, because, with such powers conferred on them, they might deal with the Bridge as they pleased. There was a model of the alterations in the House, but there was nothing to prevent them from entirely departing from it. This model had been prepared, not by those who opposed, but by those who promoted, the Bill; and, therefore, it was to be presumed that the work was shown at its best, but to that model he was content to appeal as a full and sufficient proof of the vandalism which it was proposed to perpetrate. The present Bridge was built some 50 years ago by Sir John Rennie, costing, with the approaches, something like £1,500,000 sterling. It was quite as fine a Bridge in its way as was Waterloo Bridge, which had been described by Canova as one of the finest bridges in the world. According to the model of the promoters, it was proposed, in order to give additional width to London Bridge, to throw out, to the extent of 11 feet on either side, huge iron footways; and iron could not be so combined with granite without destroying the architectural character of the structure. The Council of the Institute of British Architects had condemned the proposed method of widening the Bridge, and declared their opinion that, if it was to be widened, the right way to do so was by means of masonry in architectural conformity with the structure as it now stood. They expressed their belief that the execution of the work in the manner proposed by the promoters of the Bill would involve the destruction of the original design of the Bridge. Unfortunately, in a case like this, where no individual rights were assailed, and the public interest alone was concerned, a Bill of this sort might pass through all its stages unopposed and even unnoticed. But their Lordships were a tribunal to which on public grounds he now appealed; and they were well qualified to judge of matters of taste. He urged them not to sanction the passing of a measure of this kind, which would enable the Corporation to apply such an unseemly patchwork of iron to the present granite structure. He also appealed to the Government, who had vetoed the Bill of last year—not on grounds similar to those on which he now asked them to act; but in consequence of the dispute between the Treasury and the Corporation as to the rights of the Crown, and who had the power of putting a veto upon the measure again. The only argument that had been advanced in favour of the proposed alteration was that the requirements of the traffic rendered it necessary. But, as far as he had been able by inquiry to ascertain the facts of the case, he denied that there was any such necessity; and, in any case, he maintained that the method of widening contemplated by the promoters of the Bill was not the proper method. He was assured by most competent eye-witnesses that there was nothing approaching a crowd at all ordinary periods of the day, so admirable were the police regulations as to the traffic on the Bridge. Two eminent authorities—Colonel Haywood, the City Engineer, and Colonel Fraser, the Commissioner of the City Police—had publicly and in print expressed their opinion in regard to this matter, and had declared that there was no excessive pressure of traffic upon the Bridge. Colonel Haywood made a Report on the matter as long ago as 1867, and Colonel Fraser as recently as last year. Colonel Haywood said in his Report that the proposed widening would, undoubtedly, involve the architectural destruction of one of the finest structures in Europe, and that it would be useless unless the approaches were widened also. It was, he thought, impossible for anyone to cite a better or more reliable opinion. But he would, on the question of necessity, take the Report of Colonel Fraser, made last year, in which he said that he had little hesitation in saying that this object—the relief of the stoppage of traffic—would be much more effectually accomplished by a widening of Fenchurch Street. He added that London Bridge was the only important thoroughfare in which serious stoppages were seldom witnessed; for, as the Bridge was of a uniform width throughout, the police had no difficulty in keeping four lines of traffic—the modesty of Colonel Fraser prevented him from pointing out that this was due to the excellence of his own police arrangements. A remarkable Return made by the City Police last year showed that the total amount of stoppages in a given fortnight was 1 hour and 28 minutes; and, consequently, that there were, on an average, two stoppages a-day—involving a loss during the 24 hours of $3\frac{1}{2}$ minutes each—and in almost every case these were due to the falling down of horses. He thought, in the face of these facts, it was idle to contend that there was any necessity for widening London Bridge in a manner which would involve the destruction of one of the finest public works which they had in this great town. The real difficulty was to be found in dealing with the approaches; and he begged their Lordships to observe that if they widened the Bridge without dealing with the approaches they would only aggravate the difficulties with which they now had to deal. The real necessity was for a Bridge east of London Bridge, and this necessity would probably have to be met on an early day, in order to provide for that vast population which now resided in the districts to the east of the present Bridge. It was estimated that that population had already reached 1,250,000, and it was calculated that in the course of 40 years that number would have increased to 2,500,000. At the present time there was a Bill before the other House of Parliament, authorizing the construction of a Bridge about half-a-mile lower down the river. Whether that was a good or bad measure it was not for him to say; but he thought that when such a Bill was actually before Parliament it was, at least, premature to take such steps as it was now sought to take by this Bill. He contended—first, that no case had been made out showing the necessity of widening the Bridge—indeed, he had quoted statistics to show that none could be made out; and, secondly, he maintained that, if it was desirable to widen it, it should be done in a different way—he objected entirely to the plenary powers which were given by the Bill; and, lastly, he would point out to their Lordships that it would be deplorable in the highest degree if, on insufficient information, and on the ground merely of a paltry economy, they allowed to be destroyed one of the few great works of modern times which had been built in London. He should be glad if he could suggest any alternative but the rejection of the Bill; but having given the matter his careful consideration he found that he had no other course. It was a measure which the promoters were bound to take back and re-consider, and small hardship would be done to the promoters, who had hitherto carried their Bill through unopposed. He appealed also to Her Majesty's Government, as he could not feel that they would be willing to connect themselves with a work which would hereafter be pointed at with the finger of scorn, and of which everybody who had any part or concern in it would be ashamed.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months").—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not know whether their Lordships had any special information on this subject; but he ventured, in the general interest of the Business of the House, to ask them to consider the course which had been taken by his noble Friend. He doubted whether it had ever occurred before that a Motion had been made to reject a Private Bill which had successfully passed through both Houses on every stage but the third reading in the last House. The Bill was introduced in the other House in the first or second week of the Session, passed through all its stages in that House unopposed, and had passed all its stages in their Lordships' House also unopposed up to the third reading, when the noble Earl proposed to reject it. The project of widening London Bridge was not a new one. A Bill for the object was introduced in the other House last year, but fell through, not from any regular Parliamentary opposition, but in consequence of a dispute between the Corporation of London and the Treasury as to certain rights of the Crown. The importance of the question raised by the noble Earl seemed to him to lie in this—that what their Lordships had heard from the noble Earl in regard to the merits of the case really related to questions of fact, on which it was impossible that they could arrive at any sound conclusion. For instance, it was said that there was no necessity for widening the Bridge; but that was a question of fact which required examination into statistics. The Corporation were not proposing to do anything for their own benefit, or to make money for themselves, by widening the Bridge; on the contrary, they were going to spend money, and they were going to do so at the request of those interested in the welfare of the City, and especially of the great carrying Companies. These were all questions of fact which could not be examined into on the third reading of a Bill. Then his noble Friend said this was not the proper way of widening the Bridge, and that, if it was absolutely necessary, some other mode ought to be adopted. But he (the Lord Chancellor) was informed that the only alternative scheme which had been proposed would involve an expenditure of £500,000, whereas what was proposed by the present Bill could be done for £60,000 or £70,000. Then, the City architect and others who were responsible for the advice given to the Corporation had said that if the alternative scheme of an erection of masonry were adopted they would not be responsible for its success, and that they were doubtful whether the present foundations would carry the increased weight of masonry. But this, like the other question, should have been previously examined into. He was only saying what he had been told; but, at all events, it was clear that the questions to which he had referred were matters of fact which their Lordships' House could not inquire into, and were matters which those who raised them ought to have inquired into in the ordinary manner. The question of taste was, of course, a matter of opinion. Upon the question of the necessity of widening the Bridge, there was a strong concurrence of the opinion of those who were interested in the matter in the City that there was such a necessity. It was true that the block on the Bridge was not at present so great as it was some 20 years ago; but that was owing to the presence of a great number of police, and it cost some £700 or £800 a-year to regulate the traffic. As regarded the æsthetic character of the proposed work, he believed similar things had been done. Some of their Lordships might have seen a bridge so treated in Florence. He believed there was also one over the Rhone at Lyons, and he was certain there was one over the Seine at Paris. The æsthetic question, however, was, after all, one on which they might very well differ. He submitted that it was a strong measure, and one quite contrary to their Lordships' practice, to ask them to reject on the third reading a Bill of that character, and which, up to that stage, had not been opposed.

The Earl of Carnarvon

EARL GRANVILLE was disappointed at what had fallen from the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack. He had joined in the course his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) had taken in asking the other day for the postponement of the third reading of this Bill, thinking his request a very reasonable one, and that at whatever stage application was made to the House of Lords not to pass a Bill because it would not be for the public good, they ought not without due consideration to sanction it. He quite agreed, however, with the noble and learned Earl, that they were in some difficulty in the matter. As to the effect of what was proposed to be done, he thought there could not be two opinions. The deterioration of a fine monument by the proposed plan was, he believed, admitted by everyone who had examined into it. He was not one to postpone utility to beauty; but such a deterioration of so fine a structure was a matter which ought not to be overlooked. If the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack had told them that the plan had been considered by the Government, and that, speaking for them, he recommended the proposal as one which was necessary or had greater advantages than any other, he would have attached much more weight to what the noble and learned Earl had said on the subject. But what the noble and learned Earl had said was only what he had been hearing from the agents of the Corporation for the last two days. He had read in the biography of Sir John Rennie that before the Bridge was built the Corporation wanted to patch up the old one; but the Government of the day interposed, and, ultimately, a contribution of £140,000 or £150,000 was made from the Treasury, which gave the Government that voice in reference to such proposals as that in the Bill to which allusion had been made by his noble Friend. The noble and learned Earl said that objection should have been taken to the Bill before now. But what locus standi would the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) have had before the Committee on the Bill? This could not be regarded as a Private Bill, in the ordinary sense of the word. If, however, the Government proposed now to refer this Bill to a Committee he would be content; but unless they declared this to be their intention, or unless they would state that they, having considered the matter, were convinced of the necessity of the step now proposed to be taken by the Corporation of London in widening the Bridge, he should feel it his duty to vote with the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF POWIS did not think that the promoters of the Bill could fairly be found fault with. The Royal Academy, in 1858, endeavoured to stop the creation of the Victoria Station on æsthetic principles, because its bridge was too near the Chelsea Bridge. The noble and learned Earl had said that it would be necessary to have considerable statistics in order to show whether the traffic over London Bridge was really such that the structure required to be widened; but he thought that anyone who had had occasion to go to the London Bridge Station of the Brighton Railway, without five minutes to spare, could bear ample testimony to the inconvenience which was at present experienced. He did not consider that a new bridge over the river opposite the Tower would meet the difficulty. The proper step to take was to widen London Bridge.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY asked who amongst their Lordships was sufficiently informed upon the facts to be able to give a distinct opinion as to the Bill? It appeared to him that the measure was just one that ought to be referred to a Select Committee, who could make all the necessary inquiries and report the whole facts to the House. It was one which concerned the dignity of the Metropolis, and the matter to which it related ought to be carefully considered in all its aspects.

EARL GREY said, he hoped their Lordships would not agree to the third reading of the Bill on this occasion. If a Motion were made to re-commit the Bill, he had nothing to say against it; but he might say that, in his opinion, the Bill ought not to be passed that evening. There was not such a superfluity of fine public works in London that they could afford to spoil any of those which they possessed; and he appealed to any of their Lordships as to whether the proposed alteration of London Bridge would not deface and ruin, as a monument of the Metropolis, one of the greatest of their public works? That was a point which did not appear to him to admit of argument. In connection with this matter, he might allude to the circumstance that, under the present system of introducing and carrying forward Private Bills, measures might become law which would be very injurious to the public, and yet the public had no locus standi to oppose them. When a Private Bill was brought in, there was no statement made to the House as to its object; practically, as a general rule, no one thought it worth while to take up such a measure; and, in the present instance, there was no course open to the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) save that which he had adopted. With reference to the obstruction which had been complained of, the noble Earl had reminded their Lordships that waggons did not load or unload on the Bridge itself—the traffic went on continuously, and there were comparatively few stoppages on the Bridge itself—the obstruction took place in the streets leading to the Bridge. In those streets waggons were continually loading and unloading; carriages stopped at shop doors; so that the whole width of the roadways leading to the Bridge were not available for traffic—and thus a great deal of inconvenience occasioned. This explanation was so consistent with common sense that he did not hesitate in accepting it. He supported the proposal that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he certainly thought that the persons who had a right to complain in this matter were the promoters of the Bill. The measure had been brought to the notice of the police authorities; but it passed through the other House, and had gone through most stages in their Lordship's House, without attention having been called to the considerations which his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Carnarvon) now urged. But now, at the very last stage, objection was taken to a measure which had arrived at that point not without due attention and consideration. The noble Earl who had just spoken seemed to think that there was a proper opportunity afforded by the third reading of the Bill for calling attention to it and moving its rejection; but it would have been far better, if the matter were one of such importance, that the notice of their Lordships should have been directed to it on the second reading. There was nothing in the conduct of the promoters of the measure which prevented public attention being drawn to the Bill, or which prevented the Bill being treated in the ordinary way. He thought there could be no doubt that this was a Private Bill; and he must protest against the doctrine that it was the duty of the Government to take up the question and advise the House upon it. He did not think it was the duty of the Government, either in that or the other House of Parliament, to take up Private Bills and offer their opinions upon the matters to which they referred; nor was it the custom to do so in either House of Parliament. It was quite clear that the question now before their Lordships was one upon which there was great difference and variety of opinion. It had been spoken of from the point of view of art; and it had been said that if the Bridge were allowed to be enlarged in the manner proposed there would be a violation of taste, and that the Bridge itself would be an eyesore to the Metropolis. Generally speaking, the great diversity of opinion that had been exhibited during the discussion showed that the Bill ought to have been considered on the Motion for the second reading; but, although he thought it was greatly to be regretted that attention was not called to it at an earlier stage, he did not consider that there would be any disadvantage in the Bill being referred to a Select Committee, provided that that Committee were properly chosen, and that the Instructions given to it were of such a nature that its Members would be able to look thoroughly and completely into the matter, and to come to such a conclusion as would be satisfactory to their Lordships, and enable them to arrive at a final decision upon the Bill. In recommending or acquiescing in the proposal that the measure should be referred to a Select Committee, he did not wish to convey the idea that he thought his noble Friend had made out his case. He considered that all his noble Friend had done had been to make out a case for inquiry, and nothing more. That inquiry need not necessarily prejudice the final passing of the Bill.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT said, that he hoped it would not go down to posterity that those of their Lordships who took interest in aesthetics considered Chelsea Bridge or Burlington House the finest buildings in the Metropolis. He expressed his satisfaction at hearing that the Bill would be sent to a Select Committee, hoping that that Committee would be able to hit upon something better than the scheme now proposed.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought that the fact that the Metropolis and Corporation had so recently thrown open the Metropolitan bridges free of toll, at a great expenditure of money, was a reason why they should delay to pass the present Bill. It seemed to him that it was desirable to ascertain what effect the free passage of the bridges would have in diverting the traffic before they spent additional money on widening London Bridge.

LORD TRURO said, that the country would not view with indifference a measure calculated to mar, in a great degree, one of the finest public monuments in the Metropolis.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, it seemed to be the wish of their Lordships that the statements which he had made should be thoroughly sifted. He hoped that that would be done; and, believing that the remarks which he had made to the House would be confirmed by trustworthy evidence, he accepted the proposal that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. He apprehended that the proper course to adopt would be this—that both the Order for the third reading and his own Amendment should be discharged, and that it should then be moved that the Bill be committed to a Committee, to be named on a subsequent day. He had no doubt great care would be taken in the appointment of that Committee.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) suggested that the Committee should be nominated by the noble Earl himself.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn: The Order for the Third Reading discharged; and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

And, on June 30, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

Ld. President.	E. Somers.
Ld. Privy Seal.	V. Cardwell.
M. Ripon.	L. De L'Isle and Dudley.
F. Jersey.	ley.
E. Carnarvon.	L. Carlisleford.
E. Morley.	L. Winmarleigh.

VALUATION OF LANDS (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 83.)

(The Earl of Galloway.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE EARL OF AIRLIE objected to the existing machinery for the valuation of lands being upset in the way proposed by the Bill—the proposed alteration, as he understood, simply met the convenience of one county. The present system worked satisfactorily in most counties; and he did not see why the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) should propose to take away the powers of the Commissioners of Supply, and delegate them to a small Committee, from which there was no appeal to the general body. He would move an Amendment to leave out, after the word "Scotland," in Clause 4, and to insert the word "may," the effect of which would be to make the measure permissive instead of compulsory.

Amendment moved, page 1, line 29, to leave out from ("Scotland") to ("be") page 2, line 2, and insert ("may").—(The Earl of Airlie.)

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, that although the point might seem a very simple one, it was of importance to Scotland. He entirely agreed with the objections that had been raised by his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie), and thought it was an utterly unprecedented thing for a decision of a Committee to be held final without any Report to the body that appointed it. He did not propose that the Committee should be obliged to report to the Commissioners of Supply, because that would only add to what was already a complicated business. The business of valuation occupied much time, and might be much more conveniently transacted by a Committee than by the whole body; but he thought the Commissioners should have a voice so as to be able to say whether they concurred in the action of the Committee.

In regard to some of the counties of Scotland, where the Commissioners of Supply were very numerous, no doubt, it might be an advantage to appoint a Committee; but in other counties, where the Commissioners were not too numerous to form a working body, it was a hardship to delegate their powers to a Committee. He hoped the House would not allow the whole object of the Bill to be defeated at this last stage.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY thought his noble Friend was making a mountain out of a molehill. The Bill was not introduced for the benefit of one county; it was to suit the case of almost every county but the one for which the noble Lord (Lord Balfour of Burleigh) had spoken. The Bill had gone through the other House, where it met with no opposition. It was not in any sense antagonistic to the Commissioners of Supply. On the contrary, the Bill was simply to enable the general body of the Commissioners in each county to appoint a Committee of from five to 20 of their number to consider all questions of valuation, and if the parties affected were not satisfied, they would be able to appeal to two Judges of the Court of Session.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON thought the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie), if he entertained such strong objections to the Bill, should have brought them forward at an earlier stage. It seemed to him that if the Amendment were carried it would upset the whole Bill. The Commissioners of Supply, instead of being put on one side by this Bill, had the appointment of the Committee; which was much better than having the business done in very large, and sometimes tumultuous, meetings, which were not conducive to the proper treatment of such matters.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he did not agree in the remarks of the noble Duke. When the Bill was in Committee, their Lordships were not so well acquainted with its provisions as they were now. The proposal of the Bill was that the Commissioners of Supply should annually appoint from among themselves a Committee to consist of not less than five or more than 20; to this Committee was intrusted the hearing and determination of all appeals which could be heard and determined by the general body; and their determination was for all purposes to be deemed the determination of the Commissioners of Supply, by whom it was appointed. He shared the objection of his noble Friend behind him to this arrangement, and should vote for his Amendment.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE explained, that the reason why he did not raise the question on the second reading was because the attention of their Lordships was not called to the provisions of the Bill on that stage of it.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, that the reason why he did not go through all the provisions of the Bill on the second reading was because there were only two Peers besides himself in the House at the time.

THE EARL OF STAIR said, he disapproved of the Bill altogether, and thought it would be better to let well alone. But he should vote for the Amendment, as the process of having to appeal to the Court of Session was a disagreeable one.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 23; Not-Contents 10: Majority 13.

CONTENTS.

Cairns, E. (L. Chancellor.)	Blantyre, L.
	De L'Isle and Dudley, L.
Richmond, D.	de Ros, L.
	Forester, L.
De La Warr, E.	Gordon of Drumcar, L. [Teller.]
Dundonald, E.	Harlech, L.
Mount Edgcumbe, E.	Hartismere, L. (L. Henniker.)
Nelson, E.	Inchiquin, L.
Stanhope, E.	Silchester, L. (E. Langford.)
Stradbroke, E.	Skelmersdale, L.
Cranbrook, V.	Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
Hawarden, V.	[Teller.]
Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.)	Winmarleigh, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Airlie, E. [Teller.]	Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.)
Camperdown, E.	Leigh, L.
Northbrook, E.	Oxenfoord, L. (E. Stair.)
Strathmore and Kinghorn, E. [Teller.]	Stratheden and Campbell, L.
Balfour of Burleigh, L.
Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.)

Resolved in the Negative.

Lord Balfour of Burleigh

A further Amendment made: Bill to be read 3^d on Thursday next; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 130.)

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he would not, after this Division, proceed with the other Amendments of which he had given Notice. He would, however, say that in the Division all the Scotchmen in the House, except the noble Duke the Lord President, and the noble Earl the Mover of the Bill, had voted for the Amendment. He should take the sense of the House upon it again when the Bill reached its next stage.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 26th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Charity (Expenses and Accounts) * [221]; Industrial Enterprise (Ireland) * [222].

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [88]—R.P.; Volunteer Corps (Ireland) (re-comm.) [200]—R.P.

Third Reading—Customs and Inland Revenue * [150], and passed.

Withdrawn—Public Health Act (1875) Amendment * [33].

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (WATER EXPENSES) BILL.—[BILL 204.]

(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Rodwell).

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION ON SECOND READING.

MR. MONK: In consequence of the hon. Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) and the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Raikes) having withdrawn their opposition to the Metropolitan Board of Works (Water Expenses) Bill, I beg to give Notice that on the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Bill I shall move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, no justification is shown in the Bill for the large expenses incurred by the Metropolitan Board of Works in the preparation and in the abortive promotion of the two Bills for which they ask for an indemnity from Parliament."

QUESTIONS.

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS—THE CONTINUANCE BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, When he proposes to introduce the Bill to continue the Endowed Schools Acts which expire on December 31st next; for how many years the Bill will renew these Acts; and, whether it will continue them without alteration?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, the Government intended to continue the Acts; but he could not exactly state when the Bill relating to their continuance would be introduced. Until it was introduced, he did not think it was desirable to go into the details; but he might state, as he had stated before, that the Government did not contemplate any change either in the constitution or authority of the Commission.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL. QUESTIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, when the military authorities accepted the services of His Highness the late Prince Imperial in South Africa, any instructions were given as to the functions and position of His Highness at the seat of war; whether he has seen a statement in the "Daily News" special correspondence of the 20th instant, that, reconnoitring with a small party eight miles in advance, His Highness was surprised by the enemy while dismounted, and the escort "dispersed at a gallop when a volley was fired;" and, whether he will inquire if the attack upon the Prince's party occurred in the neighbourhood of four large native villages burned by the British troops a few days previously?

The following Questions on the subject also stood on the Paper:—

SIR WILLIAM FRASER,—To ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Correspondence relating to the late Prince Imperial leaving this country for the seat of war; whether he will state the precise position of the Prince in, or in connection with, Her Majesty's Army; and, whether he will give at once, or so soon as they can be ascertained, the name and rank of the Officer by whom the Prince was put in orders on the 1st of June for the specific duty in the performance of which he lost his life?

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK,—To ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the circumstances attending the lamented death of the late Prince Imperial, Whether he can inform the House what special instructions, if any, were issued by Lord Chelmsford on the occasion of the Prince leaving his head-quarters to join those of Brigadier General Wood; as to the particular duties on which the Prince was, or was not, to be employed; also what instructions were issued to those under whom he was serving as to the precautions to be taken to prevent his incurring unnecessary risk not called for either by his position or the requirements of the Service; and, if he is unable to give the House any information on these subjects, whether he will cause inquiries upon them to be addressed to Lord Chelmsford with a view of eliciting facts with regard to which a deep interest is felt in this House and the Country?

MR. P. J. SMYTH,—To ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether a rigid inquiry will be instituted into the circumstances immediately attending the melancholy death of the Prince Imperial?

COLONEL STANLEY: I will, Sir, with the permission of the hon. Gentleman who has addressed the Question to me, endeavour to answer the Questions of the hon. Members for Kidderminster (Sir William Fraser), Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), Westmeath (Mr. P. J. Smyth), and Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), respecting the late Prince Imperial, at the same time. There is no Correspondence to be laid on the Table. The only official letter I can find is one from Lord Chelmsford, dated the 21st of April, in which he reports, in so many words, that Prince Louis Napoleon having expressed "a desire to accompany my head-quarters into Zululand, I have attached him to my Staff." And here I wish to correct an answer I gave in reply to a Question put to me without Notice by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) on Friday, in which I stated that I was not aware that the late Prince was attached to the Staff, but that I knew he was with the head-quarters. Of course, when I answered thus, I meant to say I did not know he was appointed to the Staff. I believed he was attached as an extra aide-de-camp, with free forage and rations, just as any person in his position would probably have who was so attached. The letters read by my illustrious Colleague (the Duke of Cambridge) in "another place," together with the telegrams published, give all the information of which I am personally in possession. I have only to say that a telegram was sent on the 23rd instant to Sir Garnet Wolseley, asking that the fullest information on the subject should be sent without delay, and also an explanation of how the surprise occurred. I am not able to say, in reply to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), whether it be true that the attack upon the Prince's party occurred in the neighbourhood of four large Native villages burned by the British troops a few days previously. Perhaps, with your permission, Sir, and that of the House, I may say that some extracts from private letters of Lord Chelmsford to Lady Chelmsford have, with the permission of some of his relatives, been placed in my hands, and I believe also in those of other hon. Members of this House. I believe it is desirable that I should read them, as they throw the fullest light, or rather all the light that is at present attainable, upon this painful subject. The first is dated from Durban, on the 11th of April. It says—

"I have placed the Prince Imperial on my Staff. He is very pleased. He is immensely keen to see some active service. I like him from what I have seen of him very much. I shall treat him in precisely the same way as I should any other of my aides-de-camp, and I am sure it is what he himself would prefer."

On April 14, Lord Chelmsford writes—

"The Prince seems pleased that I asked him to come on my personal Staff. He has quite accepted the position of aide-de-camp. I hope his health will stand it, as it would be a serious responsibility if it broke down. He appears to be a good, keen soldier."

Sir William Fraser

The next letter is from Pietermaritzburg, on the 20th April, and says—

“I arrived here on the 17th. The Prince Imperial accompanied me. He had been unfortunately laid up with fever at Durban, and the jolting of the carriage and the heat of the sun rather knocked him up. I am afraid he is not naturally very strong, and I very much doubt if he will be able to stand the long rides we have in store for him if he follows me wherever I go. However, he is bent on it, and has plenty of courage.”

Lord Chelmsford goes on to say—

“I am, for the first time since I held this command, going to take a doctor with me, in order that he may look after the Prince. His name is Dr. Scott.”

He next writes from Colenso, Natal, on the 26th of April—

“The Prince was not allowed to leave Pietermaritzburg with me, as he has been suffering from fever. I am expecting him, however, to join me very shortly.”

And he writes from Dundee on the 30th of April—

“We arrived here yesterday afternoon, and managed to get our tents pitched before the thunderstorm. The Prince and the doctor caught us up at Ladysmith. The Prince appears quite well. The air is cool and pleasant, and I hope the open air will do him good.”

From the same place, 17 miles from Utrecht, on the 6th of May, he says—

The Prince accompanied me to Kambula, which soon knocked him up, and he had a slight attack of fever.”

The last letter is written from Utrecht, and is dated the 21st of May. I received it yesterday. It says—

The Prince Imperial went on a reconnaissance, and very nearly came to grief. I shall not let him out of my sight again if I can help it.”

But Lord Chelmsford does not mention with whom he went when the attack took place. This is all the information I can give. In conclusion, I hope I am not out of Order in pointing out that the relatives of Lord Chelmsford have given us the amplest information which was in their possession.

POST OFFICE—VICTORIA—MAIL SERVICE via GALLE OR COLOMBO TO MELBOURNE.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government are cognizant of the terms of the arrangement or contract made between Mr. Graham Berry, Prime Minister of Victoria, and the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, for a Mail service via Galle or Colombo to Melbourne; whether that arrangement or contract is conditional on the ratification by the House of Commons of the East India and China Contract; and, whether any Correspondence has passed between the Government and Mr. Berry on the subject; and, if so, whether the Government will place a Copy of such Contract and Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the Contract between the Government of Victoria and the Peninsular and Oriental Company was not communicated to us by the Government of Victoria; but I have obtained a copy of it. The conditions of that Contract are a matter for the parties to it, and I must decline to express an opinion as to the circumstances under which it might or might not be binding. But I have no objection to lay a copy of the Contract on the Table, with the Correspondence between the Colonial Office and Mr. Berry on the subject.

HIRING FAIRS (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to the serious evils caused by Hiring Fairs or Feeing Markets in Scotland; and if he will consider, during the Recess, the possibility of remedying them, by altering the Law relative to half-yearly engagements or otherwise?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON), in reply, said, that some years ago his attention had been called to the fact that the meeting of parties at those fairs had often led to excessive social indulgence, and also to immorality, and he should be most happy to consider the subject. But, at the same time, he must intimate that he had the greatest doubt whether the evils referred to in the Question would ever be cured by legislation. The subject was an exceedingly difficult one, because it was by those meetings that agricultural labourers were able to regulate the labour market in their districts, and the very greatest care was required in dealing with anything which so nearly affected the relations between the employers and the employed.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS — THE WEEK'S CORN AVERAGES. QUESTION.

MR. FOLJAMBE asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will state, with reference to the Return of Weekly Averages of Agricultural Produce, on what bases the highest and lowest weekly corn averages were calculated; and, whether the yearly average was calculated on the difference between the highest and lowest weekly average of the year, or on the general weekly averages throughout the year, and from what markets, metropolitan or provincial, were the averages compiled?

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Sir, the corn averages in the Return of Weekly Averages of Agricultural Produce are those published weekly and annually in The London Gazette as directed by the Acts for that purpose. Those now in force are 5 Vict. s. 2, c. 14, and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 87. The basis of the weekly average is the division of the aggregate proceeds of all the sales by the aggregate of quantities sold. The yearly average is not the difference between the highest and lowest weekly average of the year, but is made up from the Returns of all the weeks throughout the year. The averages are compiled from all the markets prescribed by the Acts, Metropolitan and Provincial together.

RAILWAYS—CONTINUOUS BRAKES. QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will take measures to give greater publicity to the conditions regarding continuous brakes which the Board of Trade consider to be essential for the public safety in order that the public generally may know what these conditions are?

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Sir, all the Board of Trade Papers with regard to continuous brakes have been very recently laid before Parliament and circulated, and we hardly know how to give more publicity to our opinion on this subject. We are thinking, however, of calling the attention of the Railway Companies to the important debate which took place on the 13th of June, from the tone of which, and especially from the speech of my noble Friend (Viscount Sandon), it must be clear that the Railway Companies cannot any longer neglect to take action upon a matter which so largely affects the public safety.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— OVERTURES FOR PEACE—DETENTION OF MESSENGERS.—QUESTION

MR. RICHARD asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in Monday's "Daily News," in which it is stated, partly on the authority of Bishop Colenso, that two well-known Zulu messengers, who had been sent with "a most conciliatory message from Cetewayo," had been imprisoned and kept in prison for seven weeks; that during the last four months Cetewayo had made repeated overtures for peace, and that in more than one instance his messengers had been treated with great indignity; and, whether the Right honourable Gentleman can give any information to the House to confirm or contradict these statements.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have communicated to the House, from time to time, such information as I have received with respect to overtures for peace which it was stated had been made by Cetewayo. I do not know that "in more than one instance his messengers have been treated with great indignity." I have heard from a despatch received a few days ago from Sir Henry Bulwer, that two messengers were improperly detained in March last for a considerable time, owing to some mistake; but I believe that, when dismissed, they expressed themselves as grateful for the kind treatment they had received.

TRAMWAYS—WANTAGE TRAMWAY— QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is by permission of that Board that the Wantage Tramway has its rails above the road, in violation of the Act of the 33rd and 34th Victoria, cap. 78, sec. 25, which requires that every Tramway—

"Shall be laid and maintained in such manner that the uppermost surface of the rail shall be on a level with the surface of the road?"

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Sir, I am informed that at the time of the inspection of the tramway at Wantage, before it was opened, the rails were found to be laid level with the road. The Board of Trade have not given, and have no power to give, permission to the promoters of a tramway to lay the rails above the level of the road. The maintenance of the road between the rails and 18 inches on each side of them lies with the Tramway Company; and if they fail in their duty, the road authorities, if they think fit, may themselves, after seven days' notice to the Company, do the necessary work at the expense of the Company.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—
EXCESSES OF BRITISH TROOPS.
QUESTION.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he has seen the letters published in the "Natal Mercury" of April 30th and May 2nd, and other South African papers, from Captain D'Arcy, of the Light Horse, and Commandant Schermbrucker, in which the following passages occur:—

"The next day our coloured brothers came on and attacked the camp in numbers from 20,000 to 23,000, and after six hours' hard fighting they bolted. We killed a little over 2,300, and when once they retired all the horsemen in camp followed them for eight miles, butchering the brutes all over the place. I told the men, 'No quarter, boys, and remember yesterday.' And they did knock them about, killing them all over the place."—(Capt. D'Arcy.)

"For fully seven miles I chased two columns of the enemy, who tried to escape over the Umvolozzi, but I came beforehand, and pushed them off the road. They fairly ran like bucks, but I was after them like the whirlwind, and shooting incessantly into the thick column, which could not have been less than 5,000 strong. They became exhausted, and shooting them down would have taken too much time; so we took the assegais from the dead men and rushed among the living ones, stabbing them right and left with fearful revenge for the misfortunes of the 28th ult. No quarter was given."—(Commandant Schermbrucker.)

And, whether these officers belong to the local volunteer force, and to what authority they are responsible?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have seen the first of the letters quoted by the hon. Member, which was stated in the papers to have been written by Captain D'Arcy, who is given as belonging to the Natal Light Horse; but I do not know anything more of him. I cannot find any letters of the latter officer. I believe he is engaged with the Colonial Force in Natal. I believe both officers are brigaded with the Regular Forces, and, as such, are subject to the Articles of War and responsible to the General in command of the Army.

ANTI-RENT AGITATION (IRELAND)—
TENANT RIGHT MEETING AT MILLTOWN.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will inform the House on what authority he has formed his belief that the persons who took part in a recent tenant right meeting at Milltown, in the county of Galway, "were not tenant farmers, and were unconnected with the neighbourhood;" and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of the Instructions given to Colonel Bruce, Deputy Inspector General of Constabulary, and the constabulary authorities in the west of Ireland, in reference to the land agitation going on in that part of the country, so as to enable the House to express an opinion on the subject?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The belief to which I gave expression, in reply to a Question put to me without Notice on Monday last, was to the effect that some of the persons who took a part at the meetings referred to were not connected with either the neighbourhood or with land. I formed that opinion from the various sources of information to which I had access. As a matter of fact, I find upon further inquiry that I might have gone a good deal further, and have said that a great proportion of the speakers at the meeting at Milltown, to which especial reference was made, were in no respect fairly representative of the tenant farmers of the district. I find, for instance, that the first resolution was moved by a clerk in a commercial house in Dublin, and seconded by a person who is stated to be a discharged schoolmaster. Another resolution was moved by a convict at large upon a ticket-of-leave, and seconded by a person who is described as the representative of a local newspaper—and so on. I find, therefore, my first impression more than confirmed. It is, however, unfortunately the case that many tenant farmers were induced to attend the meeting and applaud the very objectionable sentiments uttered by the speakers, and thereby, no doubt, so far have involved the neighbourhood in responsibility for what occurred?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of my Question.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I beg pardon. I omitted to say that I am unable to lay a Copy of the instructions given to Colonel Bruce upon the Table, as such documents are always regarded as confidential. I gave the other night a fair summary of them, or, rather, I should say, the substance of the duties Colonel Bruce will have to discharge; and it would not be in the interest of the public service to go further than that.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER regretted to be reluctantly obliged to move that the House do now adjourn. ["No!"] He did so for the purpose of being enabled to state briefly that the information on which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had based his opinion on the general character of that meeting was not correct. He begged leave to contradict, in the most direct manner, the statements which had been communicated to the right hon. Gentleman, who had thus been made the channel for misrepresenting the character of that meeting. He would move the adjournment in order that he might put the House in possession of the exact position of affairs in regard to that matter. The right hon. Gentleman commenced by stating that the first resolution was moved by a clerk in a Dublin firm; but he did not inform the House that that resolution had nothing whatever to do with the land question. The right hon. Gentleman had carefully and studiously suppressed that important fact. ["Order!"] There were three resolutions passed at that meeting. The first resolution dealt with the question of national self-government; and it was true that it was moved and seconded by gentlemen who had no claim to be considered tenant farmers. The right hon. Gentleman then said that a subsequent resolution was moved by a man who was a convict at large under a ticket-of-leave, but whom he (Mr. O'Connor Power) would venture to describe as a man who had suffered long years of penal servitude because he had had the courage to resist inhumane English rule in Ireland. Although this gentleman did not hold land himself, he was the son of a tenant farmer, and his relations and friends, very numerous in the county which he (Mr. O'Connor Power) had the honour to represent, were all connected with the land. The suggestion that that gentleman was not fitted to expound the grievances of his countrymen because he did not hold land was simply absurd. The right hon. Gentleman gave a striking misrepresentation of the position occupied by the gentleman who seconded the resolution. He said he was connected with a newspaper; but he was a very well-known tenant farmer, and, what was still more to the point, when the Committee sat upstairs to inquire into the working of the Bright Clauses, Mr. Daley, the gentleman referred to, was summoned before the Committee, and gave evidence which was regarded as very valuable and very instructive in reference to the tenure of land in Ireland. Well, there was a third resolution passed at this meeting—

[From the time when the hon. Member stated his intention to move the adjournment of the House, and it appeared probable that a debate was about to be raised, hon. Members ceased to pay attention to the hon. Member's remarks, and conversation became so general and so loud that the hon. Member could with difficulty be heard.]

MR. PARNELL rose to Order. [The interruption continued.] He would be unable to state his point of Order so long as the conversation which was being kept up by hon. Members opposite was sustained. He requested that he might be enabled to address Mr. Speaker, and communicate his point of Order. He asked whether it was in Order for hon. Members on the opposite side deliberately to enter into conversation in so loud a tone as to drown the voice of a speaker who was desirous of addressing the Chair? The fact of which he spoke was patent to everybody. Even at that moment he could scarcely hear his own voice, so loud was the din and so persistent the conversation of hon. Members opposite. Such a course was tantamount to obstructing the freedom of speech; because, if hon. Members were prevented by the conversation of their fellow-Members from having their sentiments heard by the Chair, it would be impossible for freedom of debate to be maintained. He, therefore, wished to know whether Mr. Speaker permitted hon. Members to address him on a subject which was perfectly in Order, and yet allowed persistent interruptions from hon. Members opposite, who were indulging in conversation openly to put an end to discussion?

Mr. J. Lowther

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Meath has risen and addressed the House on a point of Order. What has occurred is this. The hon. Member for Mayo put a Question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and received an answer. The Question was fully answered. The hon. Member for Mayo thereupon rose in his place and notified to the House that, not being satisfied with the answer, he should conclude with a Motion—and I presume that he intended to move the adjournment of the House. As the House is aware, every Member of this House has the privilege of moving the adjournment of the House at the time of Questions; but I am bound to say that if the privilege of moving the adjournment of the House when a Member is not satisfied with an answer which he receives should become a practice, that privilege will have to be restrained by the House.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he assured Mr. Speaker, as he stated at the outset, that he moved the adjournment of the House with very great reluctance, and he appealed in confirmation of that statement to his general conduct as to whether he would take such a course without just cause. ["Order! Oh, oh!"] He was only proceeding to show that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had a second time made statements in that House which carried great weight in the country, but which were unfounded. He should be wanting in his duty to his constituents and to his country, if he allowed the statements of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to pass unchallenged. He was anxious to avail himself of the present occasion—["Order, order!"]

[Much disorder prevailed throughout the remainder of this discussion.]

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that, as a question of Order, he begged to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the Leader of that House, whether he did not intend to support the intimation that had just been given from the Chair?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose to speak, but was received with cries of "Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the right hon. Gentleman rises to a point of Order.

MR. SULLIVAN asked, as a point of Order, whether the speech of the hon. Member who was in possession of the House could be interrupted by a Question?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose together.

MR. SPEAKER called upon the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It seems to me, Sir, that this House is allowing itself, at the instigation of a small number of Members, to fall into practices which are entirely destructive either to the liberties of the House or to the Order of the House. I understand that the Rules of the House have been framed with a view to their giving to Members the greatest possible latitude, and, at the same time, on the understanding—

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has himself risen on a point of Order.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I, Sir, also rise to a point of Order. [Continued disorder.]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I understand that when a Member is speaking to Order he has a right to be heard upon Order, and that he ought not to be interrupted in the course of his remarks—although, of course, his remarks may be answered by anyone who wishes to answer them. I am reluctantly obliged to make some remarks in consequence of the appeal which has been made to me, and of which I am bound to take notice, and also in consequence, I must say, Sir, of the apparent disregard of your authority.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Again, I rise to Order. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: These interruptions are altogether disorderly. The right hon. Gentlemen the Chancellor of the Exchequer has risen, as I understand, to a point of Order.

MR. SULLIVAN: What is the point of Order?

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is in possession of the House, and these interruptions are altogether disorderly.

MR. PARNELL rose, but the cries of "Order!" and "Sit down!" were so overpowering that the hon. Member resumed his seat.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If any illustration were wanting of the remark which I felt it my duty to make, that illustration is afforded, Sir, by hon. Members who have sat for some time in this House disregarding—"No, no!"—or, at all events, appearing to disregard—your repeated rulings by rising to interrupt me when I have been ruled by you to be in Order. My hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) asked me whether I was prepared or not to support the ruling which you recently laid down. [An hon. MEMBER: No ruling.] I am not aware whether my hon. Friend used the word "ruling;" but you, Sir, undoubtedly did rule a point on which you were appealed to. The ruling of Mr. Speaker is this. [Several hon. MEMBERS: No ruling.] The ruling was—that it is in Order for any Member of this House, during the time of Questions, to move the adjournment of the House. But, on the other hand, you, Sir, proceeded to say that if this privilege was taken advantage of to raise a discussion upon every occasion when any Member may be dissatisfied with the answer he has received to a Question, it would be necessary that some steps should be taken to restrain that privilege. That I understand to be your ruling. Well—I am asked whether I propose to take any steps to support that ruling? The point is one which involves this difficulty. It must be met either by moving some new Resolution—by moving some new Order—or by taking steps to enforce the observations of the Speaker against those who appear inclined to disregard them. I am reluctant, without absolute necessity, to propose a new Resolution—I am reluctant to propose a Resolution which would curb and limit the liberty of Members of the House generally on account of an abuse which, I hope, is confined only to a few. It may be necessary; we may be driven to it. ["Order!"] I believe I am speaking to Order. I am answering a Question. It is not, at the present moment, my intention to move a new Standing Order; but I think it will be my duty to take notice of the conduct of any Gentleman who, after having his attention called to the fact that he is interrupting and delaying the Business of the House, persists in doing so, without any special object to bring to the attention of the House. It may be necessary that we should call the attention of the House to the conduct of any such Member, and to submit to the House—[Cheers.] [An hon. MEMBER: Do your best.]

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I rise, Sir, to ask you a Question,—whether it is in accordance with the Rules of the House, that when an hon. Member is in possession of the House, and is addressing it in the exercise of his discretion—whether rightly or wrongly I do not say—that another hon. Gentleman should get up and address a Question, not to you, Sir, but to another hon. Member—even though the latter be so distinguished as the Leader of the House? I submit that that is entirely out of Order.

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I may say that it would, no doubt, have been more in accordance with the Rules of the House, if the appeal of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had been addressed to the Chair.

MR. SULLIVAN: If I may be allowed to say a word on the point of Order—I would state that we ought to be extremely careful that we do not allow this scene to pass into one of those displays which sometimes harm us in public estimation.

MR. SPEAKER: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman speaking to a point of Order?

MR. SULLIVAN: Yes, Sir. I desire to say to the House that no observations shall fall from me in the slightest degree calculated to increase any heat that may have been displayed. I should be the last in the House to interrupt. My point of Order is this—I did not wish to interrupt the Chancellor of the Exchequer by rising when he was speaking. I did it once, but not a second time; but the right hon. Gentleman rose to answer a Question—as he candidly said himself—put to him on the other side. I called out, and said, "What is the point of Order?" The Leader of the House interrupted the debate, and sat down without naming his point of Order, or submitting to you any point of Order, and was, therefore, himself not in Order. My point of Order is—whether it is not the fact that the only Members of the House who have broken the Rules of the House this evening are the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman is clearly not speaking to a point of Order, but is asking me whether certain things done by individual Members were orderly.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: If hon. Gentlemen had only been willing to extend to me the rights which, during this Session, have frequently been extended from this side of the House to the other, I should by this time have finished my case, and we might have proceeded with Business. I wish to say, in answer to the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that his dark reference to what the House may be called upon to do against an individual Member shall have no effect whatever in deterring me from saying what I rose to say. [Interruption.] Until the highest authority in this House commands me to be silent, I shall not be silent until I have made my speech.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to use language of menace to this House. And, if he will allow me, I must caution him against abusing further the privilege afforded by this House by moving the adjournment of the House; and I trust he will be more measured in his language.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I shall accept the ruling of the Chair, when I get the ruling of the Chair. I shall not accept the ruling of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or that of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire.

MR. NEWDEGATE rose — ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member rise to speak to a point of Order?

MR. NEWDEGATE: Yes, Sir. I beg to move, as a point of Order, that the conduct of the hon. Member for Mayo is disrespectful to the Chair— ["Order!" and Cheers.]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has not risen to a point of Order. [Cheers.]

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I had proceeded to a certain point of my remarks with the purpose of exposing the misrepresentation which the Chief Secretary for Ireland unconsciously made, when the hon. Member opposite rose to Order. The right hon. Gentleman's description of the object of the meeting totally misrepresented the demand put forward by the people of Ireland for a reform of the landed system in that country. If my constituents are branded before the country as Socialists and Communists, I am bound, as their Representative, to denounce the accusation as a calumny; and I should fail in my duty as a Member of this House, if I allowed that misrepresentation to pass unchallenged. The Chief Secretary has given great dissatisfaction before in answering Questions, and now he says, in reply to my Question, that he will not lay on the Table copies of the Instructions that have been given to the constabulary authorities in the county which I represent. What does all this mean? The demands for reform are made in a peaceable and orderly manner. They are rejected; and when an agitation arises, the Government are ready to put it down at the point of the bayonet. The Government inaugurate a Reign of Terror in the County of Mayo, and hope to drown the voice of the people of Ireland. The policemen sent to Mayo may drown the voice of the people of Mayo; but the voice of the people's Representatives shall be heard to accuse the Government of adopting a policy which is a direct encouragement to revolution and assassination. I say that if you reject the demand for reform, and send armed soldiers to put it down, you are encouraging assassination. The Chief Secretary, as a 'prentice politician, is sent over to try his 'prentice hand on Ireland before going to another Department; but if he fancies that the people of Mayo will submit to his dictation and coercion, he has mistaken their character. And if the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, who seems to be busy at this moment in framing a Coercion Code for my particular benefit, thinks he will abridge my remarks by his performance, he has mistaken me. Hon. Members have availed themselves of the liberty to move the adjournment of the House on the most trivial questions affecting individuals; but when an Irish Member comes forward to protest against a Reign of Terror and Coercion, and to say that it must lead to conspiracy and assassination, then a hostile opinion is manifested.

I do not know that this has succeeded on any former occasion, and I doubt if it will succeed now. I should like to call the attention of the House to the first resolution moved at this meeting, for the purpose of showing the peaceable and orderly character of that resolution. It was simply a proposition to make the cultivators of the soil the owners of the soil—which is neither revolutionary nor Communistic. It has been carried out on the Continent and in the Channel Islands, and on several hundred farms in Ireland. The matter is being agitated because of the oppressive working of the land system. [Interruption.] We have been appealed to in this House to make a statement of what are called political grievances rather than to enter into a discussion on abstract principles; and it is in consequence of that that I have thought it necessary to quote in extenso the first resolution that was passed; and I shall now invite the attention of the House to the second resolution. The second resolution was moved by a tenant farmer of the parish, and it declared that in consequence of the reduced value of farming and the succession of bad seasons it would be impossible for the tenants to pay the full rents. In the course of his speech, this gentleman mentioned several instances of landlord oppression. The third resolution was simply a protest against the increase of rents in the present state of depression in Ireland. And this is what is described as Socialism! Surely, it is time that someone should protest against the way in which Ireland has been misrepresented in the English Press, and even in statements emanating from the Treasury Bench.

MR. BOORD: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the hon. Member is in Order? I am one of the nearest to him on this side of the House, and, from what I can hear, it appears to me that he is discussing proceedings which took place at a certain meeting in Ireland, and I ask whether he is in Order in doing so? And, further, I ask what is the Question before the House?

MR. O'DONNELL: I rise to speak on that point of Order—

MR. SPEAKER: I have already intimated that the hon. Member is not, strictly speaking, out of Order; but I also pointed out the great inconvenience, if not irregularity, of the proceedings now taking place. It is obvious from the observations made by the hon. Member for Mayo that it was his deliberate purpose to raise a debate upon the answer he received to his Question addressed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Mr. Speaker, the third Resolution—[“Oh, oh!”]—spoke of the distress in Ireland, and the mover said that to his personal knowledge some of the tenants had sold their bed and bedding; and he added that if the landlords were wise in their generation they would endeavour to avert the prospective catastrophe by reducing their rents and giving some employment to their tenants. I admit that the agitation is a grave agitation. I admit that it is an agitation which the Government are bound to notice. But when the people asked for bread and the Government answered their appeal by bullets, they will be held responsible for the peace of the country. The hon. Member, having read an extract from a letter of a parish priest, and referred to the moderate tone in which the resolutions were worded, proceeded to say: I trust that the effect of the humble but sincere protest I have made here this day will be to cause the right hon. Gentleman to be more careful as to the sources whence he derives his information, and to caution him and other Members of Her Majesty's Government against inaugurating a police rule, and, at the same time, denying the House an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion on the subject by refusing to produce the Instructions which have been given. If the Instructions I have asked for had had reference to something done in Zululand, the refusal to produce them would have been regarded as an arbitrary proceeding, which the House would not have tolerated. Let the Government take heed of the consequences of their rejection of the demands of the Irish people. They have been forewarned of the state of the country by the demands which have been made on behalf of the people of Ireland by their representatives, who are not now going to see the people robbed of the fruits of their industry on the one hand, and then bayoneted by the police on the other. A more hateful power than that of the Conservative Government and Party has never been experienced by my country, for the way in which they propose to deal with the Land Question is to shoot the people down—[“Oh, oh!”]—which they regard as the Constitutional remedy for the grievances of Ireland. The hon. Member concluded by moving the adjournment of the House.

Mr. O'Connor Power

MR. PARNELL, in rising to second the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo, said, he did so because that the circumstances of the people in the West of Ireland were so desperate at the present moment that they could not allow things to go any further in the direction in which they were tending without bringing the matter before the House. The Chief Secretary had admitted the distress, but said it was not his intention to take any steps to remedy it.

MR. CHAPLIN: I rise to Order. I wish to know if the hon. Member is in Order in referring to a subject of which Notice has been given—namely, the agricultural distress in Ireland?

MR. PARNELL: I am referring more particularly to the mustering of the police at the present moment. The Motion of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire does not touch upon that question. He is an Englishman, and he is ignorant of what is being done in Ireland. [“Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire rose to address the Chair upon a point of Order, and I think it is scarcely becoming on the part of the hon. Member for Meath to anticipate the decision of the Chair, and to state that the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire is ignorant. I understand the hon. Member for Meath to be addressing himself to the points raised in the answer of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I am not prepared to say he is altogether in Order in the matter, because, in my judgment, the whole of these proceedings are certainly not altogether in Order.

MR. PARNELL regretted very much that what they had done that day did not commend itself to the judgment of the Chair; but what could the Members for Ireland do? Under the circumstances that had been stated it was their duty to bring this subject before the highest tribunal in the country—because if the Government persisted in assisting the Irish landlords to collect rack rents from the people at the point of the bayonet they would have murderous outrages in that district of the country—the people would be driven to desperation—and he warned them that if the Government were supported in their course of oppressing these people consequences would follow that everybody must deplore. He wished he might deter the Chief Secretary from provoking a repetition of the scenes that occurred 25 years ago. He knew that Government had great power, but the people also had great power when right was on their side; and the people in Mayo and in the other counties of Ireland would stand justified in using every means of passive resistance that they could to the minions of the law, and asserting their right to live on the soil which God gave to them, where they were born, and where their children had a right to live.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I trust that this debate will not be further continued. I am perfectly aware I have no right to dictate, and I am sure I have no wish to attempt to dictate, to hon. Members from Ireland; but it is open to me, as it is open to any other hon. Member, to appeal to hon. Members from Ireland, who are as interested as any of us are in the preservation of the order and regularity of our discussions, and also in the maintenance of our privileges. I am not going to deny the importance—the great importance—of the subject which has been brought forward by the hon. Members for Mayo and Meath; but I wish to point out that the more important the question the more undesirable it is that it should be brought forward and discussed without Notice, when no hon. Member knew that the discussion was coming on, and when it was impossible that it could be discussed as the importance and magnitude of the subject demands. I regret that the hon. Member for Mayo should not only have disregarded, but should have appeared also to ignore, the recommendation and advice of the Chair. I am sure that the vast majority of the Members on this side of the House, from whatever part of the country they may come, desire to support and maintain the authority of the Chair; and I am quite sure we all regret that the hon. Member has not thought it incumbent upon him to pay—as in several instances he did not pay—the slightest attention to the advice of the Chair. We are equally interested in the maintenance of our privileges. The right of moving, for a sufficient cause, the adjournment of the House, and of raising a discussion upon that question, is one which, no doubt, has great advantages. But it is quite evident that that privilege, as has been pointed out from the Chair, if abused, must be restrained; and I am sure we shall all hesitate long before we sanction any abuse of our privileges which may lead to this restraint. But, however anxious we may any of us be for Order, I think it is, above all things, desirable that we should be very sure of our ground in any such procedure. I regret that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, who is to a certain extent the champion of the Order of this House, should, as it seems to me, have himself been guilty of interrupting the observations of an hon. Member who had been ruled by the Speaker to be in Order, by addressing a Question to an hon. Member who, however distinguished, does not possess any greater authority than any other Member of the House. I regret that intervention, because I think it added to the heat of the discussion, and I think it was more calculated to prolong than to abridge the discussion. But, Sir, I only rose to appeal very earnestly to hon. Members not to prolong this discussion, and to abstain as far as possible from what can, under any circumstances, be described as an abuse of a privilege of the House, which it is too evident may in the end be the cause of restricting that privilege.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish to say only a very few words in support of the observations which have just fallen from the noble Lord opposite. I am sure it must be the feeling of everyone, on reflection, that we ought all to use our endeavours to promote the conduct of Business in this House, and to avoid as far as possible anything in the nature of recrimination or wrangling. It is, of course, most undesirable that we should attempt to fetter in any way the rights and privileges of Members of this House, and it would be a very extreme necessity which could in any circumstances compel the House to take steps to abridge that great privilege, which has always existed, of moving the adjournment of the House for a sufficient cause. But if there is anything that will endanger the continuance of this or any other privilege, it is, no doubt, any abuse of that privilege. It is very difficult to say what is the exact limit or the abuse of a privilege of this kind. We know that on this very evening it was notified by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) himself, that he might think it right to take advantage of that privilege to raise a discussion upon the question of Egypt. It is very difficult for any one Member to decide for another when a question is of sufficient importance to entitle that Member to avail himself of that privilege. On the other hand, when we see that we have every day before us the Order Book with 20 or 30 Questions upon it, and when we see that it is open to any Member upon any one of those Questions to raise a debate and carry off the House from the Business it is assembled to perform, we see that some restraint and some discretion must be observed in the use of that privilege, if we do not desire to lose it. We have a great safeguard in one of the chief institutions of this House—I mean in the authority and the advice of the Chair. It does seem to me that we have only one real safeguard against the abuse of our privileges short of taking them away, and that is in deferring to the impartiality and dignity which accompany the Chair, and listening with respect to its rulings. I think we fall very far short indeed of the respect we owe to you, Sir, and also short of wisdom in these matters, if we confine ourselves to saying that that which the Speaker does not rule to be absolutely and directly out of Order is therefore in Order, and may be indulged in, even though the Speaker warn the hon. Member that it is against the spirit and intention of the Rules of the House. I hope it may not be found impossible to let this matter drop at the point at which we have arrived. It would be a pity, after what has passed, that there should be any heated discussion. I think there is, and ought to be, but one desire and determination on the part of all to uphold the dignity and authority of the Chair; and that if you, Sir, at any time should feel it necessary to appeal to the House to support you in exercising that authority, you will always find, in all parts of the House, a readiness heartily to support you. I hope the House will take notice of the warning you have uttered this evening with regard to the abuse of the privileges of this House, and that we shall be allowed now to proceed to other Business.

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I am sorry, Sir, with most other hon. Members of the House, at the sort of disturbance that has arisen this evening, and I think hon. Members opposite ought to learn something from a mistake I think they have made during this evening. What is the fact? An hon. Member from this side of the House put a Question, of which he had given Notice, to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman gave an answer which was not flattering to the constituents of the hon. Member — and I must observe that I think Irish Members have good reason to complain, and frequently to complain, of the manner and tone, and sometimes even of the language, of the answers of the right hon. Gentleman. [Cheers, and "No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen who differ from me are, of course, entitled to their opinion. I have heard nearly all those answers during this Session, and I am only expressing the opinion at which I have arrived. The hon. Member for Mayo said the answer was very unsatisfactory, and that the statements made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland were absolutely inaccurate, and, I think, he gave them a flat denial. Now, consider his position with regard to his constituents and the statements that were made. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not say it was a case in which he was bound to move the adjournment, or even one in which the majority of the House would be likely to make as much allowance for him as I should myself; but if there be that privilege and right, it does not appear to me that he took an extraordinary course. I do not say that I should have done it myself; but I have seen the same thing done from the other side of the House at times when there was certainly no more justification than there was to-night. But when the hon. Member for Mayo rose, for the purpose of making an explanation, and said that the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was absolutely inaccurate, what was he met with? Not with the slightest patience from hon. Gentlemen opposite. Immediately arose — on purpose, obviously — a hum and buzz of conversation from this end of the House and that — and the object was to drown the voice of the hon. Member for Mayo, and to make it impossible he should give any answer to the statements of the Chief Secretary. If hon. Gentlemen opposite had been quiet, I believe that the hon. Member for Mayo would not have taken up the time of the House for more than five minutes with an explanation of facts which he thought desirable in the interest and for the character of his constituents; and then this matter would probably have passed, and we should have entered on the Business of the evening. I am surprised at the course adopted by so experienced a Member of the House as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire in proposing that now, on the spot, and at the instant, something should be done to put an end to this grievous irregularity which he charged on the hon. Member for Mayo. The hon. Member was in his right. If the adjournment of the House had not been moved on many other occasions during this Session, nobody would have complained; but the Motion has been made somewhat frequently of late, and, therefore, it is felt to be an inconvenience, and it may be that, if it be continued, it may absolutely become unendurable. I grant that. But the course to be taken was not upon the spot to ask the Speaker to take any steps which might shut the mouth of the hon. Member for Mayo, but to allow him to proceed; and then, if anybody thought that some steps should be taken, he could have put a Notice upon the Paper of the House, and the whole subject might have been considered by the House, or by a Committee in consultation with the Speaker. That would have been the proper course to take. But this conduct of refusing to hear in a case of this kind, when an hon. Member thinks the conduct and character of his constituents are attacked by the Chief Secretary for Ireland — this conduct which was pursued by hon. Gentlemen opposite was exactly that which led, and which necessarily led, to the unpleasantness which has occurred. ["Oh!"] I should recommend hon. Gentlemen opposite to have a little more patience. ["Hear!" and "Oh!"] The Chancellor of the Exchequer complains — no, he did not exactly complain — but he referred to the number of Questions on the Paper every evening. Well, they have grown to be very numerous, and they are very troublesome, no doubt, to right hon. Gentlemen who sit upon that Bench; but the great bulk of these Questions are Questions necessitated by their own policy—[Cheers, and cries of "Order!"—the policy of the Government—["Order!"—I say the policy of the Government, and particularly with regard to our affairs in almost every part of the world—["Order, order!"]

MR. ONSLOW rose to Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that upon the Motion for the adjournment of the House a discussion on the policy of the Government will scarcely be in Order.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Sir, I admit that what you say is perfectly true. At the same time I must remind the House I was only speaking in answer to an observation of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The right hon. Gentleman has entirely misunderstood me on this point. I never complained of the number of the Questions that are placed on the Paper of the House.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Then I have nothing more to say. I misunderstood the observation of the right hon. Gentleman, and I am sorry that I did so. I rose merely for the purpose of asking the House to have a little more patience with an hon. Member when he is addressing the House, even if the subject of his observations be considered inconvenient and unpalatable to the House. I have known scores of times when hon. Members opposite have offended in like manner, and I could point to hon. Members having seats on the Treasury Bench who have been not the least guilty in that respect.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I cannot help thinking that it is somewhat unfortunate that, after the very temperate observations of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman opposite should have thought it necessary to make the remarks he has made. Still more do I think it unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it incumbent upon him to condemn in no measured terms the language in which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant answers the Questions which hon. Members may put to him. I do not know what has happened in the course of the right hon. Gentleman's Parliamentary career which would give him any title to criticize the tone of other hon. Members. The right hon. Gentleman has assumed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made some complaint of the number of Questions of which Notice is given for every evening; but anything more extraordinary than such a misconception I cannot conceive. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer said was that if every hon. Member who had given Notice of one of the numerous Questions that were habitually put were, in the event of the answer not being satisfactory to him, to move the adjournment of the House and to raise a debate in reference to it, it would be impossible that Public Business could be properly conducted. That was a very natural and a very harmless remark for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make. Why, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman opposite should have thought it necessary to rise and make the comments he has done passes my comprehension—unless he did so with the object of stirring up the waves which were on the point of being laid. I trust, however, that no such evil results will follow from the course which the right hon. Gentleman has taken, and that the advice given by the noble Lord and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be followed, and that this debate will be allowed to die away without any resuscitation of angry and heated feelings.

MR. CALLAN hoped the debate would not be allowed to close without an authoritative declaration from the Chair, which in future would have the effect of preventing what he must call with regret a discrediting and discreditable scene. He considered that the conduct of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer affected the rights and privileges of every Member of that House. It was laid down in Sir Erskine May's work on the Law and Practice of Parliament, that when a Member spoke to Order he should simply direct attention to the point complained of, and submit it, not to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but to the decision of the House or of the Speaker. He complained that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was censureable, because, instead of speaking to Order, he delivered a lecture to Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House, which he (Mr.

Mr. John Bright

Callan) considered uncalled for, but which he could not designate in the terms which he thought it deserved. The hon. Member spoke of the delay of Public Business in that House; but when had there been such a miserable waste of public time as that which occurred on Wednesday, when an entire day was wasted, and for which the Government was responsible? He hoped the Speaker would declare that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was not in Order in appealing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer instead of to the Chair.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in reply to the observations that had been made on the course he had taken in first addressing the Speaker, and then calling the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Leader of that House, to support the intimation the Speaker had given to the hon. Member for Mayo, that he was transgressing the Rules and practice of the House by his speech on the Motion for the adjournment of the House which he had announced that he would make, said that he had acted in accordance with the principles of the cardinal Rules of that House; that the House itself was the guardian of the Order of its proceedings. This matter had been considered by more than one Committee on the Public Business of that House and by the last. In this Assembly neither the Speaker nor any of his predecessors had, or had had, the original authority. The Speaker was the exponent of the authority of the House, and it followed that the Members who were recognized as the two Leaders of that House ought to be prompt in supporting not only his decisions, but the intimations and recommendations by which he often anticipated and prevented disorder. It appeared to him, and to others, that the manner in which the hon. Member for Mayo had disregarded the Speaker's intimation was disrespectful to the Chair. He, therefore, called upon the Leader of the House to support the dignity and authority of the Chair, and the right hon. Gentleman responded, though he (Mr. Newdegate) regretted to say, without much effect. He submitted, therefore, that the course he had taken was in accordance with the cardinal Rules which guarded the regularity of their debates and proceedings. He had opposed the proposals for investing any Speaker with original authority when made in the Committee of Public Business, and he thought that anyone who had observed the recent proceedings in the French Chambers must feel that the President, who was invested with original authority, was encumbered with a heavy burden, and could scarcely avoid being drawn into debate—a circumstance which must expose his conduct to imputations of partiality whenever it occurred. He was reminded by this abuse of the privilege of moving the adjournment of the House when any hon. Member was dissatisfied with the answer he had received to any Question he might have put upon the Notice Paper and then asked in the House, and then move the adjournment and launched that House into a debate, for which none but himself were prepared, of a dictum of the Predecessor of the Speaker (Lord Eversley) "that the Rules of this House are founded in common sense." What was the meaning of each hon. Member being invested with this privilege of moving the adjournment of the House? It was this—that if any answer should be given, or any circumstance should occur, or statement be made in debate of such gravity that any hon. Member was of opinion that the House should have time to deliberate before coming to a decision upon it, he was empowered to move the adjournment of the House—a Motion upon which the House would decide, if necessary, by a Division. For he (Mr. Newdegate) held that there was nothing in what had passed on that occasion that could justify the adjournment of the House. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) had, however, used strong expressions as to the treatment which his constituents had, in his opinion, met with at the hands of the Government, and the hon. Member for Meath had been almost revolutionary in the threats he had uttered. It was his (Mr. Newdegate's) intention, therefore, to insist upon a Division on the question of adjournment now before the House. If those hon. Members were sincere in the substance of their speeches, and considered the expressions they had used justified by the circumstances, they were bound in honour to insist upon the Motion for adjournment; and the House would thus have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the manner in which its Business had been interrupted, and, in his opinion, its time had been wasted; while the public would know who agreed with the two hon. Members in the course they had pursued.

MR. SHAW hoped the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would not carry out his threat of forcing a Division on the House, and that the disturbance might be allowed to end. He had been a silent listener to what had taken place, and his honest opinion was that the only persons who took part in this discussion who were thoroughly in Order were the Mover and Seconder of the Motion for adjournment. They were speaking within their right, and were so within the Speaker's ruling. He was sure that his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo was one of the last men in the House who would wilfully disregard the authority of the Chair. He had his hon. Friend's authority for saying that he had not the slightest intention of disregarding the Speaker's ruling; but he felt deeply upon the matter to which his Question referred, and after the manner in which the Chief Secretary answered it he felt it was of as much importance to him as that great question on which the occupants of the Front Bench were going to perform a similar operation a few minutes later. The whole thing would have been over in 20 minutes, but for the premeditated attempt to drown his hon. Friend's voice with noise. As a rule, the House did conduct its proceedings with good temper and patience. He remembered in the former Parliament there were infinitely more attempts of this kind, and he only hoped that hon. Gentlemen would follow the example of their Leaders on the Treasury Bench, who conducted their Business with good temper. Irishmen were supposed to be unruly; but he had presided for several days over an assembly of Irishmen twice as large as that in the House at present, and had no such trouble with them as the Speaker had experienced during the last couple of hours.

MR. CHAPLIN rose in consequence of an intimation which had come from the Chair. He had understood the Speaker to say that after the proceedings of that night it would be necessary to restrict the privileges of Members in respect of moving the adjournment of the House. ["No, no!"] The present case was, in his experience, without precedent.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. MONK rose to Order. He appealed to Mr. Speaker whether his words were not that it "might be" necessary, not that it "would be."

MR. SPEAKER called upon the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire to proceed.

MR. CHAPLIN continued. He could not doubt, after such an intimation from the Chair—whether the words used were "would be" or "might be"—that it was a subject which must receive the serious consideration of the House. The natural guardians of the Order, the dignity, and the reputation of that Assembly were, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, and then the Leader of the House and the Leader of the Opposition; and he rose merely to express his hope that, in consequence of the extraordinary and unprecedented proceedings of that evening, the Leaders of the House would lose no further time in conferring together as to some steps to be taken to prevent their recurrence. The right hon. Member for Birmingham recommended patience. Patience, indeed! He thought that the patience and long suffering of the House of Commons had been the marvel of the country and the world. The time had undoubtedly arrived when, if the House of Commons was to maintain its great position in this country, something must be done to vindicate its Order and uphold its character. He, therefore, trusted that the Leaders on both sides would confer together shortly on that matter, and give some assurance to the House that they intended to deal with it—because, if not, he felt satisfied that it must become the duty of independent Members on both sides to consider how the credit and reputation of the House were to be maintained.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY was surprised the hon. Gentleman, who was so anxious to maintain the Order and dignity of the House, had not, in accordance with the principles he professed, taken the advice of a responsible Minister, and allowed the incident to close. Then, how a Gentleman who expressed himself—and, doubtless, sincerely—as anxious to maintain the Order of the House, should take an opportunity of dropping a little more inflammatory oil upon the smouldering embers of this excited discussion, which was about to be extinguished, passed his comprehension. All were sensible there had been mistakes committed that night, and those mistakes had not been confined to one side of the House. The interruptions to which the hon. Member for Mayo was subjected were of a kind that if used against any hon. Member sitting opposite they would have drawn forth the strongest expressions of disapprobation. Moreover, it was evident that the answer of the Chief Secretary to his hon. Friend's Question was distinctly intended to be sarcastic and irritating. Now, it was a very dangerous thing to be sarcastic and irritating, when the question had to do with the sufferings of a whole people. Not one word had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) in reference to the condition of the people in the West of Ireland that he could not endorse. He did not wish to prolong the debate on the subject; but it was a matter for public regret that the Minister who was responsible should think more of winning the cheers of those who sat behind him than of relieving the extreme misery existing in the country with which he was officially connected. If the Leaders of the House did confer, and the result of that conference was an attempt to limit the privileges of Members, he felt sure that attempt would be resisted by Members on that side, whether English or Irish. He hoped the incident would now close, and carry with it a lesson to all. That lesson was that every hon. Member in the House was equal, and had equal privileges, and that Members must not, in their dislike to the views another might hold, attempt to prevent his voice being heard. If that attempt was made, there must be a constant repetition of scenes he, for one, deeply regretted, and for which the hon. Member for Mayo was not responsible.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON said, that the right hon. Member for Birmingham had spoken as if those on the Ministerial side of the House were peculiarly liable to reproach for their conduct on that occasion. Now, he had listened attentively to the hon. Member for Mayo throughout, and could say that, so far from that hon. Gentleman having risen in his place and made a speech on the spur of the moment, it was evident that he had come down to the House anticipating an unfavourable reply to his Question, and furnished with a set speech committed to notes, to which he made repeated reference.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that he had the facts of the case, but had not intended to detain the House at any length.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON: It was clear that the hon. Member, anticipating an unfavourable answer to his Question, had come down prepared with his reply. Where, then, was the justice of the remark of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, that if they had only exhibited a little patience the hon. Member for Mayo would not have occupied more than five minutes of their time? Those sitting below the Gangway on the Ministerial side were not open to the reproach of want of patience in listening to the Irish Members; but when they saw a pre-determination manifested to seize an illegitimate occasion to inflict on the House a long speech on the wrongs of Ireland, it was not surprising that some impatience should be exhibited.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, no doubt, it was an inconvenient practice to move the adjournment of the House at Question time, especially if it was pushed far; but, still, it was a practice within the Rules of the House, and it had been followed on more than one occasion by the present Prime Minister. No objection was made the other day, when the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington) intimated that he might this evening take that course. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would appeal to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) not to divide on the present occasion, which would be a simple waste of time. Although a large number of hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side might vote with that hon. Member because they wished to go on with the Business of the House, they did not share his opinion.

MR. SHERIDAN said, he had rarely witnessed so much irregularity as had occurred that evening. He had no sympathy with the Motion for adjournment; but he must say that the person most out of Order was his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who addressed substantially an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make fresh Rules for conducting the Business of the House. The privileges of Members of that House had not yet been secured by the favour of Ministers of the Crown.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER wished to say that the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington) was entirely wrong in accusing him of any intentional disrespect to the Chair. As he could not follow any advice given by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), he would ask the permission of the House to withdraw his Motion.

Question, "That the Motion be, by leave, withdrawn," put, and agreed to.

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to make some remarks; but—

MR. SPEAKER said, that on putting the Question, he had heard no voice in the Negative.

KINGDOM OF SIAM—ACTION OF MR. KNOX, BRITISH CONSUL GENERAL. QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the case that Mr. Knox, the British Consul General in Siam, has ordered up a British gunboat from Singapore to Bangkok, in consequence of the punishment for treason of a Siamese Minister, who is son-in-law to Mr. Knox?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, a misunderstanding has arisen between Mr. Knox, Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General at Bangkok, and the Siamese Government. I would rather not, at the present moment, enter into the particulars respecting the causes of this misunderstanding. A man-of-war has proceeded to Bangkok at Mr. Knox's request. Apology has since been tendered. It is hoped, therefore, that the difficulty is in course of satisfactory adjustment.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—DISASTER TO THE 10TH HUSSARS. QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Court of Inquiry appointed to investigate the causes of the disaster to the 10th Hussars at the Cabul River Ford has forwarded the result of their inquiry to the proper authority; whether the decision of this Court has been hitherto kept secret; and, whether there are any reasons why the public should not be informed of the decision of this Court?

Mr. Sheridan

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the Report had been forwarded to the proper authority; but, as the hon. and learned Member was probably aware, the decisions of Courts of Inquiry were not made public, and there was no reason in this case to depart from the usual rule.

SOUTH AFRICA—EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any correspondence has taken place as to the contribution, if any, to be made by any Colony towards the expense of the Zulu War; and, if he can lay upon the Table any such correspondence up to the present time?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have not yet received answers to communications upon this subject made by me to South Africa; and as the Correspondence on the subject is not completed it is not desirable to produce it.

REPUBLIC OF NICARAGUA. QUESTION.

MR. P. J. SMYTH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is in a position to make a communication to the House respecting matters in dispute between this Country and the Republic of Nicaragua, and the steps that have been taken to effect an arrangement?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, if it were possible within the limits to an answer to a Question in the House to make a statement respecting the matter in dispute between this country and Nicaragua, I should be very glad to do so; but the matter involves a long history, spreading over a period of about 20 years. I am happy, however, to tell the hon. Member what I think, under the circumstances, will be considered sufficient for the present—namely, that all the matters in dispute have been referred to a neutral Government, and Austria and Holland have been asked to arbitrate on the matter. Both parties have agreed to abide by the award of the Austrian Government, which has accepted the officer of mediator. That arbitration will go on almost immediately. The Papers cannot be laid on the Table of the House until after the arbitration is concluded.

SERVIA AND BULGARIA — COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH AUSTRIA.

QUESTIONS.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that negotiations for Commercial Treaties are proceeding between Austria and Servia, and Austria and Bulgaria; whether the present Turkish Duties on goods imported into Bulgaria will continue in force; whether Her Majesty's Government are taking steps to negotiate a Commercial Treaty with Servia and Bulgaria; and, whether they will take care that the benefits of any favourable Commercial Treaty between those Countries and any other European nation shall also be secured to England?

MR. MUNTZ asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What negotiations, if any, are in contemplation with the new States of Servia and Bulgaria, so as to ensure the Most Favoured Nation Clause in any Commercial Treaties?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the Questions of the two hon. Members refer to two different subjects relating to Servia and Bulgaria. With regard to Servia, Her Majesty's Government understand that a provisional Commercial Convention was concluded between Austria and Servia in July last; but they are not in a position to state what negotiations are at present pending between those countries. Article 37 of the Treaty of Berlin says—

“Until the conclusion of fresh arrangements no change shall be made in Servia in the actual conditions of the commercial intercourse of the Principality with foreign countries. No transit duties shall be levied on goods passing through Servia.”

Some time ago, by a provisional Declaration between Great Britain and Servia, signed March 5, 1879, and presented to Parliament (Commercial No. 7, 1879), and which is to remain in force till May 1, 1880, the most favoured nation treatment is secured. With regard to Bulgaria, the question is decided by the 8th Article of the Treaty of Berlin. By that Article, Bulgaria remains under the Turkish tariff. The Article in question says—

“The Treaties of Commerce and of Navigation, as well as all the Conventions and Arrangements concluded between foreign Powers and the Porte, and now in force, are maintained in the Principality of Bulgaria, and no change shall be made in them with regard to any Power without its previous consent. No transit duties shall be levied in Bulgaria on goods passing through that Principality. The subjects and citizens and commerce of all the Powers shall be treated in the Principality on a footing of strict equality.”

POST OFFICE—EXPRESS LETTER SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. RYDER asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the Express Letter Service, now in profitable operation in Germany, Belgium, and Switzerland, under which, for a small extra fee, letters too long to be telegraphed, original documents, &c. are delivered by means of special messengers (usually the Telegraph boys) from one to two hours earlier than by the ordinary delivery; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of trying the Express Letter Service in the first instance between London and some of the large towns, such as Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, and Bristol?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that his attention was called some time ago to the express letter service referred to. The subject had been carefully considered; but the result of that consideration was not favourable to its adoption in this country.

AFGHANISTAN—DEMARCATON OF TERRITORY.—QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If, when he lays upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Treaty recently concluded with the Ameer of Afghanistan, he will also lay a sketch Map showing the territory ceded to England?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the exact limits of the districts not ceded, but assigned, by the Ameer of Afghanistan to the protection and administration of the British Government, are to be demarcated by a mixed boundary Commission. It may, therefore, not be possible to do what the hon. and gallant Member asks; but we will give such a map as soon as we can.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—
DESTRUCTION OF VILLAGES.

QUESTIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, whether his attention has been directed to the letter of the special correspondent of the "Daily News," published in the issue of that paper on the 20th instant, in which the destruction of four native villages by Colonel Lowe's command is described; whether, in particular, he has marked the following statement:—

"Lord Chelmsford had given orders that no kraals should be burned until the general advance, being anxious to utilise the woodwork of the huts as fuel; but these kraals were far away from the line of any possible advance, and Colonel Lowe determined to destroy them. Two laconic words from Long to his men, 'set fire,' sufficed to set them in a blaze, mere flimsy structures of wooden wattle as they were."

and, whether the Government will make inquiries as to any order given by Lord Chelmsford for the burning of native villages during the general advance into Zululand such as is here alleged?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, my attention was called to the subject by the hon. Member's Question of a few days ago, and I have nothing to add to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies on that occasion—namely, that there is no reason to believe that these villages were destroyed from any wantonness, but simply out of military necessity. I have not seen any reason to address specific inquiries to Lord Chelmsford upon the subject.

MR. O'DONNELL asked what the right hon. Gentleman meant by military necessity?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, one meaning is, that they should not afford cover to the enemy.

MR. O'DONNELL: Or afford shelter to women and children. He would now ask, Whether his attention has been called to an extract from a letter of a soldier in the 60th Rifles, published in the "Daily News" of Tuesday last, in which it is stated, with reference to the action against the Zulus of April 2nd, on the march to relieve Ekowe—

"After the firing was all done, we sent our blacks in amongst them, and they killed all the wounded; and some of them asked our blacks for a drop of water; yes, and they gave them water too—they put their assegais through them and struck them to the ground;"

whether he has seen the statement published in all the daily papers that Colonel Brabant and the Cape Mounted Yeomanry obtained the surrender of a number of Basutos by throwing dynamite into a cave in which they had taken refuge along with nearly two hundred women and children; and, whether he has any reason to believe these statements are substantially true?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, my attention was first called to the first part of the Question when the Paper was put before me this morning, in order that I should answer the Question to-night. I can, however, express no opinion about the matter. With regard to the second part of the Question, I have seen it stated in the daily papers that Colonel Brabant, to obtain the surrender of the Basutos, did use dynamite; but he is not under the orders of my Department. I have, therefore, no information on the subject, nor can I express an opinion on the matter.

THE TRUCK SYSTEM—NAILERS AND RIVET-MAKERS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SHERIDAN asked the President of the Board of Trade, whether he is aware of the prevalence of the truck system in the Midland Counties particularly amongst the nailers and rivet-makers; and, whether he will consider the propriety of instituting an inquiry into the system and its results?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the matter was inquired into by a Departmental Commission in 1871, and they found that, to a considerable extent, the system did exist amongst the nailers and rivet-makers. He need not say that the practice was injurious and undoubtedly illegal; but the present law, though defective, was sufficient to put down its worst abuses, if those concerned would only come forward. There was no reason to suppose that inquiry would throw any more light on the subject.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the right hon. Gentleman, Who instructed the Inspectors to inquire into the subject?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had instructed the Chief Inspector of Factories to do all that he could; but he found, on consultation with that gentleman, that there was great difficulty in getting people to give evidence, lest they should lose their work.

EGYPT—ABDICATION OF THE KHEDIVE.

EXPLANATION. QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, perhaps the House will allow me to say one word in explanation of the Question I am now about to put to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In putting that Question, it is not in the least my desire to express any opinion whatever, with the information we possess, as to the policy which is now being pursued in Egypt; and I also wish to disclaim the slightest desire to embarrass in the smallest degree the action of Her Majesty's Government. On the contrary, I trust that the Question I am now putting, after what has occurred this evening, may not give rise to an irregular discussion. I hope that, by putting this Question, I am giving Her Majesty's Government an opportunity of making such a statement as will satisfy what, I think, is the legitimate desire of the House for information upon the matter. I hope to put them in a position to make such a statement as will enable us to postpone until what may appear to the Government a more convenient time any full discussion. I may add I did not state the other day that it was my intention to move the adjournment of the House; but only that it was possible I might do so, and, in saying that, I only wished to give the Government a fair warning of what was likely to happen if their answer was not satisfactory. I will only add, before putting the Question, that the Government will, no doubt, remember that most important events have been occurring in Egypt during the last three months, and that we have had very little information indeed with respect to what was going on, and none of that kind generally given to the House in authentic Papers. No Papers have been presented to the House since the end of December; and, in these circumstances, I think that the Government will see that it is right they should furnish to the House such information as they can. I wish to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, With what European Governments negotiations on the subject of the abdication of the Khedive are in progress; whether he can state the grounds on which the recommendation to the Khedive to abdicate has been based; whether they relate to the failure of the Khedive to execute his engagements to his creditors or to Foreign States; whether any communication has taken place with the Government of the Sultan, and of what character; whether any answer has yet been received from the Khedive; and, whether the Papers relating to these transactions will shortly be laid upon the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I can assure the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) that the Government in no way whatever complain of, or express surprise at, the course which he has taken; on the contrary, we think it most natural that this Question should be asked, and we can only express our obligations to the noble Marquess, and the House generally, for the consideration they have shown in not pressing for any information at a time when the Government were obliged to say that it was inconvenient to give it. I would say that the answer which I had intended to make to the Question of the noble Marquess is, to a certain extent, modified by information which has reached us since the House met. That information is to the effect that the Khedive, Ismail Pasha, has, in obedience to orders which he has received from the Porte, abdicated in favour of his son, Prince Tewfik, and that the new Khedive, Prince Tewfik, was expected to be officially proclaimed as Khedive in Cairo this afternoon by 6 o'clock. Of course, in these circumstances, there is no longer any reason for delaying the presentation of the Papers and the discussion of the question which will be naturally raised. I believe I may say that Papers explanatory of the course which the Government has pursued will be laid upon the Table in the course of two or three days—not later, I hope, than Monday. That being so, I think it would be more convenient to the House that we should not enter into any premature discussion upon the question with the imperfect information that could be afforded by any answer that I could give. But I would say, with regard to the first part of the Question of the noble Marquess—"With what European Governments negotiations on the subject of the abdication of the Khedive are in progress?"—that negotiations have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and all the Great Powers of Europe—France, Germany, Austria, Russia, Italy, and the Porte. "The grounds on which the recommendation to the Khedive to abdicate have been based" will be seen from the Papers that will be presented; but I may state generally, with reference to that and the next part of the Question, that the principal ground upon which that step was recommended was the misgovernment of Egypt, and the conviction of Her Majesty's Government and the other Powers that that misgovernment was not likely to be corrected under the administration of the Khedive, Ismail Pasha. Of course, from what I have now said, the next part of the Question as to reference to the Government of the Sultan is answered, and, also, whether an answer has been received from the Khedive. The abdication has taken place in obedience to orders received from the Sultan, and Prince Tewfik has, no doubt, by this time, been proclaimed.

MR. OTWAY: I have no desire to open a discussion, now that we understand the Papers will be in our hands by Monday next; but I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the French Government insisted that the Porte should nominate Prince Tewfik to succeed his father; and, whether the Government of Russia, as being one of the Powers with whom negotiations have been carried on, has approved the nomination of Prince Tewfik, and the steps taken to enforce it?

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked, Whether the Papers would explain to the House the right which the Government had to interfere, and whether the right hon. Gentleman would give the House an opportunity of discussing the subject after the Papers had been laid on the Table?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government had recognized the power of the Porte to depose the Khedive of Egypt at its own will?

MR. FAWCETT: There is one part of the Question of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) which does not seem to me to have been answered, and a reply to which will, I am sure, give considerable relief. The noble Marquess asked whether the abdication of the Khedive had been recommended because of his failure to execute his engagements to his creditors or to foreign States? The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not answer that Question directly; but simply said that the recommendation was made in consequence of the misgovernment of Egypt. I should like to know, Whether the recommendation was given solely on that account, and had nothing to do with the failure of the Khedive to meet his engagements with his creditors?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway), I think he will see it would be inconvenient that I should state what are the views of the Government of Russia. If he waits until the Papers are presented, all that is known with regard to the action of foreign Powers will be communicated; but it is rather awkward to answer Questions with regard to the action of other States. If the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) will also wait until he sees the Papers and the precise way in which communications were made to the Porte, it would be more convenient. As to the respective rights of the Sultan and the Khedive, it is a delicate question, and it would be better we should not give imperfect answers which may lead to misconception, when the fullest information will be given in the Papers. With regard to the last Question of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), I should certainly say that the failure of the Khedive to execute his engagements to his creditors was not the ground on which the advice was given; but if the hon. Member asks whether the failure of the Khedive to execute his engagements to his creditors had anything to do with these proceedings, of course, it would be impossible not to say that part of the case which induced the Government to take these proceedings was the fact of the great complications which have arisen between the Khedive and his creditors. His arrangements had not proved successful, and considerable oppression had been brought to bear on the taxpayers of Egypt as the result of these complications with his creditors; and, moreover, still further complications were likely to arise owing to the judicial decisions in relation to his creditors. Therefore, it is impossible to say that the failure of the Khedive to execute his engagements to his creditors had nothing to do with the steps which have been taken; but, still, it would be incorrect to say that that was the reason of the action of the Government.

MR. OTWAY said, the Question he asked was a most important one, and he submitted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not answered it. His Question had reference to the action of Her Majesty's Government, and he would repeat it, and, in doing so, perhaps he might be permitted to explain that this was the first instance—if the Question was answered in the affirmative—in which any European Government had endeavoured to alter the Mohammedan law of succession in a Mohammedan country. ["Order, order!"] The Question was an important one, and if he was interrupted he would do that which he should be sorry to do, and which he had never done in his life—move the adjournment of the House. ["Oh, oh!"] His explanation was necessary to make the answer intelligible. He, therefore, wished to know, Whether the Government had urged on the Porte and insisted that Prince Tewfik should succeed, instead of the legitimate heir according to Mohammedan Law?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not understand that the law of succession with regard to Mohammedan Governments has been altered. I may say that there was no pressure put by Her Majesty's Government upon the Porte to alter the law of succession; but it is a matter of such delicacy that I think it is far better for the hon. Gentleman and the House to await the publication of the official despatches than to enter on a discussion which would be misleading in the absence of those documents.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked, Whether the Government would give the House an early opportunity of considering the question after the presentation of the Papers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if the House, after receiving the Papers, should desire an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon them, there would be no objection on the part of the Government to provide a convenient day for the purpose. Indeed, it would be their duty to do so.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) — EXPENDITURE ON ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is still his intention to issue a Minute, imposing a two guinea limit on the maintenance expenses of Board Schools this Session; and, if so, when such Minute will be laid on the Table of the House?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, at the time I indicated our intention of issuing a Minute to limit the excessive expenditure in certain elementary schools, I showed the necessity for some such action by giving the figures relating both to the fees paid as well as to the cost of maintenance per child in the schools of the London School Board. Since then, I find that the London School Board have themselves proposed an inquiry into their expenditure, which inquiry is about to commence immediately. The justice of the criticisms which I was compelled to make being, therefore, to a certain extent admitted, I think that it would be only fair to the School Board that the Education Department should postpone taking any action until we have given time to the Board themselves to initiate and carry out the reductions which may appear necessary to them. We shall, therefore, postpone, but not abandon, our intention of issuing a Minute to reduce excessive expenditure in schools purporting to be elementary.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 24th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 76 (Reckoning and forfeiture of service).

Amendment proposed, in page 41, line 14, to leave out from the word "attestation" to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'but when a soldier of the regular forces has been guilty of any of the following offences,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the special reason which he had for objecting to the c section was its unvarying severity. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had consented to take out sub-sections c and d, referring to the offence of being taken prisoner of war under certain conditions, and of not rejoining the regiment when released under certain circumstances. But he (Mr. O'Donnell) ventured to think that the clause would be much more improved by leaving out sub-section b also; not that the crime of fraudulent enlistment was not a very considerable one, but that this crime, as well as that of desertion, ought to be treated under a separate clause altogether. Desertion was a crime which varied very much in itself. In one case a man might desert under very bad circumstances, and fully deserve to have all his previous service forfeited; and in another case he might desert under very different circumstances—might not be absent long, and might soon return to his corps—and yet he would find himself forced to forfeit all his previous service. He must suffer punishment, without any option on the part of his judges, although, in fact, he did not belong to the worst category of deserters. Again, it was quite possible that a case of fraudulent enlistment might occur without any very serious moral delinquency on the part of the offender. Suppose a case of fraudulent enlistment, where a man enlisted in a second regiment—say, for the purpose of serving with an old comrade, or some other reason of the kind; he concealed the fact of his being already a soldier, and, undoubtedly, deceived the country and cheated it out of a certain sum of money; yet it appeared to him (Mr. O'Donnell) that a man who committed this crime in order to serve along with an old comrade, or a village friend, was not so bad as the man who, according to an American expression, was a regular "bounty jumper." But, under the Act, he would be declared to forfeit all his previous service, if his offence should be discovered. He thought it ought to be left more particularly to the court martial to say whether or not such a case should carry with it forfeiture of all previous service. By denying to the court martial this power its dignity was lowered; while, at the same time, it was prevented from properly discriminating offences. It was true that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War proposed to amend the clause, to the effect that where a deserter served unexceptionally for five years he would be allowed to recover his former service; but that by no means met the difficulties of the case, which, as he (Mr. O'Donnell) had before pointed out, consisted in the very great difference in guilt between deserter and deserter. Surely, a court martial, which was intrusted with the power of flogging, ought also to be trusted with the power of discriminating whether a deserter should forfeit the whole of his previous service, or whether he should be let off with a light sentence.

MR. PARNELL said, the clause was opposed to the principle introduced when the system of short service was established. What was the punishment proposed by the clause? It was that a soldier guilty of desertion should serve longer in the Army. Was it wise to hold out to a soldier that service in the Army was to be a punishment? It appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) that in framing the Bill there had been too much desire to keep to the old models. In addition to the sentences of imprisonment and forfeiture, it was put to the soldier, as a further punishment, that he should serve longer in the Army. It was well known that a thing, when represented as disagreeable, and used as a punishment, became obnoxious; as in old times, when going to church was made a sort of punishment for children. If, therefore, a longer period of service was held out as a punishment to soldiers, the Army would be made objectionable to those persons desirous of enlisting. He thought it would be well to strike out the four sub-sections a, b, c, d.

MR. O'DONNELL asked permission to withdraw his Amendment, as the same points were raised by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell).

Question put, "That the Amendment be, by leave, withdrawn."

MR. BIGGAR considered the arguments very strong in favour of striking out the sub-sections a and b, which dealt with desertion and fraudulent enlistment, and made it imperative upon the court martial to punish all offenders, great or small, no matter whether their time of service was long or short. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had very properly said that some soldiers deserted and re-deserted time after time, and that the result was they were the greater part of their lives in gaol. The argument of those who opposed the clause did not apply to men of that stamp, who would have nothing in consequence to forfeit in point of service. But the punishment of forfeiture would fall very heavily upon the well-conducted soldier, who had little recorded against him; but who, for some reason or other, deserted nearly at the end of his term of service. Such a man might easily be absent for a time without leave, and through a number of circumstances, which daily occurred, might be prevented from returning to his regiment, and the court martial might find him guilty of desertion and punish him; but the clause laid it down that in addition to the punishment to be awarded he should suffer a further very severe penalty in the loss of all his previous service. Again, with regard to fraudulent enlistment, a recruit of 17 went before the justices and swore he was 18 years of age; at the end of seven years, perhaps, when he had become a good and useful soldier, he was found out, and the court martial might award him punishment for having fraudulently enlisted. He (Mr. Biggar) thought it would be proper that the court martial should have the option of making a soldier forfeit his service or not. But to say first that the court martial should inflict punishment for desertion, and then to impose the additional punishment of forfeiture, was monstrous.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the clause was one which he must ask the Committee to pass in the form in which it was left on Monday last. The hon. and gallant Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst) had very truly reminded the Committee that it should not allow sympathy for the soldiers who were under punishment to extend so far as to diminish the respect for the good soldiers who were serving in the Army. He proposed to take out sub-sections c and d; but with regard to desertion from Her Majesty's Service and fraudulent enlistment, these were crimes which could not but be perpetrated by the soldier himself, and which could not in any way be forced upon him; he therefore felt bound to retain the sub-sections a and b. With reference to the case of men who were supposed to desert in order to join friends in other regiments, he had almost said it was nonsense to talk about such cases; for he believed, when good grounds existed, there was no difficulty whatever in a man being allowed to enter another regiment. But, be that as it might, he did not think any man had a right to be at liberty to transfer himself whenever he pleased. Such a man had entered into an engagement by the terms of which he must abide. He had already pointed out how great a blot upon the Army was desertion; while fraudulent enlistment amounted to a regular trade; and he quite admitted that the Government wanted to deal with those crimes more severely than had been the case hitherto; and it was felt necessary, while relieving the soldier of the consequences of some minor offences, to hit him harder for crimes committed not only against the State, but against his comrades. As the matter stood, a soldier guilty of desertion from Her Majesty's Service, or of fraudulent enlistment, ipso facto, would forfeit his service; he chose to break his engagement and incur this penalty, and the State was right in considering him as entering into an engagement de novo. He did not think that, in view of the present short service in the Army, it was at all unreasonable to ask the Committee to assent to the clause as amended.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to see words inserted in the clause to enable commanding officers, in some cases, to reduce the forfeiture of service to a shorter period than the whole time of service. He put the case of a man who had served 10 years, and borne a high character, who, being sent to a bad station, suffered in his health, and for some reason or other, in a moment of weakness, deserted. The commanding officer, although he might wish to punish the man by, say, two years' forfeiture, would be absolutely compelled by law to forfeit the whole 10 years' service. He thought some provision should be made in the clause to meet cases of that kind.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished to bring under the notice of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War the fact that the present Bill, unlike the old Mutiny Act, did not contain any power to punish a man who confessed himself to be in the Militia at the time of his enlistment in the Army.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, as well as all military men, laid great stress upon the fact of the soldier entering into a contract, and deserving no mercy if he voluntarily broke it. That would be quite true with regard to a contract entered into under ordinary civil conditions; but it must be borne in mind that when a minor entered into a contract, in order to make it binding upon him, he must re-consent to it when he came of age. But, in this case, not only to the detriment of the principles of civil right, but to the detriment of the efficiency of the Army, the State took into its service boys who were legally incapable of binding themselves by contract. The contract referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was no reason why these boys should be bound down to what might be the folly of their youth at 18 or 19; nor was it a reason for treating them as deserters, just as if they were men of full age. It was necessary to do one of two things; either to insist that no one should enter the Army who was not of full age, or to draw a distinction between the contract entered into by a boy, and the contract entered into by a man of full age. Let men of full age, if necessary, be treated with severity; but he maintained that there was a great deal of room for mercy to be shown to lads of 18 or 19, whom it would be a violation of the rules of civil life to bind down to the engagements of their minority.

MR. RYLANDS, while he entirely agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War as to the gravity of the offences of desertion and fraudulent enlistment, and while he agreed that those offences should be punished and prevented, was bound to express his great doubt as to the necessity of this clause. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had spoken of it as one which would remove certain difficulties of account; but he (Mr. Rylands) was quite unable to see how it could do so. Then, if it were a question of punishing deserters and men who enlisted fraudulently, surely the 12th and 13th clauses of the Bill provided ample punishments for such persons. Was the object of the clause to add to the punishment already existing in the Bill, or was it to retain men in the Army for a longer period than that of their original enlistment? But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman knew a great deal better than he (Mr. Rylands) that to retain men of bad character, after two or three fraudulent enlistments, would be the greatest possible disadvantage to the Service. The great difficulty to be contended with was that boys were taken into the Service without any reference to their character. They took a lad who, perhaps, having got into some difficulty, and being morally and physically unfitted for the Service as well, rushed to the recruiting sergeant and enlisted in the Army, from which, after a year or two, he probably deserted, adding to the difficulties of Army regulation by becoming a worthless, but expensive, unit in the number of their soldiers. He could not see the good of retaining this clause, for, in his opinion, the best thing to do with a bad fellow who deserted once or twice was to punish him and get rid of him from the Army as soon as possible; otherwise, he believed, there would always remain a great deal of difficulty with regard to desertion. It also appeared to him that greater care should be taken to get young men as recruits of tolerably good character; but having provided in Clauses 12 and 13 for the punishment of desertion and fraudulent enlistment he doubted whether it was necessary to resort to the power proposed to be given by the clause under discussion.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the object of the clause was expressed in the words "the whole of his prior service shall be forfeited." He objected that the Committee should put into an Act of Parliament a second punishment as a consequence of another sentence, and give the court no option of modifying it, or relieving the prisoner in regard to it. There was a very strong objection to such undue severity in enactments which were intended to operate for the repression of crime, and mere irregularity, or offences. Who were the people to be affected by this clause, and who was it the whole of whose prior service should be forfeited? First, the soldier who deserted; secondly, the soldier who fraudulently enlisted. Now, the latter, he assumed, might be a grave case. But the Bill did exactly the same for the man who confessed himself to be a deserter, and with regard to whom the authorities had taken so lenient a view that they dispensed with his trial by court martial, as it did for the man who fraudulently enlisted. Did the Committee intend to rank together these two classes—those who were condemned by court martial, and those who were lesser offenders? He understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to say he was going to take out the words “if having been committed as a deserter by a court of summary jurisdiction;” in his (Mr. Hopwood’s) opinion it would also be well to take out the other words “or having confessed the offence he is liable to be tried,” because the offenders were both on a par as to the degree of their crime; one having been condemned by court martial—in regard to whom the case, perhaps, was not so strong—and the trial of the other having been dispensed with by competent authority. Then the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that a great deal of book-keeping was to be saved by the adoption of the clause. But was it the argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that that was to be effected at the expense of justice? Then, he had told the Committee that desertion and fraudulent enlistment were crimes which a man could not be forced to commit. What crimes could a man be forced to commit? The crimes which a man was forced to commit, he (Mr. Hopwood) apprehended ceased to be crimes at all. Take the case of a man under a non-commissioned officer, who treated him with brutality and bullied him; such cases were by no means uncommon, and many a man had been morally compelled to desert by the pressure put upon him in that way. Was that to be ranked with the crime of fraudulent enlistment, which had ever been, and must always be, a much more voluntary act than desertion? It ought not to be stereotyped in the Act of Parliament which the Committee were about to pass, that neither the court nor the authorities should have any option in the matter of forfeiture of service merely to save a few columns of book-keeping.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, at present, a soldier who had deserted and been tried by court martial forfeited the whole of his previous service; but, if he kept clear of the regimental defaulters’ book, he, at the end of five years, appeared before the commanding officer, and requested that his service might be restored. The commanding officer forwarded the application to the Secretary of State for War, who, as a matter of course, agreed to the restoration of service. He (Colonel Alexander) wished to point out that restoration after five years, under the present system of service, was rather too long deferred. The period of five years was all very well under the old system; but now, when a man had to serve six years with the Colours and six years with the Reserve, it was too much to expect that he should have to serve five years more in order to obtain restoration of service. He had already expressed his opinion upon this point, in reply to a Circular from the War Office, that the time should be reduced to two years, which he still thought would be sufficient under the present system of enlistment for six years.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL STANLEY moved the omission of sub-section d, which provided that the whole of the prior service of a soldier should be forfeited, if he should be convicted of the offence of not having, when released as a prisoner of war, rejoined his regiment as soon as he could and ought to have done.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section omitted accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY moved the omission of the words “by a court of summary jurisdiction,” in lines 27 and 28, observing, that although a man might be convicted as a deserter by a court of summary jurisdiction, he might be restored by the proper military authority.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

MR. HOPWOOD moved, as an Amendment, in page 41, line 31, to leave out the words “the whole of his previous service shall be forfeited,” in order to insert the words—

tions on the subject of the abdication of the Khedive are in progress?"—that negotiations have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and all the Great Powers of Europe—France, Germany, Austria, Russia, Italy, and the Porte. "The grounds on which the recommendation to the Khedive to abdicate have been based" will be seen from the Papers that will be presented; but I may state generally, with reference to that and the next part of the Question, that the principal ground upon which that step was recommended was the misgovernment of Egypt, and the conviction of Her Majesty's Government and the other Powers that that misgovernment was not likely to be corrected under the administration of the Khedive, Ismail Pasha. Of course, from what I have now said, the next part of the Question as to reference to the Government of the Sultan is answered, and, also, whether an answer has been received from the Khedive. The abdication has taken place in obedience to orders received from the Sultan, and Prince Tewfik has, no doubt, by this time, been proclaimed.

MR. OTWAY: I have no desire to open a discussion, now that we understand the Papers will be in our hands by Monday next; but I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the French Government insisted that the Porte should nominate Prince Tewfik to succeed his father; and, whether the Government of Russia, as being one of the Powers with whom negotiations have been carried on, has approved the nomination of Prince Tewfik, and the steps taken to enforce it?

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked, Whether the Papers would explain to the House the right which the Government had to interfere, and whether the right hon. Gentleman would give the House an opportunity of discussing the subject after the Papers had been laid on the Table?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government had recognized the power of the Porte to depose the Khedive of Egypt at its own will?

MR. FAWCETT: There is one part of the Question of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) which does not seem to me to have been answered, and a reply to which will, I am sure, give considerable relief. The noble Marquess asked whether the abdication of the Khedive had been recommended because of his failure to execute his engagements to his creditors or to foreign States? The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not answer that Question directly; but simply said that the recommendation was made in consequence of the misgovernment of Egypt. I should like to know, Whether the recommendation was given solely on that account, and had nothing to do with the failure of the Khedive to meet his engagements with his creditors?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway), I think he will see it would be inconvenient that I should state what are the views of the Government of Russia. If he waits until the Papers are presented, all that is known with regard to the action of foreign Powers will be communicated; but it is rather awkward to answer Questions with regard to the action of other States. If the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) will also wait until he sees the Papers and the precise way in which communications were made to the Porte, it would be more convenient. As to the respective rights of the Sultan and the Khedive, it is a delicate question, and it would be better we should not give imperfect answers which may lead to misconception, when the fullest information will be given in the Papers. With regard to the last Question of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), I should certainly say that the failure of the Khedive to execute his engagements to his creditors was not the ground on which the advice was given; but if the hon. Member asks whether the failure of the Khedive to execute his engagements to his creditors had anything to do with these proceedings, of course, it would be impossible not to say that part of the case which induced the Government to take these proceedings was the fact of the great complications which have arisen between the Khedive and his creditors. His arrangements had not proved successful, and considerable oppression had been brought to bear on the taxpayers of Egypt as the result of these complications with his creditors; and, moreover, still further complications were likely to arise owing to the judicial decisions in relation to his cre-gation in their favour in the present case. He was quite sure that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War did not wish to be severe upon soldiers, and that he was really resisting his own convictions in insisting upon this clause. He would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to be a little merciful upon this occasion, and to yield to his own good feelings in the matter. Although it might be a very good thing to follow the advice of the military authorities by whom he was advised, yet they knew that those gentlemen were much too fond of red tape; and it was for them, sitting there as legislators, not to let their judgment be warped from what they thought right, merely because those authorities were in favour of severe punishment.

MR. O'DONNELL ventured to say that this proposed penalty must act directly contrary to the desire of the Government. If a soldier deserted under the influence of some passing fancy, but afterwards repented, and wished to come back into the Army, a punishment was here enacted which would deter him from going back, and would punish him for repenting. After having confessed his offence, he was liable to be tried and to lose all his service, simply because he might have been a few weeks, or two months, away from his duty. The effect of the clause was to prevent a man who was disposed to go back doing so; and it would rather induce him to betake himself to America or the Colonies, for he would find that if he went back, this Act of Parliament absolutely forfeited to him all his prior service. In the whole course of his life he had never seen—not even in legislation for Ireland—a more absurd clause. He ventured, respectfully, to urge upon the attention of hon. Members of the Committee that this clause was putting a premium upon desertion. He should be very happy to hear any reason to alter his opinion; but, so far as most of them could see, the only effect of this clause was to punish a man for going back to his duty.

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that the effect of the clause was not what had been attributed to it by hon. Members. If a man came back he was tried; but his return would be taken as an extenuating circumstance, under Clause 56, by which a prisoner charged before a court martial with desertion might be found guilty of the minor offence of being absent without leave.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that formerly it was necessary for every soldier to be sentenced to forfeit his service. A power was given at one time to sentence a soldier to forfeit his further service as well; but that power was subsequently taken away, as it was held to be wrong. They were only going back now to what was the custom 20 or 25 years ago. Perhaps it would meet some of the objections that had been raised to enact that if a man voluntarily came back he should not necessarily forfeit his former service, but, at the option of the court, might be allowed to count his service up to the time of desertion. He thought that a power of that kind in the hands of the court martial would be instrumental in inducing men to return to their duty.

MR. PARNELL thought that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had made a very good point, when he said that this clause gave the military authorities power to dispose, without trial, of the case of a soldier who had deserted and returned, and to punish him for this offence without trying him. The competent military authorities were given power to sentence a soldier without trial, and to inflict the punishment upon him of forfeiture of his services, without having ascertained that he was guilty of the offence at all. That seemed to him to be a very extraordinary proposal, and he did not think that the working of the clause was generally understood. The clause gave the military authorities power to dispose of a case without trial, and to sentence a man, and to punish him for an offence of which he might not be guilty. In his opinion, it would be a very fair course to postpone this clause, until the Government should see that the position they were taking up was indefensible.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that hon. Gentlemen would not think him guilty of discourtesy in saying that he thought it would be very hard upon the Committee to postpone the clause. He begged to point out to the Committee that if this clause had been made more stringent, yet benefits had been extended to the soldier by the Bill in other directions. He had thought it undesirable that these two very serious

Question proposed, "That the words 'but when a soldier of the regular forces has been guilty of any of the following offences,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the special reason which he had for objecting to the c section was its unvarying severity. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had consented to take out sub-sections c and d, referring to the offence of being taken prisoner of war under certain conditions, and of not rejoining the regiment when released under certain circumstances. But he (Mr. O'Donnell) ventured to think that the clause would be much more improved by leaving out sub-section b also; not that the crime of fraudulent enlistment was not a very considerable one, but that this crime, as well as that of desertion, ought to be treated under a separate clause altogether. Desertion was a crime which varied very much in itself. In one case a man might desert under very bad circumstances, and fully deserve to have all his previous service forfeited; and in another case he might desert under very different circumstances—might not be absent long, and might soon return to his corps—and yet he would find himself forced to forfeit all his previous service. He must suffer punishment, without any option on the part of his judges, although, in fact, he did not belong to the worst category of deserters. Again, it was quite possible that a case of fraudulent enlistment might occur without any very serious moral delinquency on the part of the offender. Suppose a case of fraudulent enlistment, where a man enlisted in a second regiment—say, for the purpose of serving with an old comrade, or some other reason of the kind; he concealed the fact of his being already a soldier, and, undoubtedly, deceived the country and cheated it out of a certain sum of money; yet it appeared to him (Mr. O'Donnell) that a man who committed this crime in order to serve along with an old comrade, or a village friend, was not so bad as the man who, according to an American expression, was a regular "bounty jumper." But, under the Act, he would be declared to forfeit all his previous service, if his offence should be discovered. He thought it ought to be left more particularly to the court martial to say whether or not such a case should carry with it forfeiture of all previous service. By denying to the court martial this power its dignity was lowered; while, at the same time, it was prevented from properly discriminating offences. It was true that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War proposed to amend the clause, to the effect that where a deserter served unexceptionally for five years he would be allowed to recover his former service; but that by no means met the difficulties of the case, which, as he (Mr. O'Donnell) had before pointed out, consisted in the very great difference in guilt between deserter and deserter. Surely, a court martial, which was intrusted with the power of flogging, ought also to be trusted with the power of discriminating whether a deserter should forfeit the whole of his previous service, or whether he should be let off with a light sentence.

MR. PARNELL said, the clause was opposed to the principle introduced when the system of short service was established. What was the punishment proposed by the clause? It was that a soldier guilty of desertion should serve longer in the Army. Was it wise to hold out to a soldier that service in the Army was to be a punishment? It appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) that in framing the Bill there had been too much desire to keep to the old models. In addition to the sentences of imprisonment and forfeiture, it was put to the soldier, as a further punishment, that he should serve longer in the Army. It was well known that a thing, when represented as disagreeable, and used as a punishment, became obnoxious; as in old times, when going to church was made a sort of punishment for children. If, therefore, a longer period of service was held out as a punishment to soldiers, the Army would be made objectionable to those persons desirous of enlisting. He thought it would be well to strike out the four sub-sections a, b, c, d.

MR. O'DONNELL asked permission to withdraw his Amendment, as the same points were raised by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell).

Question put, "That the Amendment be, by leave, withdrawn."

MR. BIGGAR considered the arguments very strong in favour of striking out the sub-sections a and b, which

MR. RYLANDS did hope that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not for a moment suppose that the opposition to this clause was being pressed from any motives of obstruction; he (Mr. Rylands) entirely repudiated any such motives in his opposition to it. He rose for the purpose of saying that, as they went through the Bill, they continually met with evidence that, although keeping to the old Articles of War and the old Mutiny Act, yet, in every direction, there was a greater severity in respect of punishments, and a withdrawal of those elements of merciful consideration which ran through previous Regulations of the Army. No Article of War which he could find approached in severity this clause with respect to forfeiture of service. If he were wrong in that, he should be very glad, for he spoke on this subject with very great hesitation. But he would repeat, that he could find nothing in those Articles of War which justified the extreme severity of the clause now placed before the Committee. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman, he trusted, would give a promise—which, if he did, he (Mr. Rylands) was sure he would fulfil—that the merciful provisions found in the Articles of War, by which service was given back to deserters under certain conditions, and on proof of subsequent good conduct, should be introduced into this measure. Those merciful provisions, which were found in the Articles of War, were entirely left out in this Bill; and he should be glad, before the clause passed, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would state the conclusions at which he had arrived with respect to the 169th Article of War. He most emphatically protested against the Committee being pressed to pass this clause in the shape in which it stood, and he trusted that some concessions would be made by the Government.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that if the Committee would once more give him their attention he would endeavour to lay the matter before them. Under the present rules, if a man were absent more than five days, and he was found guilty of desertion, his previous service was forfeited. And not only were a man's service forfeited if he were found guilty of desertion, but also if he were convicted of being absent without leave for longer than that period. Under this measure, the forfeiture of previous service was limited to the two serious crimes of desertion and fraudulent enlistment; and hon. Members would, therefore, see that a change was made in the direction of leniency. But another and a greater change had been made. As the clause was drawn, a man who had been convicted and imprisoned no longer forfeited the time which he passed in prison. At present, a man forfeited all the time that he passed in prison; and the effect was this—that a soldier who had served a great deal of his time in prison practically went on renewing his engagement. That rule was now made to cease altogether. He hoped that the operation of that change would be that a number of men whom it was very desirable not to retain in the Army, and who passed a great part of their time in prison, would be gradually weeded from it. He fully admitted that for those two crimes the punishment was made somewhat more severe than before. But if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) and others would look at the clauses further on, and take into consideration the various loopholes that had now been given to men to return to the Service, in respect of the consequences of the minor crimes, they would find that, on the whole, the changes which had been made were merciful. If they took into consideration the provision by which men sentenced to a short term of imprisonment were now drafted abroad and enabled to have another chance, instead of being confined in prison; if all these things were taken into consideration, and the balance struck, he did hope that the Committee would see that there had been an endeavour, in framing this Bill, to be as merciful as was consistent with the due maintenance of discipline.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to draw attention to sub-section b, and to point out that the offence of fraudulent enlistment was dealt with, not only in that clause, but under sub-section 7 of Clause 80. It seemed to him hardly possible that those provisions for fraudulent enlistment should be concurrent, and should remain in the Bill together. He hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would explain how this came about. With regard to the offence of desertion, it was, no doubt, very common, and it was necessary to

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished to bring under the notice of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War the fact that the present Bill, unlike the old Mutiny Act, did not contain any power to punish a man who confessed himself to be in the Militia at the time of his enlistment in the Army.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, as well as all military men, laid great stress upon the fact of the soldier entering into a contract, and deserving no mercy if he voluntarily broke it. That would be quite true with regard to a contract entered into under ordinary civil conditions; but it must be borne in mind that when a minor entered into a contract, in order to make it binding upon him, he must re-consent to it when he came of age. But, in this case, not only to the detriment of the principles of civil right, but to the detriment of the efficiency of the Army, the State took into its service boys who were legally incapable of binding themselves by contract. The contract referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was no reason why these boys should be bound down to what might be the folly of their youth at 18 or 19; nor was it a reason for treating them as deserters, just as if they were men of full age. It was necessary to do one of two things; either to insist that no one should enter the Army who was not of full age, or to draw a distinction between the contract entered into by a boy, and the contract entered into by a man of full age. Let men of full age, if necessary, be treated with severity; but he maintained that there was a great deal of room for mercy to be shown to lads of 18 or 19, whom it would be a violation of the rules of civil life to bind down to the engagements of their minority.

MR. RYLANDS, while he entirely agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War as to the gravity of the offences of desertion and fraudulent enlistment, and while he agreed that those offences should be punished and prevented, was bound to express his great doubt as to the necessity of this clause. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had spoken of it as one which would remove certain difficulties of account; but he (Mr. Rylands) was quite unable to see how it could do so. Then, if it were a question of punishing deserters and men who enlisted fraudulently, surely the 12th and 13th clauses of the Bill provided ample punishments for such persons. Was the object of the clause to add to the punishment already existing in the Bill, or was it to retain men in the Army for a longer period than that of their original enlistment? But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman knew a great deal better than he (Mr. Rylands) that to retain men of bad character, after two or three fraudulent enlistments, would be the greatest possible disadvantage to the Service. The great difficulty to be contended with was that boys were taken into the Service without any reference to their character. They took a lad who, perhaps, having got into some difficulty, and being morally and physically unfitted for the Service as well, rushed to the recruiting sergeant and enlisted in the Army, from which, after a year or two, he probably deserted, adding to the difficulties of Army regulation by becoming a worthless, but expensive, unit in the number of their soldiers. He could not see the good of retaining this clause, for, in his opinion, the best thing to do with a bad fellow who deserted once or twice was to punish him and get rid of him from the Army as soon as possible; otherwise, he believed, there would always remain a great deal of difficulty with regard to desertion. It also appeared to him that greater care should be taken to get young men as recruits of tolerably good character; but having provided in Clauses 12 and 13 for the punishment of desertion and fraudulent enlistment he doubted whether it was necessary to resort to the power proposed to be given by the clause under discussion.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the object of the clause was expressed in the words "the whole of his prior service shall be forfeited." He objected that the Committee should put into an Act of Parliament a second punishment as a consequence of another sentence, and give the court no option of modifying it, or relieving the prisoner in regard to it. There was a very strong objection to such undue severity in enactments which were intended to operate for the repression of crime, and mere irregularity, or offences. Who were the people to be affected by this clause, and who was it the whole of whose prior service should dealt with desertion and fraudulent enlistment, and made it imperative upon the court martial to punish all offenders, great or small, no matter whether their time of service was long or short. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had very properly said that some soldiers deserted and re-deserted time after time, and that the result was they were the greater part of their lives in gaol. The argument of those who opposed the clause did not apply to men of that stamp, who would have nothing in consequence to forfeit in point of service. But the punishment of forfeiture would fall very heavily upon the well-conducted soldier, who had little recorded against him; but who, for some reason or other, deserted nearly at the end of his term of service. Such a man might easily be absent for a time without leave, and through a number of circumstances, which daily occurred, might be prevented from returning to his regiment, and the court martial might find him guilty of desertion and punish him; but the clause laid it down that in addition to the punishment to be awarded he should suffer a further very severe penalty in the loss of all his previous service. Again, with regard to fraudulent enlistment, a recruit of 17 went before the justices and swore he was 18 years of age; at the end of seven years, perhaps, when he had become a good and useful soldier, he was found out, and the court martial might award him punishment for having fraudulently enlisted. He (Mr. Biggar) thought it would be proper that the court martial should have the option of making a soldier forfeit his service or not. But to say first that the court martial should inflict punishment for desertion, and then to impose the additional punishment of forfeiture, was monstrous.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the clause was one which he must ask the Committee to pass in the form in which it was left on Monday last. The hon. and gallant Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst) had very truly reminded the Committee that it should not allow sympathy for the soldiers who were under punishment to extend so far as to diminish the respect for the good soldiers who were serving in the Army. He proposed to take out sub-sections c and d; but with regard to desertion from Her Majesty's Service and fraudulent enlistment, these were crimes which could not but be perpetrated by the soldier himself, and which could not in any way be forced upon him; he therefore felt bound to retain the sub-sections a and b. With reference to the case of men who were supposed to desert in order to join friends in other regiments, he had almost said it was nonsense to talk about such cases; for he believed, when good grounds existed, there was no difficulty whatever in a man being allowed to enter another regiment. But, be that as it might, he did not think any man had a right to be at liberty to transfer himself whenever he pleased. Such a man had entered into an engagement by the terms of which he must abide. He had already pointed out how great a blot upon the Army was desertion; while fraudulent enlistment amounted to a regular trade; and he quite admitted that the Government wanted to deal with those crimes more severely than had been the case hitherto; and it was felt necessary, while relieving the soldier of the consequences of some minor offences, to hit him harder for crimes committed not only against the State, but against his comrades. As the matter stood, a soldier guilty of desertion from Her Majesty's Service, or of fraudulent enlistment, ipso facto, would forfeit his service; he chose to break his engagement and incur this penalty, and the State was right in considering him as entering into an engagement de novo. He did not think that, in view of the present short service in the Army, it was at all unreasonable to ask the Committee to assent to the clause as amended.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to see words inserted in the clause to enable commanding officers, in some cases, to reduce the forfeiture of service to a shorter period than the whole time of service. He put the case of a man who had served 10 years, and borne a high character, who, being sent to a bad station, suffered in his health, and for some reason or other, in a moment of weakness, deserted. The commanding officer, although he might wish to punish the man by, say, two years' forfeiture, would be absolutely compelled by law to forfeit the whole 10 years' service. He thought some provision should be made in the clause to meet cases of that kind.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished to bring under the notice of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War the fact that the present Bill, unlike the old Mutiny Act, did not contain any power to punish a man who confessed himself to be in the Militia at the time of his enlistment in the Army.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, as well as all military men, laid great stress upon the fact of the soldier entering into a contract, and deserving no mercy if he voluntarily broke it. That would be quite true with regard to a contract entered into under ordinary civil conditions; but it must be borne in mind that when a minor entered into a contract, in order to make it binding upon him, he must re-consent to it when he came of age. But, in this case, not only to the detriment of the principles of civil right, but to the detriment of the efficiency of the Army, the State took into its service boys who were legally incapable of binding themselves by contract. The contract referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was no reason why these boys should be bound down to what might be the folly of their youth at 18 or 19; nor was it a reason for treating them as deserters, just as if they were men of full age. It was necessary to do one of two things; either to insist that no one should enter the Army who was not of full age, or to draw a distinction between the contract entered into by a boy, and the contract entered into by a man of full age. Let men of full age, if necessary, be treated with severity; but he maintained that there was a great deal of room for mercy to be shown to lads of 18 or 19, whom it would be a violation of the rules of civil life to bind down to the engagements of their minority.

MR. RYLANDS, while he entirely agreed with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War as to the gravity of the offences of desertion and fraudulent enlistment, and while he agreed that those offences should be punished and prevented, was bound to express his great doubt as to the necessity of this clause. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had spoken of it as one which would remove certain difficulties of account; but he (Mr. Rylands) was quite unable to see how it could do so. Then, if it were a question of punishing deserters and men who enlisted fraudulently, surely the 12th and 13th clauses of the Bill provided ample punishments for such persons. Was the object of the clause to add to the punishment already existing in the Bill, or was it to retain men in the Army for a longer period than that of their original enlistment? But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman knew a great deal better than he (Mr. Rylands) that to retain men of bad character, after two or three fraudulent enlistments, would be the greatest possible disadvantage to the Service. The great difficulty to be contended with was that boys were taken into the Service without any reference to their character. They took a lad who, perhaps, having got into some difficulty, and being morally and physically unfitted for the Service as well, rushed to the recruiting sergeant and enlisted in the Army, from which, after a year or two, he probably deserted, adding to the difficulties of Army regulation by becoming a worthless, but expensive, unit in the number of their soldiers. He could not see the good of retaining this clause, for, in his opinion, the best thing to do with a bad fellow who deserted once or twice was to punish him and get rid of him from the Army as soon as possible; otherwise, he believed, there would always remain a great deal of difficulty with regard to desertion. It also appeared to him that greater care should be taken to get young men as recruits of tolerably good character; but having provided in Clauses 12 and 13 for the punishment of desertion and fraudulent enlistment he doubted whether it was necessary to resort to the power proposed to be given by the clause under discussion.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the object of the clause was expressed in the words "the whole of his prior service shall be forfeited." He objected that the Committee should put into an Act of Parliament a second punishment as a consequence of another sentence, and give the court no option of modifying it, or relieving the prisoner in regard to it. There was a very strong objection to such undue severity in enactments which were intended to operate for the repression of crime, and mere irregularity, or offences. Who were the people to be affected by this clause, and who was it the whole of whose prior service should be forfeited? First, the soldier who deserted; secondly, the soldier who fraudulently enlisted. Now, the latter, he assumed, might be a grave case. But the Bill did exactly the same for the man who confessed himself to be a deserter, and with regard to whom the authorities had taken so lenient a view that they dispensed with his trial by court martial, as it did for the man who fraudulently enlisted. Did the Committee intend to rank together these two classes—those who were condemned by court martial, and those who were lesser offenders? He understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to say he was going to take out the words “if having been committed as a deserter by a court of summary jurisdiction;” in his (Mr. Hopwood’s) opinion it would also be well to take out the other words “or having confessed the offence he is liable to be tried,” because the offenders were both on a par as to the degree of their crime; one having been condemned by court martial—in regard to whom the case, perhaps, was not so strong—and the trial of the other having been dispensed with by competent authority. Then the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that a great deal of book-keeping was to be saved by the adoption of the clause. But was it the argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that that was to be effected at the expense of justice? Then, he had told the Committee that desertion and fraudulent enlistment were crimes which a man could not be forced to commit. What crimes could a man be forced to commit? The crimes which a man was forced to commit, he (Mr. Hopwood) apprehended ceased to be crimes at all. Take the case of a man under a non-commissioned officer, who treated him with brutality and bullied him; such cases were by no means uncommon, and many a man had been morally compelled to desert by the pressure put upon him in that way. Was that to be ranked with the crime of fraudulent enlistment, which had ever been, and must always be, a much more voluntary act than desertion? It ought not to be stereotyped in the Act of Parliament which the Committee were about to pass, that neither the court nor the authorities should have any option in the matter of forfeiture of service merely to save a few columns of book-keeping.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, at present, a soldier who had deserted and been tried by court martial forfeited the whole of his previous service; but, if he kept clear of the regimental defaulters’ book, he, at the end of five years, appeared before the commanding officer, and requested that his service might be restored. The commanding officer forwarded the application to the Secretary of State for War, who, as a matter of course, agreed to the restoration of service. He (Colonel Alexander) wished to point out that restoration after five years, under the present system of service, was rather too long deferred. The period of five years was all very well under the old system; but now, when a man had to serve six years with the Colours and six years with the Reserve, it was too much to expect that he should have to serve five years more in order to obtain restoration of service. He had already expressed his opinion upon this point, in reply to a Circular from the War Office, that the time should be reduced to two years, which he still thought would be sufficient under the present system of enlistment for six years.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL STANLEY moved the omission of sub-section d, which provided that the whole of the prior service of a soldier should be forfeited, if he should be convicted of the offence of not having, when released as a prisoner of war, rejoined his regiment as soon as he could and ought to have done.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section omitted accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY moved the omission of the words “by a court of summary jurisdiction,” in lines 27 and 28, observing, that although a man might be convicted as a deserter by a court of summary jurisdiction, he might be restored by the proper military authority.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

MR. HOPWOOD moved, as an Amendment, in page 41, line 31, to leave out the words “the whole of his previous service shall be forfeited,” in order to insert the words—crimes of desertion and fraudulent enlistment should be placed with the other crimes, and that a man should be allowed to reckon his service prior to the commission of the offence. In the case of these two crimes, he had considered that forfeiture of past service should be a part of the sentence. He might be right, or he might be wrong, in that view; but that was the view he held. With regard to these two very serious crimes, his opinion was that, ipso facto, a soldier should forfeit his previous service. With regard to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), they were entitled to very great respect; but the hon. and gallant Member must remember that, at the time he spoke of, courts martial could not find a man charged with desertion guilty of any lesser offence.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON expressed dissent from that view.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that now, under Clause 56, the court might find a man, who was charged with desertion, guilty of the lesser crime of absence without leave. There was, moreover, power in the Act to restore a man's service. He hoped that the Committee would now take a division upon the Amendment.

MAJOR NOLAN begged to differ from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War in what he had said. If his (Major Nolan's) recollection served him right, there were between 2,000 and 3,000 men convicted every year of the offence of desertion—that was to say, there were about 5,000 deserters, and between 2,000 and 3,000 that were apprehended. They should remember that in dealing with this crime they were enormously increasing the punishment for an offence which existed to a very large extent, and were adopting a course which, in dealing with civilians, would not be tolerated. The clause provided that where a soldier of the Regular Forces was found guilty of any of the following offences, desertion from Her Majesty's Service, &c.:—

“Then either upon his conviction by court martial of the offence, or (if having been committed as a deserter by a court of summary jurisdiction, or having confessed the offence, he is liable to be tried), upon his trial being dispensed with by order of the competent military authority, the whole of his prior service shall be forfeited, and he shall be liable to serve as a soldier of the regular forces for the term of his original enlistment, reckoned from the date of such conviction or such order dispensing with trial, in like manner as if he had been originally attested at that date.”

The Committee would thus see what a very severe punishment that was; the whole prior service of a man was forfeited, and a man who had served 14 or 15 years would have to commence his service over again. It was very hard upon old soldiers, amongst whom there were some hundreds of desertions every year. The punishment was too heavy, unless some power of mitigating it was given to the court martial. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said that he would accept his (Major Nolan's) Amendment, he should be content not to divide upon the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). He would suggest that the clause should be amended in this way—by saying that the whole of a man's prior service should be forfeited

“Unless a court of competent military authority specifically orders only a portion of the soldier's service to be forfeited, in which case only the portion of the service so ordered to be forfeited shall be forfeited.”

That would leave it to the court before whom a deserter was tried to mitigate the punishment. The clause, as it was drawn, was very harsh indeed; he would not complain of the drafting: but he thought something more should have been done on the side of mercy. It ought to be left to a court martial, or to the military authorities, to dispense, in such cases as they should think it right, with the forfeiture of the whole or any portion of the service. But, under the clause, if a man who had been 21 days absent, and was found in plain clothes when apprehended, he had to be tried and found guilty of desertion, and then this very severe punishment was imposed.

AN HON. MEMBER thought the longer a man had served the greater was his punishment under this clause, and it seemed to him that its operation would be very unjust and hard. He was in favour of leaving the sentence, as much as possible, in the discretion of courts martial. If a soldier deserved a hard sentence, probably a court martial would give it to him; but if he did not deserve a severe sentence, then he thought that a court martial should have power to treat him with mercy.

Colonel Stanley

gation in their favour in the present case. He was quite sure that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War did not wish to be severe upon soldiers, and that he was really resisting his own convictions in insisting upon this clause. He would ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to be a little merciful upon this occasion, and to yield to his own good feelings in the matter. Although it might be a very good thing to follow the advice of the military authorities by whom he was advised, yet they knew that those gentlemen were much too fond of red tape; and it was for them, sitting there as legislators, not to let their judgment be warped from what they thought right, merely because those authorities were in favour of severe punishment.

MR. O'DONNELL ventured to say that this proposed penalty must act directly contrary to the desire of the Government. If a soldier deserted under the influence of some passing fancy, but afterwards repented, and wished to come back into the Army, a punishment was here enacted which would deter him from going back, and would punish him for repenting. After having confessed his offence, he was liable to be tried and to lose all his service, simply because he might have been a few weeks, or two months, away from his duty. The effect of the clause was to prevent a man who was disposed to go back doing so; and it would rather induce him to betake himself to America or the Colonies, for he would find that if he went back, this Act of Parliament absolutely forfeited to him all his prior service. In the whole course of his life he had never seen—not even in legislation for Ireland—a more absurd clause. He ventured, respectfully, to urge upon the attention of hon. Members of the Committee that this clause was putting a premium upon desertion. He should be very happy to hear any reason to alter his opinion; but, so far as most of them could see, the only effect of this clause was to punish a man for going back to his duty.

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that the effect of the clause was not what had been attributed to it by hon. Members. If a man came back he was tried; but his return would be taken as an extenuating circumstance, under Clause 56, by which a prisoner charged before a court martial with desertion might be found guilty of the minor offence of being absent without leave.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that formerly it was necessary for every soldier to be sentenced to forfeit his service. A power was given at one time to sentence a soldier to forfeit his further service as well; but that power was subsequently taken away, as it was held to be wrong. They were only going back now to what was the custom 20 or 25 years ago. Perhaps it would meet some of the objections that had been raised to enact that if a man voluntarily came back he should not necessarily forfeit his former service, but, at the option of the court, might be allowed to count his service up to the time of desertion. He thought that a power of that kind in the hands of the court martial would be instrumental in inducing men to return to their duty.

MR. PARNELL thought that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had made a very good point, when he said that this clause gave the military authorities power to dispose, without trial, of the case of a soldier who had deserted and returned, and to punish him for this offence without trying him. The competent military authorities were given power to sentence a soldier without trial, and to inflict the punishment upon him of forfeiture of his services, without having ascertained that he was guilty of the offence at all. That seemed to him to be a very extraordinary proposal, and he did not think that the working of the clause was generally understood. The clause gave the military authorities power to dispose of a case without trial, and to sentence a man, and to punish him for an offence of which he might not be guilty. In his opinion, it would be a very fair course to postpone this clause, until the Government should see that the position they were taking up was indefensible.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that hon. Gentlemen would not think him guilty of discourtesy in saying that he thought it would be very hard upon the Committee to postpone the clause. He begged to point out to the Committee that if this clause had been made more stringent, yet benefits had been extended to the soldier by the Bill in other directions. He had thought it undesirable that these two very serious hold something in terrorem over soldiers to check the crime; at the same time, he thought it was right that there should be ample power to remit the sentence of forfeiture to any extent and to any period.

MR. O'DONNELL had listened very carefully to everything that had fallen from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and it did not seem to him that he had answered the objections which had been raised to the clause. He did not think he should be doing an injustice to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman if he stated that his argument was altogether wrong. He proposed to deprive a soldier, under an Act of Parliament, of all benefit of his previous good service with the Colours, and, by way of recompense, gave him the benefit of his service on the tread-mill, or in gaol. He did not think that he was misrepresenting the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's argument in saying that. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman actually refused to listen to experienced Members on his own side of the House; and when they suggested a proper punishment for the offence, he still insisted upon forfeiture, under the clause, of all the previous good service of the deserter, although he allowed the man to count as service the number of years that he spent in gaol. That seemed to him the most extraordinary manner of which he had heard of for meeting an argument. He ventured to say that, considering the thinness of the Committee and the importance of this clause, he felt that he ought to move to report Progress, until the House was more fairly filled. This was a clause of the very first importance, and required the fullest consideration. This clause proposed to punish a deserter who had confessed his crime by the forfeiture of all his previous service. They contended that this was directed against expediency, and was contrary to the public service. It tempted a temporary deserter to become a permanent one; and the recompense that was proposed for the injustice inflicted was to allow the soldier to count as good service the months or years that he had spent in gaol. He was sure that the argument which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had put forward did not emanate from himself; but had been instilled into his mind from some mischievous quarter to which he was bound to pay reverence from official reason. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman also said that the court martial, before whom a deserter was brought, could convict a man of only having been absent without leave instead of convicting him of desertion. That was an extraordinary way out of the difficulty. A deserter who wished to give himself back to the Service ought to be treated more leniently; but he had been undoubtedly guilty of desertion, and it was actually suggested by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that a court martial should find him guilty of another crime. Such a suggestion as that aimed directly at the reputation of courts martial. The suggestion was, that in order to get out of this very barbarous clause a court martial should find a man guilty, not of the offence which he had actually committed, but of an offence which he had not committed. A man, when guilty of desertion, ought to be punished for desertion, and not, as had been suggested, for an offence which he had not committed of a minor character. There was a story of an Irish jury before whom a man was placed on a charge of murder. There was not a tittle of evidence against him on the charge of murder, and the Judge charged the jury directly against his conviction; but, notwithstanding that, the jury found him guilty of murder. The Judge expressed his surprise at such a course; but the jury answered calmly that the man was not guilty of murder, but that he was a notorious horse-stealer. That was the kind of morality which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman sought to inculcate upon courts martial. He thought, under the circumstances, he should be justified in moving to report Progress, in order that a full House might understand the casuistry which Pascal never approached, and by which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman attempted to get out of the difficulty.

THE CHAIRMAN inquired, Whether the hon. Member for Dungarvan moved to report Progress?

MR. O'DONNELL: No, Sir.

MAJOR NOLAN could see no reason why the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War should not accept some Amendment upon the clause. The more he read the clause the more strongly was he opposed to the Committee giving such sweeping powers as were contained in it. He would draw the attention of hon. Members to Clause 80, which enforced this clause—

“Where a soldier of the regular forces has been guilty of the offence of desertion from Her Majesty's service or of fraudulent enlistment, and has either been convicted of the same by a court martial, or having confessed the offence, or been committed by a court of summary jurisdiction as a deserter, is liable to be tried, but his trial has been dispensed with by order of the competent military authority. . . . such soldier shall be liable to general service, and may from time to time be transferred to such corps of the regular forces as the competent military authority may from time to time order.”

The same power was given if a man had been sentenced by a court martial, for any offence, to a punishment of not less than four months' imprisonment. Those two clauses, taken together, amounted to this—that a man who had four years' service to put in was really made to serve for two years longer. A man might have joined with the idea that he was to spend all his time in England; but a power was taken to send him abroad to the Colonies, if sentenced to a short term of imprisonment. He was not objecting to a man being sent away for foreign service, instead of being kept in gaol; but the effect of the provision was very much like transporting a man for six years—it was very nearly the same punishment as the old sentence of transportation for seven years. Such a power as that was greater than was placed in the hands of the Judges; and it seemed to him that in some cases it would cause great injustice. A man might be sent to a good station in India, but it was quite likely that he might be sent to a bad station; and the difference between his condition and that of convicts under the old transportation system would not be very great. When the power was taken to send a deserter out to India, it was not worth while to send him out for two years and to bring him back at the end of the period; but what the Bill did was to say—“We will start afresh with six years' service, and send him out for that period.” When such sweeping changes as those were made, there ought to be some power either in the Secretary of State or a competent military authority, in extreme cases, to remit or reduce the sentence. It was not right that in all cases a court should be obliged to ignore all the past services of the criminal, and that it should be left in the power of the Secretary of State for War by general rules to send a man out of the country for six years. Unless some modification in this clause were made, he thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would probably find that great opposition would be raised to Clause 80. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would accept either his Amendment or any other embodying the same principle he should be quite content.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 42: Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 134.)

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he had to propose that the following Amendment should be made in the clause:—To insert in page 41, line 31, after the words “the whole of his prior service shall be forfeited,” the words—

“Unless the court or some competent military authority specifically orders that only a portion of the soldier's service be forfeited, in which case such portion of his service shall be forfeited.”

This alteration would simply leave the court martial or the competent military authority power in special cases, which they might exercise once in 20 times, to award any less punishment than forfeiture of the whole of the man's previous service.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he had some words to propose as an Amendment to the clause, which he thought would meet the views of the Committee. He only wished to make it quite clear that forfeiture of service was one thing, and restoration of previous service was another. He proposed to add to the clause—

“The Secretary of State may restore the whole or any portion of the service forfeited under this clause to any soldier who has performed good and faithful service up to the time of such restoration, if he be recommended to do so by the court martial before whom the trial takes place.”

MAJOR NOLAN said, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War.

Amendment (Major Nolan), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Colonel Stanley) agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Proceedings for Enlistment.

Clause 77 (Proceedings for enlistment).

MR. O'DONNELL moved the omission of the words in page 41, lines 40 and 41, "for the time being authorized by a Secretary of State," for the purpose of inserting in lieu of them the words, "hereafter annexed." In important cases, such as those to which the clause related, it was, he said, in his opinion, extremely desirable that the form stating the general requirements of attestation should be set forth in the Bill itself. That would be a much better mode of proceeding than to leave the form to be decided upon by the Secretary of State; because there might not be always at the head of the War Department a man who would act so reasonably, and in whom such reliance could be placed, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who at present occupied that position. If a proper form of attestation were inserted in the Bill, specifying all the essential obligations into which a soldier entered on joining the Army, then all doubt in the matter would be removed. After all that had been said, in the course of the discussions of the Bill, as to a contract being made between soldiers and the Government, it was but fair, he maintained, that there should be a statement of the conditions on which that contract was based; and with all the experience possessed by the Horse Guards of the requirements of the Service, there ought to be no difficulty in introducing a regular form of attestation by way of annex to the Bill, instead of leaving it to be "for the time being authorized by a Secretary of State." The Committee had now an opportunity of deciding exactly what they thought ought to be done in the matter, and what it was that, in their opinion, ought to be required of a recruit; but if they allowed that opportunity to pass, it might be very difficult to amend the Act once it had become law.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that if the hon. Gentleman would consider a little more carefully the nature of his Amendment, he would find that its adoption would defeat the object which he had in view in moving it. Although he (Colonel Stanley) did not suppose there was anything like finality about any measure, still he hoped, and thought, that the present Bill might fairly be regarded as a permanent settlement of the questions with which it dealt. He quite concurred with the hon. Gentleman in the opinion that it was desirable recruits should know the nature of the contract into which they entered when they joined the Army, and what the obligations were to which they made themselves liable. But that was a different thing from stereotyping the form of attestation, which was, he thought, open to very great objection. Suppose a man enlisted for six years, and that at the end of three years it was deemed desirable to pass him into the Reserve, the military authorities might find their hands tied by the Act, if the Amendment were accepted. He quite understood what the object was which the hon. Gentleman sought to carry out; but he was of opinion that it could be more satisfactorily attained by making the terms of attestation known to a recruit, and duly setting them forth in the small account-book with which he was furnished.

MR. BRISTOWE hoped the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would not persevere with his Amendment, and said it was extremely inconvenient that, upon a technical question such as that to which it related, an Amendment should be proposed without any previous Notice. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was, he thought, quite right in saying that it was not desirable that the form of attestation should be stereotyped in the Bill. It was really much better that a certain latitude in the matter should be left to the Executive; and, entertaining that opinion, he should certainly vote against the Amendment if it were pressed to a division.

MAJOR NOLAN thought the mode of enlistment prescribed by the clause was an improvement on the old system. Under the old system, if a man agreed to enlist he had to pay £1 if he wanted to get off his engagement; and it very often happened that he had not the pound, so that he was obliged to enter the Army against his will. That system being abolished, enlistment would be effected in accordance with the forms of a legal proceeding, which, in his opinion, would be a great advantage to the recruit.

MR. BIGGAR was very much disposed to agree with the hon. and learned Member for Newark (Mr. Bristowe), that it was very inconvenient, generally speaking, that Amendments should be moved without Notice. In the present instance, however, it was very easy to understand what the Amendment before the Committee meant. He should certainly support the Amendment; because he was strongly opposed to delegating the powers which the clause would confer to the military authorities. The House might deem the rules laid down in the form authorized by the Secretary of State unreasonable; and even suppose it were provided that the rules for attestation should be laid on the Table of the House, it would require, if any hon. Member objected to them, that he should give Notice of Motion on the subject, and take the opinion of the House upon them before they could be changed. But for an independent Member it would be practically impossible to succeed in effecting such a change; and as nothing could be more easy than that the form of attestation should be inserted in the Bill itself, he hoped the Committee would agree to the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, he had always been of opinion that it was dangerous for the House of Commons to give such large powers to the Secretary of State as the clause before the Committee would confer upon him. There had been a variety of Acts passed in modern times, giving the Secretary of State similar powers, and in nearly every instance the result had been exceedingly unsatisfactory. The Committee had already assented to a clause which would enable the Secretary of State for War to frame rules; and now again they were asked to confer upon him the power to draw up a notice stating the general requirements of attestation in such form as he might think fit, and which he might alter from time to time as he pleased. If the clause were passed in its present shape, the Committee would, he contended, have no means of knowing that the notice would fulfil the conditions which they desired. What they desired was, that the recruit should be guarded against making any mistake; but that object might not be secured by such a notice as the Secretary of State might deem it desirable to authorize. The notice, as authorized by him, would be drawn up for the convenience of the military authorities, and not for the protection of the soldier; and the Committee ought not, he thought, to be too much led away by a deference to the views of the military authorities, especially as they had no little opportunity of knowing what were the views on the subject of the class that would, in reality, be most affected by the legislation on which they were now engaged. The soldier, as a matter of fact, was entirely precluded from giving his opinion on questions in which he was so deeply interested. He was not represented in that House. He had no vote, and was entirely unprotected, so far as the legislation which was initiated by the House was concerned. It was exceedingly necessary, therefore, that when power to make rules or to draw up forms was given to the Secretary of State, it should be defined, if possible, in some sort of way, and that could best be done in the present case by inserting the form of attestation in the Bill. What reasonable objection, he should like to know, could be urged against the Amendment? When the Committee saw the form, they would be able to judge whether it was in accordance with their notions on the subject or not, and some opportunity might be afforded, also, of ascertaining the opinion of the soldier with respect to it. But if the clause were agreed to in its present shape, the Committee would be left all in the dark. Of course, they might be told that, if they liked, they could see the form; but they could not be sure that, after the Bill had passed, an entirely new set of regulations might not be drawn up with regard to enlistment. He, for one, strongly objected to having such vague powers conferred upon a Secretary of State; because he never knew a Secretary of State yet who did not abuse the authority which was intrusted to him in so vague and general a way. As the Committee were aware, it was a course very frequently adopted to provide that rules and regulations with respect to certain matters should be laid on the Table of the House for 40 days; and that, at least, should be done,

Amendment (Colonel Stanley) agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Proceedings for Enlistment.

Clause 77 (Proceedings for enlistment).

MR. O'DONNELL moved the omission of the words in page 41, lines 40 and 41, "for the time being authorized by a Secretary of State," for the purpose of inserting in lieu of them the words, "hereafter annexed." In important cases, such as those to which the clause related, it was, he said, in his opinion, extremely desirable that the form stating the general requirements of attestation should be set forth in the Bill itself. That would be a much better mode of proceeding than to leave the form to be decided upon by the Secretary of State; because there might not be always at the head of the War Department a man who would act so reasonably, and in whom such reliance could be placed, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who at present occupied that position. If a proper form of attestation were inserted in the Bill, specifying all the essential obligations into which a soldier entered on joining the Army, then all doubt in the matter would be removed. After all that had been said, in the course of the discussions of the Bill, as to a contract being made between soldiers and the Government, it was but fair, he maintained, that there should be a statement of the conditions on which that contract was based; and with all the experience possessed by the Horse Guards of the requirements of the Service, there ought to be no difficulty in introducing a regular form of attestation by way of annex to the Bill, instead of leaving it to be "for the time being authorized by a Secretary of State." The Committee had now an opportunity of deciding exactly what they thought ought to be done in the matter, and what it was that, in their opinion, ought to be required of a recruit; but if they allowed that opportunity to pass, it might be very difficult to amend the Act once it had become law.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that if the hon. Gentleman would consider a little more carefully the nature of his Amendment, he would find that its adoption would defeat the object which he had in view in moving it. Although he (Colonel Stanley) did not suppose there was anything like finality about any measure, still he hoped, and thought, that the present Bill might fairly be regarded as a permanent settlement of the questions with which it dealt. He quite concurred with the hon. Gentleman in the opinion that it was desirable recruits should know the nature of the contract into which they entered when they joined the Army, and what the obligations were to which they made themselves liable. But that was a different thing from stereotyping the form of attestation, which was, he thought, open to very great objection. Suppose a man enlisted for six years, and that at the end of three years it was deemed desirable to pass him into the Reserve, the military authorities might find their hands tied by the Act, if the Amendment were accepted. He quite understood what the object was which the hon. Gentleman sought to carry out; but he was of opinion that it could be more satisfactorily attained by making the terms of attestation known to a recruit, and duly setting them forth in the small account-book with which he was furnished.

MR. BRISTOWE hoped the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would not persevere with his Amendment, and said it was extremely inconvenient that, upon a technical question such as that to which it related, an Amendment should be proposed without any previous Notice. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was, he thought, quite right in saying that it was not desirable that the form of attestation should be stereotyped in the Bill. It was really much better that a certain latitude in the matter should be left to the Executive; and, entertaining that opinion, he should certainly vote against the Amendment if it were pressed to a division.

MAJOR NOLAN thought the mode of enlistment prescribed by the clause was an improvement on the old system. Under the old system, if a man agreed to enlist he had to pay £1 if he wanted to get off his engagement; and it very often happened that he had not the pound, so that he was obliged to enter the Army against his will. That system being abolished, enlistment would be effected in accordance with the forms of a legal proceeding, which, in his opinion, would be a great advantage to the recruit.

MR. BIGGAR was very much disposed to agree with the hon. and learned Member for Newark (Mr. Bristowe), that it was very inconvenient, generally speaking, that Amendments should be moved without Notice. In the present instance, however, it was very easy to understand what the Amendment before the Committee meant. He should certainly support the Amendment; because he was strongly opposed to delegating the powers which the clause would confer to the military authorities. The House might deem the rules laid down in the form authorized by the Secretary of State unreasonable; and even suppose it were provided that the rules for attestation should be laid on the Table of the House, it would require, if any hon. Member objected to them, that he should give Notice of Motion on the subject, and take the opinion of the House upon them before they could be changed. But for an independent Member it would be practically impossible to succeed in effecting such a change; and as nothing could be more easy than that the form of attestation should be inserted in the Bill itself, he hoped the Committee would agree to the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, he had always been of opinion that it was dangerous for the House of Commons to give such large powers to the Secretary of State as the clause before the Committee would confer upon him. There had been a variety of Acts passed in modern times, giving the Secretary of State similar powers, and in nearly every instance the result had been exceedingly unsatisfactory. The Committee had already assented to a clause which would enable the Secretary of State for War to frame rules; and now again they were asked to confer upon him the power to draw up a notice stating the general requirements of attestation in such form as he might think fit, and which he might alter from time to time as he pleased. If the clause were passed in its present shape, the Committee would, he contended, have no means of knowing that the notice would fulfil the conditions which they desired. What they desired was, that the recruit should be guarded against making any mistake; but that object might not be secured by such a notice as the Secretary of State might deem it desirable to authorize. The notice, as authorized by him, would be drawn up for the convenience of the military authorities, and not for the protection of the soldier; and the Committee ought not, he thought, to be too much led away by a deference to the views of the military authorities, especially as they had no little opportunity of knowing what were the views on the subject of the class that would, in reality, be most affected by the legislation on which they were now engaged. The soldier, as a matter of fact, was entirely precluded from giving his opinion on questions in which he was so deeply interested. He was not represented in that House. He had no vote, and was entirely unprotected, so far as the legislation which was initiated by the House was concerned. It was exceedingly necessary, therefore, that when power to make rules or to draw up forms was given to the Secretary of State, it should be defined, if possible, in some sort of way, and that could best be done in the present case by inserting the form of attestation in the Bill. What reasonable objection, he should like to know, could be urged against the Amendment? When the Committee saw the form, they would be able to judge whether it was in accordance with their notions on the subject or not, and some opportunity might be afforded, also, of ascertaining the opinion of the soldier with respect to it. But if the clause were agreed to in its present shape, the Committee would be left all in the dark. Of course, they might be told that, if they liked, they could see the form; but they could not be sure that, after the Bill had passed, an entirely new set of regulations might not be drawn up with regard to enlistment. He, for one, strongly objected to having such vague powers conferred upon a Secretary of State; because he never knew a Secretary of State yet who did not abuse the authority which was intrusted to him in so vague and general a way. As the Committee were aware, it was a course very frequently adopted to provide that rules and regulations with respect to certain matters should be laid on the Table of the House for 40 days; and that, at least, should be done, he thought, in the case of the form of attestation, so that it might be in the power of any hon. Member to object to it, if he should think fit. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War declined to assent to some arrangement of the kind, he hoped the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would press his Amendment to a division.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had already explained to the Committee why it was that he objected to the Amendment. He would now point out that the Secretary of State had no means of ascertaining beforehand what might be the requirements of the Service in regard to the number of recruits. Last year the Establishment was, at one time, 5,000 over the number; while, at another time, it was 3,000 under. Owing to so much fluctuation in the numbers there was great difficulty in regulating the number of recruits; and the Secretary of State being the person responsible in the matter, it was necessary that he should be able to exercise some discretion as to the number of men who should be enlisted, either for long or short service. But if a stereotyped attestation form were inserted in the Bill, the Secretary of State would be tied down, no matter what the circumstances of the Army, to one mode of enlistment, and that, in his opinion, would be far from advantageous. He, at the same time, quite agreed with the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) that it was desirable a recruit should know what it was he contracted to do when he entered the Service; and he proposed that that object should be effected not in the way which the hon. Gentleman proposed by his Amendment—because that would not only be useless, but worse than useless—but by regulation, in accordance with which the terms of enlistment would be made known to the recruit, and a copy of the attestation paper furnished to him in the small account-book relating to various matters with which he was supplied. In that way, effect would be given to what he understood to be the intention of the hon. Member in moving his Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he quite recognized the force of the objections to the Amendment which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had urged; but his object was to tie the hands of the Secretary of State by means of what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman called a stereotyped form, so that if it should hereafter become necessary to alter the general conditions of enlistment for the Army, the Secretary of State should be obliged to come down to that House and apply for direct power to make the change. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to think that if the Secretary of State had not authority to alter the form of attestation, as he might from time to time think fit, recruiting, in regard to which there were so many fluctuations in the supply and the demand, would be injuriously affected. For his own part, however, he (Mr. O'Donnell) could not see how stereotyping the form of attestation could at all interfere with the efficiency of the public service in that respect. He presumed the Secretary of State would know how many recruits he wanted at a particular time, and that he would issue instructions for the enlistment of 10,000 or 5,000 men, as the case might be. That was a proceeding in which the question of numbers simply was involved; and he could not see how that question could be affected by stereotyping the conditions of service.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that a great number of men might present themselves for admission into the Army, all of whom might not be required for long service, and a certain portion of whom it would be desirable to enlist for shorter service, with the view of passing them, as speedily as possible, into the Reserve.

MR. PARNELL said, it surely must be very easy to meet fluctuations and variations such as those to which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War referred. If it was deemed desirable to fix the period of service for a longer or a shorter time, in accordance with the requirements of the Army, there ought to be no difficulty in carrying out that object. But the clause was open to the objection, that under its operation there would be no security that the form of attestation would fully explain to the recruit the nature of the contract into which he was about to enter, and the conditions on which he engaged to serve. Now, it was, in his opinion, exceedingly desirable that that should be done, especially as the recruits who now joined the Army were, in so many instances, very young and ignorant. The Committee might, therefore, he thought, very fairly ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to assent to such a modification of the clause as would settle that point. The clause seemed to be drawn up not so much in the interest of the soldier, as for the sake of the military authorities; but he (Mr. Parnell) desired to see the soldier protected, and the clause did not provide those safeguards on which the Committee had, in his opinion, a right to insist. He had read the clause over very carefully, and he strongly objected to the vague way in which it was drawn. A great deal of time would, he thought, be saved, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) would make a concession in the matter which, after all, would not be very great, by agreeing to the insertion of the form of attestation in the Bill itself. Parliament, otherwise, would know nothing about it. He hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not think that those who asked him to make this concession were pressing him unfairly; and he could assure him that he (Mr. Parnell), for one, wished the Bill to pass, believing, as he did, that it would effect a great improvement in the existing state of things. He might mention that he had something like 105 Amendments drafted, which he intended to move on the Bill; but that he had restrained himself from putting them down on the Notice Paper, which was sufficient evidence, he thought, that it was not his intention to try to defeat a measure which he was really desirous should become law. Still, there were points in the Bill in regard to which he was very anxious, and in respect to which, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would consent to make some concessions, the proceedings in Committee might get on more smoothly.

Mr. Parnell

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, there was one point in connection with the conditions laid down for recruiting for the Army with respect to which he should like to get from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War some explanation. Some time ago complaints were made that posters were put up in certain places to which were affixed placards offering to recruits terms which were of a very dishonourable character. Men, it appeared, were incited to join the ranks of the Army by having the prospect of plunder held out to them, and all that sort of thing, and he was not aware that the reports on the subject had been contradicted, nor had he any reason to believe that they were unfounded. Whatever might be the conditions of service which would be authorized by the present Secretary of State for War, he was sure they would not be of a dishonourable character; but it must be borne in mind that the powers of recruiting were delegated to a number of persons who were in a very different position. If certain means and conditions of recruiting were presented in the attestation form, and an assurance were given by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that no attempt would be made to enlist men by having recourse to promises which could not be carried into effect without dishonour, some of the objections which were entertained to the clause by his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) might be removed.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he knew something of the circumstance to which the hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. O'Connor Power) referred. The hon. Gentleman seemed, however, to labour under a slight misconception as to the real nature of what actually occurred. It was true, he was sorry to say, that a placard of a very indefensible character had appeared, which was first brought under the notice of his hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Boord), to whom it was sent. But that placard had been issued, not by Royal authority; and it had been issued in one of the Colonies by an inferior officer. Steps had since been taken to have the terms cancelled, and the officer who issued the placard censured.

MR. BIGGAR said, that although the clause provided that the Justice should read, or cause to be read, to a recruit the questions set forth in the attestation paper, they might be read so rapidly that it would be impossible for him to catch their exact meaning. In that way a recruit would often be asked to agree to conditions of which he knew little or nothing; and he ought, he (Mr. Biggar) thought, to be afforded a reasonable opportunity of making himself acquainted with those conditions.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, it was provided by the clause that—

“The fee for the attestation of a recruit, and for all acts and things incidental thereto, shall be one shilling and no more;”

but no provision seemed to be made for paying anything to the “recruiter.” Now, he need scarcely point out to the Committee that, in carrying out the system of enlistment, a great deal depended on the character of the recruiting sergeant.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PARNELL said, he had an Amendment to propose, which was a very simple one. He begged to move the insertion in page 41, line 42, after the word “attestation,” of the words “and the general conditions of the contract to be entered into by the recruit.” The Amendment bore upon the question, which the Committee had been for some time discussing, of the desirability of affording the recruit an opportunity of understanding the terms of enlistment.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. O'DONNELL moved, as an Amendment, the insertion in page 42, line 2, after the word “justice,” of the words “provided he be of full age.” It was now provided, he said, that a recruit was to be bound for life by the terms of his contract, and that he should be made liable to a severe penalty for violating those terms. That being so, he desired to make provision that a person entering into a contract of such extreme importance should be really capable of binding himself in that way. He did not propose to introduce any such considerations into the discussion as the expediency of obtaining the consent of the parents or guardians of a young man who offered himself for enlistment before a magistrate; but those hon. Members who were most warmly attached to the Army must, he thought, agree with him that it would be a great advantage to the Service that recruits should not enter it of immature age—a state of things which was productive of frequent desertion and of much crime. The whole law of the land proceeded upon the principle that a person who entered into a contract of an important character should be capable of doing so; and the public service would, in the present instance, be greatly benefited by the operation of such an Amendment as that which he proposed: because it would have the effect of stopping, in the course of time, the enlistment of immature recruits by fettering the discretion, in the exercise of which raw and weedy youths were now allowed to enter the Service. A very large number of boys, he believed, who passed themselves off as being 18, but who were, in reality, not more than 17, found their way into the Army; and those poor lads very soon broke down under the fatiguing duties of military life, and became useless and a great expense to the country, owing to their having to be discharged from the Army, and their being obliged to drag their feeble bodies from infirmary to infirmary, and from public hospital to public hospital, eventually to become a burden upon the ratepayers. But, apart from that consideration, a due regard to the principles of justice demanded that a man who was required to enter into such heavy engagements as were imposed upon a soldier should not be a mere hobbledohoy, pretending to be a man. The matter was one with regard to which he should be very happy to enter into any reasonable compromise; but he felt disposed to insist that boys of the age of 17, or 18, or 19, who happened to enter into a contract of the kind, should not be regarded, if they broke it, as being bound by any such obligation as a man who, either being of full age, had entered into a contract, or, being of full age, had subsequently ratified a contract into which he had entered while still a minor. He was not disposed to insist too strongly on the literal wording of his Amendment, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would only give him an engagement that some such provision as that which he desired should be made. A youth who enlisted under the age of 21 ought to be looked upon, he thought, as being a ward of the Army, and as a minor, who should be held responsible in a less degree for any infringement of his contract than a man who had made himself party to a contract when over 21. He was quite aware of the necessity which existed, in the interest of military discipline and the public safety, of keeping men to their contracts; but, at the same time, seeing that soldiers were liable to be flogged, to the forfeiture of their periods of service, and to all sorts of accumulated penalties, it was but fair, in his opinion, that a youth who entered into such a contract when a minor should have some consideration shown to him.

Mr. Biggar

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) seemed to be under the impression that, in civil life, a person who was under 21 years of age could not enter into a contract. In that view, however, he was entirely mistaken. How frequently, for instance, did minors apprentice themselves to trades? As he understood the object of the Amendment, he might add, it was to secure for a youth who entered the Army, and who might have understated his age, more lenient treatment in the event of his breaking his contract than another who had stated his age truly. It would, he thought, be most undesirable that effect should be given to any such proposal; and he hoped, therefore, the Committee would not agree to the Amendment.

MR. RYLANDS said, there could be no doubt that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) was desirous of raising the age at which recruits might be enlisted. That was a very important question—as no one knew better than the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War—and a question which must sooner or later be settled. He was aware, however, that it would be very inconvenient to raise a discussion upon it at the present moment; but when the Committee were dealing with the conditions of enlistment, it was impossible that they could close their eyes to the fact that youths of 17 or 18 years of age might be enlisted, under the operation of the clause as it stood, on terms which many hon. Members believed to be entirely objectionable. He found, from a Return which he held in his hand, that no less than 868 boys under 17 years of age had enlisted in the Army last year; while there were 190 under 18 years, and 7,375 who had enlisted under the age of 19; 5,531 having enlisted between the age of 19 and 20. Now, he had the highest authority for saying that young men between the ages of 17 or 18 and 20 or 21 were totally unfitted for the duties and hardships of military service. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War knew very well that he might fortify his argument by the authority of Sir Lintorn Simmons, who, in an address which he had delivered at the United Service Institution, had laid it down, with all the weight of his experience, that youths of that age were utterly unsuited for hard military service. They were, he might add, placed in a position of considerable difficulty at the present moment, in consequence of their having relied on boys as recruits for their Army. It might not be without interest to the Committee if he were to mention that Sir Lintorn Simmons, in the address to which he had referred, had made a calculation, from which it appeared that a Cavalry soldier, who enlisted at the age of 18, cost £190 by the time he was 21, and an Infantry soldier £126—that was to say, before they were fit for hard work.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he quite concurred with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Rylands) that the present was not a convenient occasion on which to discuss the question of the age at which recruits should be enlisted. He regretted that the question should have been raised, all the more because he felt himself to be precluded from entering into it by the fact that a Committee had been appointed, under whose consideration it would come. Besides, he did not think it was advisable that a question of such importance should be dealt with in a discussion on a clause such as that before the Committee. He might, however, point out that, probably, the best time for securing the services of recruits was between the ages of 18 and 21, before they went into trade. Men between the ages of 21 and 24 would, of course, be better for the purposes of the Service; but then they could not be obtained without upsetting the labour market, which it was felt it would not be desirable to do. Some young men, no doubt, had been enlisted who were under the age of 18; but that would be, as far as possible, prevented; and if, in the attestation paper, it was required, as a condition of enlistment, that a recruit should be at least 18 years of age, a practical way of dealing with the question would, he thought, be set on foot. Of course, if the country was willing to pay £8,000,000 or £10,000,000 a-year more for the Army, it would be much easier to get men for the Service.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the fact was, that their soldiers did not receive that amount of wages which could be considered a fair remuneration for the services of grown-up men. They paid them the wages of boys; and they must not be surprised that the grown-up man was sometimes dissatisfied with the remuneration which he was willing as a boy to accept. What he should suggest was that the soldier should be paid 4*d.* a-day extra, which would bring his pay up to the average wages which were received by the agricultural labourer in the North of England.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) was one which would be found to operate very usefully, as testing the question of age. A recruit was allowed to enter the Army at the age of 18; but, so far as the clause was concerned, no provision appeared to be made in it to secure that no one under that age should be enlisted. The age of a recruit, he presumed, constituted one among the qualifications required; and the services of a youth under 18 would not be accepted, just as those of a lame man would be declined. The argument of the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Hardinge Giffard), he might add, did not seem to him to be a sound one; because boys in civil life were not able to enter into contracts of apprenticeship on their own account, and there was usually some adult relative or friend to assist at the operation. He should, however, be happy to defer to any well-considered statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman on that point. There ought, he at the same time thought, to be something like a medical guarantee provided that a recruit was at least 18 years of age, before he was allowed to enlist. After all, the recruiting clauses formed part of the Bill; and he saw no good reason why the Committee, in dealing with them, should be fettered in its action by the fact that there was a Committee on Army Organization sitting upstairs. If the Committee were to be fettered in that way in dealing with the Bill, they could make no progress at all.

Colonel Stanley

He hoped something would be done to secure that a recruit was up to the required standard as regarded age.

MR. BIGGAR wished to point out, in reply to the remarks of the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir Hardinge Giffard), that in civil life minors did not enter into contracts, which were always made for them by their parents or guardians. It was not, in his opinion, a very good thing, even on the score of morality, that a minor should be invited to enter into a contract which would be binding on him for several years after he became of age. The proper way of dealing with the matter would be that the boy who made a contract with the military authorities during his minority should be entitled, after he attained the age of 21, to have the opportunity afforded him of confirming it or withdrawing from it.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he must confess that he had been somewhat impressed by the remarks which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir Hardinge Giffard) with regard to apprenticeship. He did not like to express dissent from any proposition on a legal point which had been enunciated by a man of the hon. and learned Gentleman's great professional reputation. Some of his hon. Friends near him had, however, been more daring, and had controverted the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman, so that the point could hardly be regarded as quite settled.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, this was a very important matter, although there had been less said about it than it deserved. The law provided special precautions to prevent persons under age from taking any serious step in life against the wishes of their parents. It did not allow them, for instance, to marry. He wished to provide that some care was taken in enlisting young men to ascertain that their parents were satisfied with the step, and that appeared to him a very reasonable thing to ask. What happened very often now? A young man had a dispute with his parents, ran away from home, and enlisted in the Army, taking this very serious step without their knowledge and against their will. They might be people of considerable respectability. They might have intended him for some other Profession. They might even have trained him for some other Profession which would fit him to take a higher position than that of a rank-and-file in Her Majesty's Service. Yet this boy could enlist without their knowledge, and against their will, and might, perhaps, be hurried off to India or elsewhere, before they even knew what had become of him. This was a very serious thing, which, it appeared to him, would have been guarded against, but for the fact that this Mutiny Act was framed in barbarous times, and had been maintained ever since, almost as a matter of form, and without alteration. When a boy was apprenticed, they required the consent of his parents or guardians; and why should a recruit be allowed to take this step without a similar safeguard? He would, therefore, propose to add the following words at the bottom of page 41:—

“And every person authorized to enlist recruits in the regular forces shall take such steps as shall be necessary, and possible, to inform the parents or guardians of the person enlisted, of the proposed enlistment, where such recruit is under age.”

COLONEL STANLEY said, he must deprecate a discussion of the general question of recruiting, which involved many other matters, and was a very difficult thing to deal with. He would ask the hon. Gentleman to consider how the Amendment could be carried out? How was the sergeant to ascertain who were the parents, if the recruit did not tell him, as he probably would not, who they were, and where they lived? Supposing even the sergeant did get the information, how was he to tell that the answer he received was a genuine one? What could be simpler than the present plan? The recruit was taken before a Justice, who asked him if he was of a specified age, and the recruit answered upon oath that he was. What could be simpler or more direct than that? They did not care to look too closely into the motives of men who were recruited. Many were anxious to go abroad, or to see service; while many did not always enlist under their real names. Further, could they possibly hope that such a provision as this would work? He believed it would only make confusion worse confounded, and would be of no practical effect. With regard to taking men of greater age, this also raised an important principle. When the happy day came that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could add £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 to the Estimate, and the House of Commons would confirm the grant, they might, perhaps, talk about getting men of from 20 to 24 in the Army. It was merely a question of money; and until they had that increased grant, he did not see why they were to lay down a hard-and-fast line that men should be 21. Many men were just as likely to make good and efficient soldiers at 20 as others were at 22 or 23. He did not think it would be desirable to tie the Government to a hard-and-fast line; and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would see that the practical difficulties in the way of working his proposal were far too great.

MR. O'DONNELL remarked that, taking the conditions of the Service into account, they could not, of course, create in a day the citizen Army that they desired. It might be difficult—perhaps practically impossible—to carry out all the conditions imposed on the recruiter by the Amendment; but he thought it would be, therefore, no harm to put into the clause some further safeguard, making sure that when before the Justice the recruit was in full possession of his senses. He would suggest that they should introduce words making certain that the appearance before the Justice would not take place for at least 48 hours after the enlistment. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would introduce words to that effect, he would suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to accept that as a compromise. If that were done, a man could not, at the time of appearing before a magistrate, be either intoxicated, or be suffering from the effects of intoxication; and it would be a great deal to secure that there was that perfect freedom of choice which it was the object of the Secretary of State for War to provide. He did not think the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would refuse to undertake that the appearance before the Justice should take place 48 hours after enlistment.

COLONEL STANLEY thought that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) could not have been in the House at the time he explained the alterations in the Act. The hon. Gentleman did not want anybody brought before the magistrates in an unfit state, nor did he (Colonel Stanley) himself. The hon. Gentleman thought it better to wait 48 hours after the enlistment before the recruit was brought before the magistrate. That was simply the present system, and it was a bad one. He had introduced in this Bill, therefore, certain changes, because he wanted to get rid of the present system. Now, an enlistment sergeant put 1s. into a man's hand and said—"I enlist you to serve the Queen," at the same time giving him notice where he would have to meet him to go before the magistrate. The recruit had to hang about wherever he could until that time came. Under the old system, when a man was enlisted for a service which might be for 21 years, and latterly was 12, the law rightly interposed to prevent a man making that bargain hurriedly and without due notice, and enacted that he should not be brought before the magistrate to confirm his bargain within less than 24 hours after he made it; nor was he to be kept waiting about for longer than 96. In that time a man could get off his bargain by paying smart-money, as it was called. It was found, however—for there were bad recruiters as well as good ones—that men were sometimes enlisted merely for the sake of the smart-money. Bad recruiters hung about houses which, to say the least, were not of the best character, and took men who were more or less in a state of intoxication. He wanted to sweep all that away, and to make the contract of service a distinct contract. He wanted that a man should go at once before the magistrate, and there make his contract. He took it for granted—and, indeed, a magistrate would not be doing his duty if he did otherwise—that a magistrate would not enlist a man when suffering from the effects of drink. Under the new system the affirmation was made the first process. A sergeant might give a man, when he enlisted him, anything he liked; but he did it at his own risk: and if the man chose to disappear before the time of attestation came, nobody in the world would interfere with him; but when he had presented himself and made the bargain, then he had entered into a distinct contract, by the terms of which he would be bound. A man, at present, had the privilege of buying himself out by a payment varying from £21 downwards. But this was an indulgence, not a right, and depended upon a variety of circumstances—such as that the regiment was up to its full strength, that the exigencies of the Service permitted it, and so on; the result being that many men had to wait for the permission until long after their money was gone. He proposed to alter that also, and to enact, if at any time during three months a man did not like the Service, he might go, repaying the State what he had cost it, and he did not think that was an unfair bargain. They could not expect the State to keep a man, and to find him food and lodging for three months for nothing. But, on the other hand, they did give him, within three months after his enlistment, the absolute right to go, except in a time of national emergency, or when the Reserves had been called out. He thought both these were distinct improvements—the making the attestation before the magistrate, the contract of service, and the subsequent change as to buying out. He asked the Committee to look at these two clauses together, for he was not able to go into the matter fully to explain his position. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) must see that, by his present proposition, however innocently, he had struck at the very root of what he wanted to avoid.

MR. BIGGAR pointed out that the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman wandered a good deal from the Amendment, which proposed that if a minor wished to enter as a soldier his relatives, guardians, or parents, should have notice that he proposed to do so. He thought it was a very reasonable proposition. It did not give a right of veto; but merely would afford the parents an opportunity to confer with the recruit, and to use all the arguments they pleased in order to persuade him not to join. With reference to the last remarks of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, he greatly doubted if it would not be very much better to pay their soldiers more, and so to get a higher class of men. They were told that a boy of 18, before he was fit for service, cost something like £120, and that in the case of a horse soldier he cost twice as much. Would it not be better to give the men a little better pay, and so get better men, who would go into the Reserve more quickly? He did not profess, of course, to be well up in military topics; but he thought this would be the better plan, as by it they would have but a comparatively small number of men on active service, yet men who would be ready to go anywhere. But he believed that the present state of things was very dear. As to the Amendment, he certainly considered that it was unreasonable to ask a boy thoroughly unfit to understand the question, and probably on the spree, or something of that sort, whether he was of the right age, and so to induce him to enter a Service which involved his personal liberty for the best part of his life.

MR. PARNELL thought his Amendment might be made workable; but he admitted that it was not so in its present shape, and thought it would be better for him to re-consider the whole question, and to draft a new clause on the subject. He would place that on the Paper, and the Government would have time to consider it between that time and the time when they reached the new clauses. It certainly was of the greatest importance that they should have some means of preventing children running away from home and depriving their parents of any knowledge of their whereabouts. He, therefore, proposed to withdraw his Amendment. He would first ask the Secretary of State for War whether, instead of the old system of an interval not less than 24 hours, and not exceeding 96, he did not now intend to have any interval at all between the time of enlistment and the time of his appearing before the magistrate?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the time when the man went before the magistrate was the time from which he proposed to make the whole contract commence. The advantage of that was, it took the man out of the disreputable surroundings in which he had formerly to wait, and enlisted him at once.

MR. WHITWELL thought the Amendment was a step in the right direction. Under the old law, the instant a man received the shilling he was bound to pay smart-money to get off his bargain; but now, if he was enlisted in the evening, he was open during the whole of the night to the entreaties of his friends and relatives to withdraw from his conditional assent, and he could do so if he chose. Then, if he did not, he went freely before the magistrate. He thought the Amendment was a very important and satisfactory one, and a very great improvement on the previous system.

MR. PARNELL thought that a middle course must be steered by the Committee, so that a magistrate might have power to give time to the man to make up his mind. The proposed system allowed no time for consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that precautions should be taken that a man should not be in a state of intoxication at the time he was enlisted before the magistrate; it was, therefore, in his opinion, advisable to put words into the Bill, directing the magistrate not to enlist men in that condition. It was notorious that soldiers had been enlisted and attested when drunk; but, at the present time, they were never attested while in that state. He, therefore, moved to insert in line 5, page 42, after the word "enlisted," the words "or if, in the opinion of the justice, he is under the influence of intoxicating liquor."

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that before the Chairman put the Question he should like to point out that he had already expressly stated that the magistrate would be liable to censure if it were proved that he had enlisted a man while he was intoxicated. He would, however, consult the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as to whether the proposed Amendment would cast any slur upon the magistrates.

MAJOR NOLAN said, a great many Justices enlisted men who were but slightly intoxicated. There was, of course, no objection to the recruiting sergeant giving a man a few glasses. He considered that the words proposed would be an improvement in the Act.

COLONEL STANLEY thought the words were quite unnecessary. He had already put in the words "and shall take care that such person understands the question so read," which did not appear in the Mutiny Act.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should ask himself whether the theory which he had put forward at an earlier part of the discussion, with reference to the enlistment of recruits, was carried out in practice? He (Mr. O'Connor Power), had been informed by an hon. Friend who had both had occasion to pass recruits for the Army and to enlist men in his capacity of Justice of the Peace, that recruits, which he had rejected, had been passed subsequently by another Justice of the Peace, who appeared to take a very free and easy view of the responsibility resting upon him in that capacity. A great many desertions from the Army arose from the fact that numbers of the recruits, having joined it hastily, only looked for the best opportunity to run away. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) would say that if anything could be done to enable the recruit to realize the conditions of the contract he was called upon to enter into, the public would stand upon safer ground than in allowing him to be under any misapprehension with regard to them. Perhaps the most effectual Amendment to the clause would be to require that two Justices should assent to the attestation. There would be a considerable advantage in this plan, for if one of the Justices was unable to see whether the recruit was in a state of drunkenness, it was at least to be hoped that the other would be in a position to form a clearer judgment. He pointed out with reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) that the recruiting sergeant knew exactly when he could catch his man. The sergeant would go down to the place where the man happened to be, and if he found him favourable, he would exactly measure the time necessary to get to the next Justice of the Peace; so that, if it were possible, he would get the whole matter over in five minutes, because he received a certain advantage for every recruit he enlisted.

MR. PARNELL pointed out that although the first part of the clause gave the recruit plenty of time to consider his position, it would most likely happen that the recruiting sergeant would hurry him off to the magistrate, and enlist him, so to speak, before he knew where he was. The present Bill showed an advantage over the old clauses, yet to the vast majority of recruits it did no service at all, for the recruiting sergeant had still a great facility for carrying them off and having them enlisted on the spot. The Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) asked that the magistrate should not be allowed to enlist a man under the influence of liquor. That was a very fair proposal, indeed; but the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) thought the evil was guarded against in the clause. The clause, however, only guarded against it, by saying that—

“The justice of the peace shall be satisfied that the recruit understands each question so read.”

And it was very well known that a recruit might be under the influence of liquor, and yet understand the questions read to him. But a man should be in his right mind; he should be himself when he took such a serious step as to engage himself to serve under the Colours and in the Reserve for a period of 12 years. The words proposed to be introduced could not, as had been suggested, cast any slur upon the Justices. He (Mr. Parnell) did not agree with the view expressed by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that it was sufficient that the recruit should understand the questions read to him. Hon. Members who approved this Amendment held that a man should be himself, and that he should be free from all extraneous influence whatever, whether of liquor or anything else, at the time of taking such a serious step as enlistment. He suggested that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should agree to the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, and that if, after consultation, he found that it was objectionable, he should strike it out on Report. This was a much better plan than that of postponing the Amendment which, in all probability, would be lost sight of when the Report came on. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had urged no argument against the Amendment; he said only that, while agreeing with the spirit of it, he should be obliged to consult the Secretary of State for the Home Department as to whether it would cast any slur upon the magistrates. He (Mr. Parnell) felt quite sure that the magistrates would not look upon the matter in that light, and he trusted, therefore, that the Amendment would be agreed to.

MR. BIGGAR could not imagine a more reasonable Amendment than that proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). It was very unreasonable to imagine that a boy could be in a proper state to enter into a contract, when his imagination was excited with liquor; on the contrary, he maintained that the recruit should have every opportunity to consider, in his sober moments, the serious step he was about to take. If this opportunity were given him, he would, if he entered into the contract, after proper consideration, remain; but if he was enlisted in a state of intoxication, and found out afterwards that he had made a bad bargain, he would most probably desert, and the whole expense incurred by the Government on his account would be lost to the country. With regard to the contention that the proposal would cast a slur upon the magistrates, he could not conceive that anything of the sort would be felt. Of course, no magistrate would like a recruit to make a declaration when he was tipsy; but, still, it might be thought by some that there was no harm in his doing so, when he was more or less excited by liquor. For these reasons, he certainly thought it would be desirable to put into the Act of Parliament some words requiring that the recruit should be sober.

MR. PARNELL, referring to the reply of the Secretary of State for War, that "he wished to consult with the Secretary of State for the Home Department as to whether this Amendment would be considered to be a slur on the magistrates," desired to ask that right hon. Gentleman, who was now in his place, for his opinion upon that point? He put the question to the right hon. Gentleman, with the object of saving a Division; and, in doing so, pointed out that if he was of opinion that the Amendment would be a slur upon the magistrates, the ground would be cut from under the feet of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) and his supporters; while, on the other hand, if he expressed his opinion to the contrary, the ground would be cut from under the feet of the Secretary of State for War. He was very willing that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should be arbiter. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway and himself were both magistrates, and neither of them thought that the Amendment would be any slur upon their characters; therefore, they confidently left the point to the decision of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that after looking at the wording of the clause he was bound to state that, in his opinion, no magistrate having right before his eyes could possibly allow an intoxicated man to make a declaration.

MAJOR NOLAN said, it then became a question whether there should be a slur upon the soldiers, or upon the magistrates. It was an old taunt to say that the Army enlisted soldiers when they were drunk; but his Amendment would make it impossible to make use of this taunt in future. It was, no doubt, the fact that men used to be enlisted, although not attested, when they were intoxicated.

MR. O'DONNELL said, there were great variations in the magisterial ranks. He did not mean to say anything derogatory to the magistrates in general; but, speaking from his own knowledge of a few individuals, he was quite sure that, taking the whole body of the magistracy, it would be found to include several pleasant, jovial old gentlemen who would think it very little harm to overlook a slight amount of tipsiness on the part of the recruit at a time when a Tory Government was in want of soldiers. It was all very well to talk about casting slurs upon the magistrates; but he was perfectly sure that under the present arrangements there was a rather larger proportion of bad and indifferent men amongst them than there would be under a different system of selection. There could be no slur whatever cast upon a body of public servants, by merely taking the precaution to prevent their erring in the discharge of their duties.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 78 (Power of recruit to purchase discharge).

MR. O'DONNELL said, that this clause introduced a very good improvement into the present system. It was provided by the clause that within three months after joining any recruit could obtain his discharge by paying to the use of Her Majesty the sum of £10. In the course of his remarks some time back, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War referred to this subject; and if the clause only corresponded with the description he gave of it, it would be quite unexceptionable. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that the Government had determined to go upon the principle of giving a recruit three months' time to make up his mind, and if he decided in that time to leave the Army, he should be allowed to do so, only being charged what his maintenance in the Army had cost the country. Government had fixed that sum at £10, and it was to be presumed that that was the cost of his maintenance and clothing for three months. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War must at once perceive that if a recruit changed his mind a fortnight after joining, it would not be fair to charge him £10, for he would not then have cost the country that sum. In point of fact, a man who had been only a fortnight in the Service would have cost much less, and he ought to be allowed to go, when he had paid what he had really cost the country. He trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would give some undertaking to make some alteration in this matter upon Report.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the hon. Member would move an Amendment?

MR. O'DONNELL begged to move, as an Amendment, in page 43, line 2, to leave out the words "ten pounds," in order to insert "two pounds."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the Amendment would not do, because the country would be put to a very considerable amount of expense if a certain number of young men were allowed to join, and then to leave in this way; for the result would be that they obtained food and clothing at an almost nominal price. There were very great expenses which a recruit caused—roughly speaking, it might be said that it was £10 for three months; but it certainly was not £3 6s. 8d. for each month. There were a great many expenses, such as cost of clothing and necessaries, and so forth, which the recruit required as much for one day's service as for three months. His object in putting down this sum of £10 was simply to prevent the country losing the money, and he had endeavoured to adjust the scale, so as not to make the recruit pay more than what was fair. He would confess that he was very much in the hands of the Committee; but unless the country was to lose money he thought that the balance was very well struck at £10. He thought that the better plan would be to allow the clause to remain in its present state.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that this was one of those clauses which was calculated to establish the principle which he had always endeavoured to inculcate for many years past—that service in the Army should be made a perfectly free contract, both on the part of the man who engaged himself and of the country who retained his services. The proposition which the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had made was absurd, for it only amounted to allowing men to obtain food and necessaries from the country almost free of expense.

MR. O'DONNELL rose to save the virtuous indignation of the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), and to state that he had misunderstood his meaning.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member was out of Order.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK remarked, that what the hon. Member wished to establish in the Army was a system of unlimited out-door relief for loafers. That would be the effect of any such proposal as this; and he considered that the proposition of the Government was very much more practicable, while it yet would establish the principle that enlistment was a perfectly free contract. He had been endeavouring for many years to obtain the institution of some provision of this kind, by which a soldier who did not like the Service might go away. The clause now proposed was in the right direction, and he was thoroughly in its favour. He did not think that the proposition of the hon. Member for Dungarvan ought to be accepted by the Committee.

MR. PARNELL considered the proposition of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War a very fair one; and he thought that if he would insert the words "not exceeding" £10 in the clause it might very fairly be left as it stood.

MR. O'DONNELL observed, that he merely proposed the insertion of £2 in the clause for the purpose of raising the question. He begged permission to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. O'Donnell

COLONEL STANLEY then moved to insert the words "not exceeding" before the words "ten pounds."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL thought that the wording of the clause was somewhat faulty. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman looked into it, he (Mr. Parnell) thought he would see that it would enable the authorities to keep a man 12 months after he had paid his money for his discharge. He was sure that that was not the intention of the Government; and he should therefore move to insert in page 42, line 8, the words "after payment of a certain sum not exceeding ten pounds."

COLONEL STANLEY did not see that the clause was open to the objection which the hon. Member took. If the clause were altered, as proposed, it would have a detrimental effect, for this reason. Whilst he was in command of a battalion the relatives of soldiers frequently deposited their money in his hands to await the discharge of the soldier. There could be no objection to that practice; but the insertion of the Amendment of the hon. Member would make it impossible.

MR. HOPWOOD thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was under a misapprehension as to the meaning of the Amendment. The Amendment provided that payment should be made at the moment that a soldier required his discharge, and it would not interfere with the relatives placing money in the hands of the commanding officer to await his discharge. The object of the Amendment was this—to prevent a man who had paid his money being detained for some time afterwards, unless, as provided by the clause, he claimed his discharge at a time when Her Majesty required his services. He could not think that it was the intention of the Government to keep a man after he had paid the money. [Colonel STANLEY: No, no!] That being the case, it was very necessary that the clause should properly carry out the intentions of the Government; and he thought that it ought to be made clear that the legal obligation to pay the money was only to arise at the moment of discharge.

COLONEL STANLEY inquired, whether he rightly understood the object of the Amendment not to be to prevent the colonel of a regiment having the money deposited in his hands available for the discharge?

MR. HOPWOOD did not think that the Amendment would interfere with such a case as that; the words would simply provide that until the moment of discharge there was no legal obligation to pay the money to the authorities.

Clause amended, by inserting after the words "ten pounds," "then on payment of the said sum he shall be discharged."

COLONEL DRUMMOND-MORAY moved that the clause be left out of the Bill. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had said that he did not want the country to be put to any cost by the discharge of a recruit at the end of three months; but, in his (Colonel Drummond-Moray's) opinion, it would be found that a recruit who had been three months in the Service would cost the country more like £15 than £10. Besides the cost of his clothing and necessaries, there was the instruction which was given to the recruit, and the trouble that he occasioned from time to time. Beyond all that, there was another point which should not be lost sight of. The first three months of a soldier's life were, in all probability, the most unpleasant he had. Perhaps he had seen the regiment together, and had been attracted by the uniform, or the band, and had thought that he should like to enlist. No doubt, the recruiting sergeant had confirmed him in his views of the pleasant life which he would lead. But after he had enlisted, he would, probably, be sent off with a number of others to the brigade dépôt of his regiment, where he would find nothing but young soldiers like himself, with a few old ones to look after them; his whole time would be spent hard at work under the drill corporal, and he would soon get home-sick, and send to his friends to find £10 to buy him out. If they had the money, they would be sure to do so; and he would then buy his discharge, and go back to his native place, and abuse the Service up hill and down dale to all the young men of his acquaintance, telling them that soldiering was abominable, and that the life of a soldier was of the hardest possible description; although, in reality, he knew nothing whatever about it. He (Colonel Drummond-Moray) really thought that if the clause were passed as it stood, many a young fellow who, if he had stayed in the Service would have been a credit to his regiment, would get disgusted with it before he had given it a fair trial, and would leave at the end of the three months.

MR. WHITWELL remarked that the clause had been introduced by the Government in order to popularize the Army, and to prevent unwilling men being retained in the ranks. He was, therefore, strongly in its favour; and should advocate it on the very ground upon which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Drummond-Moray) moved its rejection.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the hon. and gallant Member who had moved the rejection of the clause (Colonel Drummond-Moray) forgot that if a man went back to his native place, and gave a bad account of soldiering, his own case would, at all events, show how easy it was to get out of it.

GENERAL SHUTE was in favour of the rejection of the clause altogether; and more particularly from the influence which it would have upon the Cavalry and the Household troops. Every Cavalry recruit cost the country between £20 and £30 during the first three months of his service; and if the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Drummond-Moray) were true as to the hard work of an Infantry soldier at the beginning of his service, they applied in a much stronger manner to a Cavalry recruit, who was worked much more severely at the commencement of his service. There was much more likelihood that a Cavalry recruit would get somewhat disgusted with the service, and weary of his duties. Moreover, the expense of the outfit of a Cavalry soldier was great; and especially was that the case in the Household Cavalry. But he had a few words to say upon this point in a military sense. It had been a matter of observation that the Cavalry suffered more than the Infantry from men leaving in a short time after joining. He had recently had a conversation with a General lately in command of the Cavalry at Aldershot, and with others well acquainted with the subject. They fully confirmed his experience that whenever any young fellow quarrelled with his friends, and wished to enlist, nine times out of ten he went to the Cavalry, knowing perfectly well that his relations would in the end buy his discharge; in fact, having no intention, from the first, to serve for any length of time. Therefore, if the clause were adopted, the Cavalry would be a greater sufferer than ever. And in the Cavalry an immense amount of trouble was bestowed on the recruit; first, they had to be taught all the foot drill of an Infantry soldier, then the riding drill, the use of three arms; and after all this trouble had been spent on a man he was to be entitled to his discharge when he was just beginning to understand his duties. He would like to move for a Return of the number of men who had paid for their discharge from the Cavalry. Even at the present time, it was a most serious inconvenience; and so much so, that he had intended to press an Amendment of the clause, in order to provide that when a man had served nine months without returning his name for discharge he should not be entitled to it for two years, excepting at double the present rate; so that the Government should get some compensation for the cost and trouble of his instruction. Financially speaking, the clause would be unfair to the taxpayer; and, with regard to the Cavalry in particular, it would do very serious mischief, and tend further to reduce the age and efficiency of our regiments, besides discouraging enlistment, as the men obtaining discharge within three months would have experienced only the drudgery of recruits' drill.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that, no doubt, there was great weight in the objections of the hon. and gallant Members for Perthshire (Colonel Drummond-Moray) and Brighton (General Shute). What the Government desired to do was to make the presumption of advantage in enlistment in favour of the soldier. They wished that service in the Army should be voluntary; and that the inducement to enlist, and the advantage from so doing, should be in favour of the recruit. He believed that the advantage was now in favour of the recruit; but it was desired to make it more apparent that it was so. The more apparent they made it that the advantage of joining the Service was in favour of the recruit, the more popular would the Service become. Under the provisions of the clause, the financial balances would be rather in favour of, than against, the recruit. He would be allowed to go away at the end of three months on payment of £10, though, if he pleased, he might have saved £3 in hard cash, besides having had his keep free. The country, perhaps, would be the loser by the transaction; but what it lost was nothing as compared to the gain in the establishment of the principle enforced by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms). They did not want unwilling men in the Service. Let them establish that principle, and they would be in the position which existed in the Indian Service, where, instead of having to seek for men, there were numbers of applicants waiting to enter the Service. He maintained that the clause was a step in the right direction; and that they were, in reality, declaring that they did not want unwilling men. By doing that, they would soon put the balance in favour of the country; and, although there might be some slight financial loss at first, the country would be the eventual gainer.

Colonel Drummond-Moray

MAJOR O'BEIRNE remarked that it was surely preferable to allow a man to buy himself out of the Service than to make him desert. The question of desertion was a very serious one, for 6,000 or 7,000 men deserted yearly, and the object of this clause was to check that desertion.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Appointment to Corps and Transfers.

Clause 79 (Enlistment for general service and appointment to corps).

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, that since the introduction of the brigade-depôt system, soldiers who had enlisted into a regiment were enlisted for service in either battalion, which might either be for home or for foreign service. Some men enlisted for the purpose of remaining at home for the time of their service, and then getting transferred to the Reserve. But it was the custom very frequently, after six months' service, to send these men to the brigade dépôt, where they would get drafted off to India or the Colonies contrary to their intention when they entered the Service. He thought there was something to complain of in this arrangement; and he would, therefore, move as an Amendment, in page 43, line 12, after "regular forces," to insert—

"And shall not be transferred without his consent from the dépôt of a regiment on service in the United Kingdom to the dépôt of a regiment on foreign service."

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) would not press his Amendment. If he looked closer into the matter, he would find that all men who had enlisted since the 1st of April, 1873, were enlisted not for a particular regiment, but for a brigade, and were interchangeable amongst the battalions composing that brigade. Men were passed from one battalion to another, and were absolutely transferable, according to the terms of their engagement. Men who had enlisted before the date he had mentioned, although in a regiment which might form a constituent part of the brigade, were, by the terms of their enlistment, only liable to be transferred to another battalion by their own consent. He fully agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman that it was not desirable to transfer men unless they wished it; but the interests of the Service were such that they were sometimes obliged to do it. The system of brigade dépôts was deliberately adopted by Parliament, and it was a portion of that system that all men enlisting were liable to be transferred to any of the regiments forming part of the brigade dépôt.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE thought that when a man enlisted he ought to be informed that part of the regiment which he was entering was at home, and part was abroad; and that, consequently, he might be sent to serve either at home or abroad. Many men enlisted for the sole purpose of serving in England for the six years of their service; but they might find themselves transferred to the dépôt of the regiment, and sent to India, which was entirely contrary to their intention. Where a man intended only to enlist for England, it was a fraud upon him to put him under a liability to be transferred to a portion of his regiment abroad, unless he was informed of that liability at the time of entering the Service. He considered that this liability to transfer ought to be clearly stated in the attestation paper.

COLONEL STANLEY agreed in principle with the observations of the hon.

and gallant Member (Major O'Beirne); but the system which they now adopted was not to enlist men for any one battalion, but to enlist generally for the brigade, with a liability of being transferred to any regiment forming a part of it.

MR. PARNELL wished to know, whether a recruit was informed that he was enlisted for general service, or allowed to believe that his enlistment was for the particular service of a battalion—was a recruit told, when he enlisted, that he would be enlisted for one particular battalion, or was he informed that his enlistment was really for general service? There was a very important point involved in this matter, and he should particularly wish to have some information as to whether a man was distinctly enlisted for general purposes?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that no man was enlisted for general service. Every man was enlisted for a brigade, consisting of two battalions. When they were linked regiments, the battalions formed but one brigade. All the officers and all the men who were attached to the brigade had been, since the 1st of April, 1873, interchangeable among the various battalions or regiments composing it. A man was now enlisted for a brigade, and it was clearly explained to him that he was liable to be transferred from one battalion to another. It was impossible to state in an attestation paper that one battalion was at home and another was abroad, because the stations of battalions were being continually changed.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to point out that a man might be enlisted for general service; and in sub-section 5 of the next clause it was provided that where a man who had been enlisted to serve part of the term of his original enlistment in the Reserve was on service beyond the seas and at the time of his corps, or the part thereof in which he was serving, being ordered to another station, or to return home, had more than two years of his Army service in the terms of his original enlistment unexpired, then he might be transferred to any corps of the same branch which was on service beyond the seas. Thus a man who had been enlisted for one regiment might be transferred to any other regiment in the Service. It was not fair that there should be such a sweeping provision as that. Therefore, if a recruit were to ask whether he would have any chance of serving his whole time in one particular regiment, no other answer could be given him than that the chance was two to one against him.

MR. PARNELL said, that there was really a very important point involved in this matter. He wished to know what was the difference between being enlisted for service in a particular corps and being enlisted in a particular corps?

COLONEL STANLEY said, that a man could only be transferred to another brigade when he had enlisted for service generally. His impression was that no man could be enlisted for general service, unless the brigade to which he applied for enlistment was full. What was practically done was this—they told the man that he might enlist; but that if he did enlist, it would be for general service in any corps to which he might be sent.

MR. PARNELL supposed that that was made quite clear to the recruit in the attestation paper. Of course, the arrangement was perfectly right, if it were made clear to the recruit that one battalion was at home and another was abroad, and that he was liable to serve in either.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that a man was liable for service abroad at any time; but it was impossible to state in the attestation paper whether a battalion of the brigade was at home or abroad.

MR. PARNELL asked, whether it could not be made clear to the recruit, by the attestation paper, that he was liable for service in either battalion of the brigade? Could they not tell him in the attestation paper where the battalions were?

COLONEL STANLEY said, that they could not tell the recruit where the battalions were; it was quite impossible.

MR. PARNELL asked, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would have any objection to say how, if it was not stated in the attestation paper where the battalions were, it was made perfectly clear to the recruit that he was liable to serve in either battalion either abroad or at home?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought that the object the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had in view was a very proper one. A raw recruit had a paper put into his hands, and it ought to show him exactly what his liabilities were.

Colonel Stanley

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that our Army must be composed of two classes of men; those enlisted for a short, and those enlisted for a long period—it being necessary to have long service men to serve in India and abroad. No doubt, some soldiers wished only to enlist for short service in this country, in order that they might go into the Reserve; while others were willing to serve in any part of the globe. It seemed to him to be extremely desirable to encourage soldiers who were willing to adopt the long service, so that it was made perfectly clear to the soldier when he enlisted what he was doing. He hoped that the Government would take care that it was made clear to the recruit whether he was enlisting for a long period of general service, so that he was liable to be sent abroad or to serve in any corps, or whether his liability was for a short period of service, so that, practically, he could not be sent abroad.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, that it was simply a fraud upon the recruit to entrap him into enlisting in a regiment which was serving at home, and then to transfer him to a regiment either serving, or about to be sent, abroad.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that before the Amendment was put from the Chair, he must protest against Amendments being placed upon the Paper by hon. Members who did not know the A B C of the military Profession. The Amendment referred to two depôts of a regiment; whereas, in fact, there was only one. To place such an Amendment upon the Paper was only misleading the Committee and wasting time; and it showed great ignorance of the Service.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that although there might be a verbal error in the Amendment, yet the fact still remained that this system of transferring men from one regiment to another was being acted upon daily.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that there was no power to transfer a soldier from one regiment to another, when he had enlisted for a particular regiment. The matter would, however, receive consideration.

MR. RYLANDS said, that it struck him as being a matter of extreme importance that the recruit should be made acquainted with all the conditions of his service on enlisting. He understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to say that the matter would receive his consideration.

MR. PARNELL said, that what was asked was that the Regulations of the Army should be so framed that every recruit should know where the regiment was serving for which he was enlisting. If he did not enlist for a particular regiment, but a brigade, the recruit should be able to ascertain where the battalions forming that brigade were serving. He hoped that the Secretary of State for War would take care that that knowledge should be communicated to the recruits.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was quite willing to give that undertaking; but, at the same time, he wished to point out that it was quite possible to go too far in the direction of giving information to the recruit, and, from an excess of caution, actually to mislead him.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that there could be no danger of misleading the recruit when he enlisted for a particular battalion.

MR. BIGGAR said, that it was this practice of transferring men from one regiment to another which induced them to desert. It appeared to him that, under the present system, a fraud was perpetrated upon the recruit, and the result was that when he wished to join a particular regiment, he deserted from the one he had been transferred to and re-enlisted in the one he desired to serve in. Thus, when a man found himself transferred to a regiment ordered abroad, he deserted and re-enlisted in a home-serving battalion. He did not think that the practice of recruits enlisting for general service should be kept up. It would be very much better for the soldiers to join particular regiments and to remain in them, unless they themselves volunteered for foreign service. As far as possible, the soldiers ought to know their own officers, and the officers their men.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 80 (Effect of appointment to a corps and provision for transfers).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he would move to amend the clause, by adding, after the word "seas," in page 44, line 15, the following words :—

"Provided, That the power of transfer given by sub-sections four and five of Clause eighty of this Act shall not apply to any man who enlists for the whole of the period of twelve years in Army service, or to any man who, having enlisted for a portion of the said period in Army service, has extended his Army service for the residue unexpired of his term of twelve years, or to any man who has re-engaged."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no objection to the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet.

MR. PARNELL said, that he had a previous Amendment on this clause which was not upon the Paper.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) that when an Amendment which appeared upon the Paper had been put from the Chair, it was not respectful to the Committee for an hon. Member to get up in his place, and say that he had a previous Amendment which was not written nor upon the Paper, and yet to propose no such Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, he had no wish to delay the progress of this measure; but he desired to point out to the Chairman and to the Committee how the matter stood. The hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Alexander Gordon) had risen to propose an Amendment which appeared upon the Paper, whereupon he (Mr. Parnell) had risen to propose a previous Amendment which was not on the Paper, on which the hon. and gallant Baronet had given way to him, and he was in possession of the Committee. Just at that moment, the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) exclaimed that he had an Amendment before his (Mr. Parnell's), whereupon he had sat down, giving way to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, as the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Alexander Gordon) had just given way to him. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan) had then discovered that he was in error, and that his Amendment, instead of preceding his (Mr. Parnell's), was subsequent to it. He was then about to move his Amendment when the Chairman had interrupted him, and had remarked that it was not respectful to the Committee for him to ask permission to move an Amendment which was not upon the Paper, before an Amendment which was upon the Paper. If hon.

Members were not to be permitted to move Amendments which were not upon the Paper, the Rules of the House should state so distinctly. He had always understood that hon. Members were permitted to move such Amendments. He could not help feeling that he had been very unfairly treated in this matter, because there were portions of his Amendment which he believed would have been agreed to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. Now, however, he was altogether shut out from moving his Amendment, in consequence of that of the hon. and gallant Baronet having been put from the Chair. The effect of the course that had been adopted was to deprive him of the right of moving the Amendment he had actually been in the act of moving when he had given way to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). He trusted that the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Alexander Gordon) would withdraw his Amendment, so as to enable him (Mr. Parnell) to move his Amendment, which was a most important one.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he wished to point out to the Committee that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had not stated accurately what had occurred. The Amendment of the hon. and gallant General the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) standing next upon the Paper, he had called upon him to move it, which he had proceeded to do; and the hon. and gallant General was interrupted in the midst of his observations by the hon. Member for Meath, who said he had a previous Amendment to propose which was not upon the Paper, upon which the hon. and gallant General gave way. As far as he (the Chairman) could gather, the hon. Member for Meath appeared to have no Amendment to propose. The hon. Member did not sit down, it was true; but he appeared to be engaged in conversation with his hon. Friends behind him, with reference, as he (the Chairman) supposed, to the nature of the Amendment he had declared himself about to propose. It appeared to him that such a course was not respectful to the Committee, and he had made a statement to that effect. The hon. Member for Meath was not precluded from moving his Amendment, that of the hon. and gallant General the Member for East Aberdeenshire not having been put to the Committee.

Sir Alexander Gordon

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he rose on a point of Order. The difficulty had resulted from a very natural mistake on his own part. Having an Amendment to the clause, in line 15, when he heard the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) say that he had an Amendment in line 21, he naturally concluded that his Amendment preceded that of the hon. Member; whereas, in point of fact, owing to the clause extending into the next page, there were two lines 15 in it, and his (Major Nolan's) Amendment related to a line on the page subsequent to that to which the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath referred. He hoped that, in these circumstances, the hon. Member for Meath would not be precluded from moving his Amendment in consequence of a misapprehension on his (Major Nolan's) part.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he did not know whether he was exactly in Order in rising; but he wished to ask whether, as there appeared to have been some slight mistake, owing to the confusion in the numbering of the lines of the clause, it would not be better for the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) to withdraw his Amendment, in order to give the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) an opportunity of moving his previous Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he wished to point out to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had last spoken that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) was not disposed of; and that, therefore, it was open to the hon. Member for Meath to move his Amendment on the clause, if he desired to do so.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that he also wished to rise on a point of Order. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had agreed to his Amendment, and, therefore, no discussion had taken place with reference to it. The Committee had good reason to complain that after the length of time this Bill had been before the House hon. Members should have neglected to place the Amendments on it which they intended to propose upon the Paper. He begged leave, in the circumstances, to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, that he begged to move to amend the clause by leaving out sub-section 2, in line 29, in page 43. The sub-section in question was to this effect—

“A soldier of the regular forces may at any time with his own consent be transferred, by order of the competent military authority, to any corps of the regular forces.”

The principle involved in this Amendment was very important, as, doubtless, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be prepared to admit; and, therefore, the question it raised ought not to be too hastily disposed of. Unfortunately, he had been absent when the clauses were passed which extended the powers of the Government to increase their Forces by enabling the soldiers from the Army Reserve to volunteer for active service. In his opinion, Parliament should look with a great deal of jealousy upon any attempt on the part of the Crown to get facilities for engaging in foreign wars in different parts of the world, without having previously obtained its sanction. It was for that reason that he now begged to move the omission of this sub-section, which gave the Government power to transfer the soldiers from one corps to another, a power which had been very largely used by the War Office during the war with Zululand. He not only objected to the power which the Government had of entering into foreign wars without the consent of Parliament being extended, but he should like to see that which they already possessed abridged. If it had not been for this power of transfer, the Government would have hesitated before they rushed into war with the Zulus, because they would have been unable to have supplemented their Army, or to have called for picked volunteers from every Home regiment. The short-service system was most valuable, as enabling them to obtain an Army for Home defence; but it was still more valuable, inasmuch as it prevented this country from engaging in little wars all over the world. But, by means of this power of transfer, the Government were enabled to convert the short service system into an instrument for obtaining men for foreign wars.

When the Army Reserve was called out last year, everyone was pleased to see the way in which the men composing it answered to the call upon them; but if, instead of confining such calling out to times of great national emergency, the principle was extended, the Government would be able at any time to avail themselves of the services of a large body of picked soldiers from all the battalions, who might be induced to volunteer for foreign service by the offer of any extra inducement, such as an additional bounty. In view, therefore, of the recent proceedings of the Government abroad, he begged to move the omission of sub-section 2.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he thought that even if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) were agreed to by the Committee, it would not by any means accomplish the object he had in view. It would, however, be inconvenient were it to be rendered impossible to transfer a soldier from one corps to another, even with his consent. Thus, in the event of a soldier having a brother in another regiment, it would be hard to debar him from being transferred to such regiment at his own request. The hon. Member would observe that the transfer was only to be made with the consent of the soldier, and by order of the competent military authorities.

MR. PARNELL said, if he was not right in supposing that this was the clause under which Government could call for volunteers for particular corps, he was, of course, in error. But it would be easy to introduce a clause of very much narrower scope, which would allow the cases of transfer mentioned by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to take place, without having a sub-section, enabling the Government to call for large numbers of volunteers whenever they pleased, to be transferred from one corps to another. It appeared to him that there was no other place in the clause than that which he had selected for inserting his proposed Amendment. Under these circumstances, he did not see how the Government proposed to give any power of limitation. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said the power existed in another part of the Bill, he should, of course, be silent; otherwise, he must consider that his position had been maintained.

Mr. Parnell

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the clause, of course, enabled Government to extend service in regiments by volunteers. Under existing regulations, it would be quite impossible to carry on the public service without allowing men to volunteer.

MR. PARNELL would like to know which section the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) alluded to, because he was unable to discover it within the four corners of the Bill? He assumed the Government had the power which they had recently exercised, or else they had committed an oversight in not including it within the Bill.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that the section referred to was No. 75.

Amendment negatived.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, the insertion, after the word "seas" in line 15, page 44, of the words—

"Provided, That the power of transfer given by sub-sections four and five of Clause eighty of this Act shall not apply to any man who enlists for the whole of the period of twelve years in Army service, or to any man who, having enlisted for a portion of the said period in Army service, has extended his Army service for the residue unexpired of his term of twelve years, or to any man who has re-engaged."

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) that in the language of an Act of Parliament, instead of saying "Clause eighty of this Act," the wording would be "this section."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER wished to move an Amendment before the Question was put. By sub-section 2, a soldier might at any time, with his own consent, be transferred, by order of the competent military authority, to any corps of the Regular Forces. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) admitted that he would be transferred with his own consent; but was he transferred with the knowledge of the conditions upon which he would be transferred, or was the transfer made upon conditions by which the authorities might order anything they thought proper? His object was that the soldier should know into what engagement he entered by being transferred; and, therefore, he begged to move that after the word "by" in page 43, line

35, be inserted, "arrangement with the soldier so transferred, and by."

COLONEL STANLEY thought that the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) was under a misapprehension with regard to this transfer. He would see, by taking the whole section, that the soldier could only vary the general conditions of service. His pay would neither be reduced nor increased by the transfer from one arm or branch of Service to another.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER, after the explanation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (Mr. O'Connor Power), by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL wished to point out to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that he was entirely wrong in his contention that Clause 75 enabled him to call for volunteers for transfer from one corps to another. Such a power had been exercised in November last, when a number of volunteers were called for; but it was under sub-section 2 of the present clause to which he was objecting.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL could not understand the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon). It appeared to be designed to prevent Her Majesty having the number of long-service soldiers which she might otherwise have. If a man who enlisted for a long period of service, with a view to go to India, broke down in his health, and was obliged to be sent home, it was a very reasonable condition that he should be transferred to another corps. But the Amendment would render this impossible, and, therefore, he asked, what was to become of a man so placed? It might be that he was in a single battalion regiment, or that the other battalions of his regiment were serving abroad; and, therefore, unless he was transferred to another corps, his services would be lost to Her Majesty altogether. It appeared to him that, as regarded sub-section 5, the Amendment involved an impossibility; while it was difficult to understand its object with regard to sub-section 4.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON had no wish to trouble the Committee with details; but he might state that the Amendment was word for word in accordance with the existing Act, and its object was to prevent an old soldier who had served in one regiment, invalided and worn out, being sent to a new regiment under fresh circumstances. There was hardly anything which a soldier in that condition disliked more than to have to begin again in a new regiment, where he was wanted neither by his officers, nor by his comrades, because, not being a young man and a smart soldier, he was not likely to bring credit to the regiment.

Amendment (Sir Alexander Gordon) amended and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MAJOR NOLAN said, it was plain that sub-section 5 allowed all soldiers of four years' service to be transferred to any other regiment whatsoever, which would, of course, be disagreeable to a great many soldiers; because, as had been pointed out by the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), the regimental association would be broken up. But it was also objectionable on the ground that a great deal of favouritism might be shown in the selection of the men to be transferred. The commanding officer might weed out the men whom he wished to transfer, and if those men had been presumably all enlisted for a particular corps, it was extremely hard upon them to be put into another against their will. He was not prepared to pass the section altogether; but wanted to have inserted some words which would prevent the colonel of a regiment from showing favouritism or getting rid of particular men. He proposed to insert that—

"No soldier shall be so transferred against his will, unless all available soldiers are also transferred from the corps which is ordered home."

The effect of which would be that the colonel would not be able to pick and choose the men to be transferred. Nothing could be more unfair than that when a regiment was ordered home, and the colonel was ordered to transfer 200 men, he should select them upon any principle he might choose to adopt—that was to say, selecting the men of good or bad character; or, perhaps, according to fancy, picking out the Scotch, English, or Irish. He thought it was most unfair that men enlisted for abroad should be liable to be picked out in this way. The fairest plan, in his opinion, would be to select for transfer the men of least standing in the regiment. He saw no difficulty as to the working of his Amendment, except, perhaps, as regarded the definition of the word "soldier." There might be a little difficulty about the non-commissioned officers in consequence; but it could be remedied very easily by inserting the words "private soldier."

COLONEL STANLEY said, the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) being one of rather large importance, he trusted he should be allowed carefully to look into the proposed wording. Primâ facie, it seemed to him there might be a good deal of difficulty in the working of the Amendment, if carried; and, therefore, he asked the hon. and gallant Member to move it again on Report; in the meantime he (Colonel Stanley) undertook that it should receive fair consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE found that, by sub-section 7, the authorities were to draft men guilty of fraudulent enlistment and desertion, as well as those who had been sentenced to imprisonment for more than four months into regiments in India and elsewhere. This, he wished to point out, was a very great injustice to the officers in those regiments, who ought not to be burdened with all the bad characters from the regiments at home. He was of opinion that the clause ought to mention that not more than a certain percentage of such men should be transferred. This subject was hardly discussed by the Committee upstairs, which he thought should have had before it the Military Codes of France, Germany, and Italy, for the purpose of seeing how those countries dealt with the bad characters in their Armies. The question was a very wide one, and he thought some further information should be supplied in connection with it. He thought that instead of drafting all the bad characters they should be allowed to volunteer, on condition that, after a certain number of years of good service abroad, their service should be restored to them. He begged to move the omission of sub-section 7.

Major Nolan

COLONEL STANLEY pointed out that under the operation of this sub-section a great benefit would be experienced by men who, in the great majority of cases, would be relieved of their penalties, and, instead of spending some years in gaol, would be attached to regiments serving abroad, where they would possibly settle down and make excellent soldiers. There would also be a great saving to the Army by retaining the services of men whose time would otherwise be almost invariably spent in prison. He could not help thinking that the system in operation abroad, to which the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) had referred, would be found extremely repugnant to our Service. His own view was that a young soldier should be removed from the possibility of temptation, or rather merged into a regiment, where, having a new chance before him and a fresh start, he might become a good soldier. But there was another point in connection with this section to which he desired to call the attention of the Committee. He was sorry to say that there was in the Army a body of men who were apt to desert just at the moment when their battalion was ordered abroad. A day or two before the battalion was to leave they deserted, or otherwise so committed themselves as to be liable for trial by court martial, and, consequently, to lose their turn abroad. These men, by running the chance of a court martial, thereby not only avoided their own turn abroad, but were the cause of other men being sent out, who would otherwise remain at home. Now, he was very anxious that the designs of these men should not succeed; and therefore he hoped, as part of the general system proposed to be introduced, to give greater freedom to competent military authorities to transfer these men to battalions where they might perform good service to their country, and, at the same time, relieve other good men from the consequences of their default.

MR. O'DONNELL saw a good deal in the remarks of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. It was easy to see that this sub-section might have a beneficial application; but he thought, also, there might be a very considerable increase in the trouble and difficulty experienced by commanding officers abroad through having a number of disorderly persons drafted into their regiments. It was worth while to consider the point referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that a great many cases of desertion arose from the dislike which many men had to going abroad; and he (Mr. O'Donnell) was not sure that it would not be better to make use of the services of the men in question at home. That consideration reminded him of what had been referred to in the discussion upon the preceding clause—namely, where a man enlisted for one of the linked battalions, without realizing that he was liable for foreign service. It was certainly very hard that a man should find himself liable to serve abroad who had never intended it. No doubt, in many cases, the clause might be worked humanely; but it was certainly calculated to impose additional punishment of an aggravating kind, because, where a deserter was sentenced to a period of punishment at home, under this clause he could, immediately he had completed his term of punishment, be ordered abroad as an additional chastisement for his offence. Upon that point, he would ask the Secretary of State for War to say, whether a deserter who had been sentenced, and who had fulfilled his punishment, could, in virtue of this sub-section, be ordered on foreign service as an aggravation of his punishment?

MR. PARNELL said, he did not know what the meaning of Clause 76 was in connection with the clause under notice. It appeared to him that they had done something in Clause 76 they did not intend to do, and that they were going to enact something now which was not intended. In Clause 76, they had enacted that where a soldier had been convicted as a deserter the whole of his previous service should be forfeited. Now, they were asked to make a man liable to be sent abroad, if he had been convicted by a court martial of desertion or fraudulent enlistment, or having confessed the sentence, or being committed by a court of summary jurisdiction as a deserter, was liable to be tried, his trial had been dispensed with by order of the competent military authority. In sub-section (b), they were asked to say that where a person had been sentenced by a court martial for any offence to a punishment not less than imprisonment for a term of four months, then he should also be liable to be sent abroad, and might be from time to time transferred to such corps of the Regular Forces as the competent military authority might order. Without going into the question whether it was righteous to sentence a man to what was equivalent to a term of transportation for five years for any petty offence which might subject him to a term of imprisonment for four months, his desire was to point out that some provisions in this clause were of a most extraordinary character. Without going into the question, he would inquire what was it a court of competent authority could do? They did not limit the power to inflict punishment upon the prisoner; but they gave power to punish him in addition to his sentence by sending him on foreign service. In sub-section 8 of the clause, they had this state of affairs—

“A soldier of the regular forces committed by a court of summary jurisdiction in any part of Her Majesty's dominions as a deserter shall be liable to be transferred by order of the competent military authority to any corps of the regular forces near to the place where he is committed, or to any other corps to which the competent military authority think it desirable to transfer him, and to serve in the corps to which he is so transferred without prejudice to his subsequent trial and punishment.”

That was, a soldier who had been convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction in any part of Her Majesty's dominions might be sent to any other part—that was, if at home, he might be sent to India or any of the Colonies. He thought that this clause required very careful consideration, and he was sure the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not think that he desired to stop the progress of the Bill if he asked to be allowed then to report Progress.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that the hon. Member would not press his Motion. He had not seen any disposition on the part of hon. Members to close the discussion, and he must say that the Bill had made very little progress. He hoped that the Committee would not stop its labours, at all events, until it had passed the clause. As regarded the point to which the hon. Member had alluded, he had already spoken fully upon the clause, and he did not wish to take up the time of the Committee by repeating what he had said. He would remind hon. Members, with regard to sub-section 8, that it was a re-production of the existing sections of the Mutiny Act. Did the hon. Gentlemen know what the effect of the clause was? The effect was this—where a soldier of the Regular Forces had been committed by a court of summary jurisdiction, he was liable to be transferred by the competent military authority to serve in the corps which was nearest to the place where he had been convicted. The corps from which he had deserted might be many miles away, and it was absolutely impossible for the civil authority to sentence him to return to that corps. The most convenient course, under the circumstances, was to transfer a man to the corps nearest to which he was apprehended, and this provision only reproduced Sections 34 and 36 of the Mutiny Act. Battalions served at one time in one place and another time in another, and if deserters had to be sent out under escort to the places where their corps were serving, very great expense would be caused to the country. He did hope that the hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he did not understand that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had made any Motion.

MR. PARNELL said, that he made it now; for he thought it was a very reasonable Motion. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had only attempted to deal with one of the points which he had raised, and had not noticed the other matters to which he had referred. Unless the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could give some satisfactory answer, he must press his Motion. This clause had been drawn in the most abominable fashion, and it required careful re-drafting before the Committee could pass it. It was said that sub-section 8 was a reproduction of the old Mutiny Act—and that was all the reason that was offered for it—but, in his opinion, that was sufficient condemnation of the clause. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that the corps to which a deserter belonged might be serving abroad, and that he would have to be sent out to that corps. He thought that in order to meet that difficulty there was no necessity for the very excessive powers of this clause. The clause clearly gave a power much in excess of what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman stated that he wished to insist upon. For his part, he (Mr. Parnell) must object to their being required to pass a clause which gave very much more power than the right hon. and gallant Gentleman stated that he required. But what answer had the right hon. and gallant Gentleman given to his observations upon sub-section a and sub-section b? He had said nothing, and had ignored the question entirely. This clause was utterly indefensible—it had been badly and roughly drawn, and required grave consideration. The Committee had now been sitting since a quarter to 4, and he thought had made very satisfactory progress, and had passed a large number of clauses dealing with very important matters indeed. If they judged of their progress by the number of clauses, their work might not look great; but, judged by its importance, the work which they had done had been very satisfactory. He thought that the Government should be satisfied with the progress already made, and should not insist upon going on with the clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

COLONEL STANLEY thought that on closer examination the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would not find this clause so indefensible as he seemed to think. It was provided by sub-section 8 that a soldier who had been committed by a court of summary jurisdiction as a deserter should be liable to be transferred to any corps near the place where he was committed, or to any other corps as the competent military authority might think desirable. In reply to the hon. Member, he (Colonel Stanley) had pointed out these provisions were in the Mutiny Act, before the hon. Member stated that that was sufficient condemnation for them. But, he would ask, what they were to do if they had not these provisions? Supposing a soldier was convicted in England of desertion from a regiment then in China; the man might be apprehended and convicted in England, and was the country to be put to the expense of sending him out to China under escort at a cost of £200 or £300, when his regiment was coming home next year? The difficulty was met by transferring the man to the nearest regiment. In the same way, if a man were apprehended abroad, and his regiment were at home, he would be made to serve in the regiment at the place where he was apprehended. Under the peculiar circumstances of our Army, those who were responsible for the Bill had endeavoured to meet all the various difficulties under which our soldiers had to serve. In some cases, they had expressed their meaning with more or less plainness, and some of the clauses were longer than he should have wished. At the same time, they could not help the clause being long, and he trusted the Committee would not think it was so bad as it had been made out.

Colonel Stanley

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that it had always been regarded as a rule that the Committee should not report Progress until it had made some progress with the matter under discussion. This clause had been discussed at very considerable length, and if Progress was reported at that point, all that had been done with regard to this sub-section would be thrown away, for they would have to begin again. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee, which appeared very favourably disposed to consider any suggestions or proposals, would proceed, and, at any rate, finish this clause.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that this section had given a rather wide power, in permitting a court martial to sentence a man to imprisonment without knowing whether he would get an additional punishment of being transferred to foreign service. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would omit sub-section b, he thought that the clause would then do very well.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had listened with a good deal of deference to the suggestions of those who had done really hard work upon the Bill that evening, and those observations applied with special force to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. Everyone, he (Mr. O'Donnell) was sure, was immensely indebted to him for the courtesy and the business capacity that he had shown. But when the noble Lord the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition came down at that festive hour—when he had not bled in his country's cause at an earlier hour of the evening, and addressed such observations as he had to the Committee—he thought those recommendations did not carry very great weight. He felt that he (Mr. O'Donnell) was one of those hon. Members who had worked hard that evening, and he trusted he had not been guilty of any factious opposition. He had given way on two or three occasions, and it had been admitted by Her Majesty's Government that many things in the Bill were not perceived until they were pointed out. He had no doubt that the sense of the Committee would be with those hon. Members who had worked hard that evening at the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no one could wish to do anything more than was reasonable. They had spent a good deal of time, and had taken great pains in the discussion on that clause; and, having that discussion fresh in their minds, he thought it a pity if they should adjourn until the clause was finished. It seemed to him that the most practical course would be to finish this clause, and then to proceed no further.

MR. RYLANDS thought it was a reasonable suggestion of the Government that if they were able to get through the clause they would not propose to go any further. With regard to sub-section 8, he agreed that it was reasonable, and he saw no objection to it; but he did object to sub-section 7. It was just possible that a little concession on the part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would put the Committee in a position to settle the clause. Sub-section 7 provided that a man who had been convicted of being a deserter should, in addition to his other punishments, be liable to general service. A soldier might be punished for desertion, in addition to imprisonment, by being sent abroad, and by being transferred from time to time to such corps as were on the rota for foreign service, and might be retained for a number of years. The operation of a portion of sub-section 7 had been very properly animadverted upon by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Alexander). It was absurd that because a soldier had been convicted of some offence, as provided in sub-section b, for which he had received imprisonment for a term of not less than four months, he should also be liable to this further punishment of being sent abroad as the authorities might order. If he understood the clause accurately, it enabled a commanding officer, or the competent military authority, by transferring this man, to retain him in foreign service for a number of years. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could amend the clause by limiting the effect of this punishment, he thought that it might meet their views. But, unless the Government were willing to take that course, he did not think it unreasonable that Progress should then be reported.

COLONEL STANLEY thought it possible they might arrive at some understanding with regard to the clause. The operation of sub-section b was, no doubt, what had been attributed to it—that when a man had been sentenced by a court martial to imprisonment he might also be compelled to serve abroad. But that was not the intention of the Government. He had said before that their object in this clause was to enable men to serve their country instead of passing their time in prison. He thought that the views, both of the Government and of hon. Members, might be met by inserting on page 44, the third line from the bottom, after the word “liable,” words providing that men could choose to accept that liability in commutation of their punishments.

MAJOR O’BEIRNE said, that the regiments to which bad characters were sent would very much object. Both officers and men of any regiment would strongly object to receiving more than a fair proportion of bad characters. He thought that there ought to be an allotted number of bad characters for each regiment, and that no regiment should have more than a certain number. At present, there was a discretionary power under the clause to transfer any number of these men.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that regulations of that minuteness could not be laid down in an Act of Parliament. It would be impossible to say in an Act how many bad characters should be sent to any regiment. He might, however, say that he did not think that this clause would apply to a man who was a bad character. It was well known that there were a number of high-spirited young men who got into trouble from some cause or other in one regiment. They were now sentenced to imprisonment; and the object of this clause was to give them a fresh chance, without compelling them to pass their time in prison. A man guilty of a serious offence, or of very disgraceful conduct, would not be relieved from his sentence under this clause. For the number of these men who should be transferred to any regiment he could not possibly say, as it was a matter which must be left to the discretion of the authorities. At the same time, he might assure the hon. and gallant Member (Major O’Beirne) that there would not be sent to any regiment any such numbers as would cause disgrace to the corps.

COLONEL ALEXANDER thought that the limit at which this option of serving abroad was to be given was somewhat arbitrary. The clause fixed it at imprisonment for a term of four months; but sometimes men got one month, and sometimes four, for the same offence, at the discretion of the officers composing the court martial.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that four months had been fixed as the term, because it seemed to him to be practically the limit for minor offences. A court martial generally sentenced to four months for some small insubordination.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, the clause was one which would give great satisfaction to officers and men in the Army. He might claim some share in it, as he was instrumental in bringing the subject into notice; and it was his suggestion that it would be better to transfer a man for foreign service than to imprison him.

MR. PARNELL wished to point out that what had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), who, having delivered his shot, had left the House, was not the question. These sub-sections were really in the nature of fresh clauses, although they had been put into one large clause. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim (Major O’Beirne) had moved an Amendment to strike out the whole of sub-section 7, which included both sub-sections a and b. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had admitted that it was only when matters were debated that they could be properly understood; and up till ten minutes ago they had not been discussing the effect of this sub-section at all, and he did think it rather unreasonable to ask them to go on with the discussion of a sub-section of this character at that late hour. Some of these sub-sections involved entirely fresh matter. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer of his promise of a few days ago, in which he said that he had no objection to any fair discussion of the principle of the different clauses, and that he was ready to consider any amendment of such clauses. When the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim had been disposed of, they would meet several other important Amendments. He ventured to say that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had admitted the soundness of his views upon sub-section b, by agreeing to make some modification in the clause. He desired the right hon. and gallant Gentleman now to go further; he wished to mitigate the punishment of imprisonment upon those high-spirited soldiers they had heard of, where their offences were not of a nature discreditable to the military character. It was all very well for the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to wish to mitigate their punishment; but it ought to be left at the option of the prisoners. If the military authorities thought it desirable that soldiers should be given an opportunity of going abroad in order to avoid imprisonment, let this be done. This sub-section, instead of being permissive, was imperative, upon a soldier who had been convicted, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment, to go abroad. A man might have enlisted in order to serve a short time in the Army, and then to enter the Reserve. He thought he had said sufficient to show that these were new questions which they were approaching, and that they should not be expected to enter upon them at 1 o'clock in the morning.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that there were two classes of men in the Service; there were short-service men and long-service men. It was a very fair and merciful thing to allow a man, who had enlisted for a long period of service, to go upon foreign service, in commutation of his punishment; but, with regard to the short-service man, to send him on foreign service was very much to increase his punishment. He spoke without the slightest desire to have the consideration of this clause postponed; but he felt quite sure that if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War took further time to consider the matter, he would find that he could easily introduce two or three Amendments which would satisfy the opponents of the clause. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had himself said that it was by objections being raised that the real effect of the clause became apparent. He fully agreed, not only with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, but with the hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel Arbuthnot), that this was a most excellent clause; but its working ought to be limited in some way. A great part of their objection would be removed, if an undertaking were given by the Government to take into consideration the question they had ventured to raise as to the difference between the long and short service men, and the great increase in the hardship upon men who had not intended to spend a long period of their lives abroad. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consent to make some alteration in these matters upon Report, he (Mr. O'Donnell) did not think it would be asking too much of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to request him to withdraw his opposition to the clause.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he should not like to make any promise, as he might not be able to carry it out. At the same time, he would consider the matters to which allusion had been made between then and the Report.

MR. PARNELL did not think that they would be right in allowing that clause to pass at that hour of the morning, as they would have to assemble at 2 o'clock again that afternoon. He would urge upon the Government to consider these matters. In addition to what the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had pointed out, he must draw attention to the fact that sub-section 8 was very roughly drawn, and that it gave power to transfer deserters to any corps. He thought the difficulty might be met by a slight alteration, and he hoped that the matter would be reconsidered on the Report.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he would endeavour to make some alteration, if the hon. Member would give him any suggestion on the matter. He would point out to him, however, that sub-section 8 was not penal.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Major O'Beirne), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Colonel Stanley) agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL proposed to alter the period of imprisonment, under which a man was liable to foreign service from four months to six months.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no objection to the alteration; but he thought that the practical effect of it would be to leave more men in prison. It might be best to leave the clause as it stood.

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL said, that before the clause was passed, he wished to say that he thought they were making a very great mistake in passing it then. It had been practically passed without discussion, when it was really as important a clause as the provost marshal clause. He did not think a fair opportunity for discussing the clause had been given.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

VOLUNTEER CORPS (IRELAND) (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 200.]

(Mr O'Clery, Major Nolan, Lord Francis Conyngham, Major O'Beirne.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON) trusted that the hon. Member for Wexford (MR. O'Clery) would report Progress, in conformity with an undertaking which he had given.

MR. O'CLERY said, he was not aware that he had given any such undertaking;

but as the right hon. and learned Gentleman had a distinct understanding on the matter he felt himself bound by it, and would, if desired, move to report Progress, and, more especially, if there were any Amendments to discuss.

MR. PARNELL said, that the Bill had been under the consideration of the Government for some time, and had been re-committed for the purpose of having alterations made in it, in accordance with the desire of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. The Secretary of State for War and the Government had had the matter before them for six or seven weeks, and he did not see any reason for postponing the Committee then.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that there is no Question before the Committee. The Question is, that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON) said, that the hon. Member for Wexford (MR. O'Clery) had informed him (MR. Gibson) that he would not fail to report Progress immediately that the Bill went into Committee. He had no objection himself to the Bill being taken then; but he knew that many hon. Members who wished to consider the Bill in its present stage, and move Amendments, had left the House. Further than that, the Bill had only been distributed that morning.

MAJOR NOLAN suggested that the Bill should go through Committee then, on an understanding being given by the hon. Member in charge of the Bill (MR. O'Clery) that there should be liberty to bring forward any Amendment on the Report.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that this Bill would be very useful to the country in every way, and he trusted that it would be allowed to pass.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the discussion was irregular on the Question that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

MR. DE LA POER BERESFORD stated that he took as much interest as everyone else in the Bill; but he did not think it should be considered then. He begged to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. De La Poer Beresford.)

MR. STACPOOLE said, that the Bill could be re-considered on Report. The Bill was much looked for in Ireland, and he hoped that it would be allowed to go through Committee then.

MR. O'CLERY said, that, though personally anxious to have the Bill proceeded with, he had no distinct recollection of the understanding stated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson); but he was willing to accept his recollection of it. But as several hon. Members were desirous of going on with the Bill he would ask him to re-consider the matter, and allow them to go through Committee.

MR. CALLAN said, that the opposition to this Bill was of the nature of obstruction on the part of one hon. Member supporting the Government. The 1st section of the Bill was very simple, and he could see no objection to its passing. He trusted that the Government would restrain the eagerness of their supporters in the cause of obstruction to Public Business, and allow them to proceed. The Bill was approved of by the Government, and he would appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to withdraw his objection to the Bill going through Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that he was not aware of the understanding which it had been stated had been come to, nor in fact had he, until a moment ago, had any idea that the Bill would be brought on that night; but he thought there was a good deal to be said with regard to it not being taken at that hour. Of course, it would be quite impossible to proceed, if they arrived at any contested matter. Perhaps there would be no objection to take so much of the Bill as was unopposed, and then, if at any point objection was taken, to move to report Progress.

MR. DE LA POER BERESFORD wished to make some explanation as to what had fallen from an hon. Member (Mr. Callan) on the other side of the House. He had remained in the House for the purpose of preventing this Bill going through Committee. There were many things in the Bill which he objected to, and many provisions required very careful discussion.

MR. PARNELL thought that, rather than cause any unpleasantness between Irish Members on either side of the House, it would be better to report Progress then, and to take the Bill at an early day.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked that Progress might not then be reported, but that they might go on with the Bill so far as there was no opposition. He did not wish to detain the House by saying he considered that there was a very good feeling on both sides of the House with regard to the Bill, and that it was a very popular measure. The Bill dealt with a matter concerning a large number of Her Majesty's subjects, and it was hardly reasonable to require this postponement.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that he had an Amendment to the Bill; but if the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would agree to report Progress after passing the 1st clause he should be content.

MR. O'CLERY agreed that Progress should be reported after passing the 1st clause.

LORD FRANCIS CONYNGHAM could not understand why there should be any opposition to one clause of the Bill being passed. The Bill had been before the House some time. He had the honour to have his name on the back of the Bill, and he could not see why the 1st clause should not be passed before they reported Progress.

Motion negatived.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

CHARITY (EXPENSES AND ACCOUNTS) BILL.

On Motion of Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, Bill to provide for the contribution by Charities towards the expenses of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, and to make further provision respecting the Accounts of Charities, ordered to be brought in by Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 221.]

INDUSTRIAL ENTERPRISE (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. P. J. SMYTH, Bill for the establishment of an Irish Tribunal with functions similar to those now exercised by Committees of Parliament with reference to Irish undertakings of an Industrial character, ordered to be brought in by Mr. P. J. SMYTH, Mr. JOSEPH COWEN, Colonel KING-HARMAN, and The O'DONOGHUE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 222.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 27th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
 Customs and Inland Revenue*; Civil Procedure Acts Repeal* (132).
Second Reading—Consolidated Fund (No. 4)*.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ARMENIA.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to call attention to the present condition of the Armenian people, in reference to the 61st Article of the Treaty of Berlin, and to move an Address, said, that 12 months had nearly elapsed since a discussion had arisen on the subject in that House—a discussion which was introduced by his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury), whose name had, throughout the whole of his life, been associated with every principle of humanity and consideration for others. It was a discussion which excited a good deal of attention, and provoked from all sides of the House an expression of sympathy with the Armenian population in the circumstances in which they were placed. The Armenians, whether regarded as a nation or a race, were fully entitled to great sympathy indeed, for they possessed an intelligence which was far beyond the average, and had, in spite of numberless difficulties, developed themselves in education and general knowledge, and had shown a power of acting for themselves. Among the Eastern populations they deserved to rank next to, if they were not exactly on the same level with, the Greeks and Jews. When their case was brought before their Lordships on the occasion to which he referred, his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs expressed his cordial sympathy with those people, and his full determination to do everything in his power to assist them in the Congress that was then approaching. It would be well, perhaps, before proceeding further, that he should recall to their Lordships' attention the facts in connection with the subject of the past year. He wished, in the first place, to say that any observations which he might make would have reference to the Armenians, so far as he could distinguish them in Asia Minor, and not in Europe; and, in the next place, that he had no desire to state anything of a needlessly controversial character, knowing, as he did, that the opinions of their Lordships were divided on some points. The first point he desired to call attention to was an Article in the Treaty of San Stefano, concluded between Russia and the Porte. He referred to the 16th Article of that Treaty, which provided that, as the evacuation by the Russian troops of territory occupied by them in Armenia which was to be restored to Turkey might give rise to conflicts and complications detrimental to good relations, the Porte engaged to carry into effect, without further delay, the improvements and reforms that were demanded by local requirements in the Provinces inhabited by the Armenians, and should agree to afford them protection against the Circassians and Kurds. The next point to which he desired to direct attention was the fact that, as he had already stated, the greatest sympathy with the Armenians was expressed in the previous discussion in their Lordships' House, and that, in a subsequent despatch, the Foreign Secretary, after having joined in that expression of sympathy, gave an additional assurance in the matter. The next step was the assembling of the Congress at Berlin; and their Lordships would find that the case of the Armenians occupied the attention of the Congress on no less than three separate occasions, when the same sympathy was expressed for them as had been expressed by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his despatches. The result was the insertion in the Treaty of Berlin of the Article which had led to his giving the Notice which appeared on the Paper in his name. That Article was a very important one. It guaranteed, in the first place, that there should be such reforms for the Armenians as were demanded by local requirements; and, secondly, that those reforms should be introduced immediately. It also provided that the guarantee should apply to the Armenians all over the Turkish Empire in all the Provinces inhabited by Armenians—it guaranteed their security and protection against the Circassians and Kurds; and, lastly, it was guaranteed that the Porte should periodically make known the steps which it had taken to carry out these reforms to the Powers, who would superintend their application. It would be observed that there was a great difference between the Article and that which had been agreed to between Russia and Turkey and inserted in the Treaty of San Stefano. In accordance with the Article in the Treaty of San Stefano, the Armenians in whose case the reforms were to be carried out were confined geographically to Armenia proper; while, according to the 61st Article of the Treaty of Berlin, they were to be extended, not to Armenians living in any one particular district or direction, but wherever they might be all over the Empire. That, he thought, was a fair and reasonable construction of the two Articles. Their Lordships would also see that, by the 61st Article of the Treaty, there was a double duty laid down—first, that the Porte should make the reforms; and, secondly, that the superintending Powers should insist on their application. This duty of insisting on these reforms being carried out applied not merely to this country, but to all the superintending Powers. If any one of the superintending Powers failed to look after the execution of the guarantee, the obligation and right to do so in the case of the others would in no degree be removed. In other words, if we failed to carry out our part of the transaction, the right of Russia, would, unquestionably, still exist. But Her Majesty's Government had, over and above that, entered into a special Convention with Turkey, which had three objects. If Russia should hereafter encroach on Turkish territory in Asia, we undertook to protect her; that, in consideration of that undertaking on our part, Turkey should undertake to carry out reforms for the benefit of her Christian populations in Asia, among which the Armenians were clearly included; while the power was also claimed for this country, in a despatch of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, dated 8th of August, to "insist," as it was said, on the reforms being made. The bond was sealed by the cession to us of the Island of Cyprus. Such, then, was the groundwork for what he had to say on the subject, and the facts, so far as they were known last year. He would now proceed to consider how the pledges to which he had referred had been redeemed by those who were parties to them—pledges which were based, first, on an European Treaty; secondly, on a special Treaty with the country; and which, thirdly, had been cemented by assurances given on both sides—by Her Majesty's Government on the one side, and by the Turkish Government on the other. What was the state of the Armenian population now, as compared with what it was when those pledges were given? What progress had been made in the direction of the promised reforms? His noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had very clearly stated, in the despatch which he had just mentioned, the causes of the sufferings of the Armenian subjects of Turkey; and Earl Russell had, some 10 or 12 years ago, written a despatch which contained similar advice on the subject. Those sufferings might be referred to three heads; the police, the judiciary, and the fiscal system. Their Lordships knew what police in Asia Minor meant. There were either no police at all, or they were the agents of corruption, extortion, and oppression. The men who were employed as police received bribes in lieu of wages; and the natural consequences followed that criminals were allowed to escape from justice by the payment of bribes, and that innocent men were left to languish in prison unless they did the same thing. Nothing, he might add, could be more forcibly described than the shocking state of the prisons had been by Sir Henry Layard. Recruits were forced into the Army, and were permitted to go back to their homes only on the payment of money. A curious and instructive case was stated by a writer in a periodical who had a perfect knowledge of the subject, of a certain police officer in the Turkish service, whose salary was £100 a-year, but who, at the end of 14 years' service, found himself able to retire with a capital of £50,000. All knew that professional witnesses were to be had upon the payment of money. The system of false evidence carried on in Turkish Courts was so classified and graduated that aged men with white beards commanded a considerably higher rate of payment than young and less experienced men. Christian evidence was not received. He was quite aware that Codes had, in past years, been drawn up, and numerous proclamations issued, all affirming the principle that Christian evidence should not be excluded from the Turkish Courts; but still, as a matter of fact, the law was over and over again disregarded, and in some places entirely set aside. The fiscal system was a cause of unmitigated oppression, exaction, tyranny, and extortion. There were cases where the valuation of land was so flagrantly unequal, as between Mahomedan and Christian, that where a property had been divided, the portion assigned to the former was assessed at 500 piastres, that of the latter was assessed at 5,000 piastres. As regarded the police, the Turkish Government had represented that they had no money to pay it. With reference to Judges, they ultimately suggested the appointment of Inspectors; but he doubted whether a single Inspector had been appointed. With respect to the fiscal system, they said it was impossible hastily to make the changes desired, and they must be made with deliberation. For his part, he feared these reforms would be postponed until the Greek Kalends. His noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in his reply, accepted the plea of delay on the part of the Turkish Government. That was the first attempt on the part of Her Majesty's Government to secure the reforms which Turkey had pledged herself to carry out, and which Her Majesty's Government had pledged themselves to insist upon. He had always maintained that it was impossible to get Turkey to carry out these reforms, and he was all the more satisfied of that as time went on. With regard to the Armenians in Asia Minor, he had a document, no doubt well known at the Foreign Office, which contained a list of the miseries, exactions, and oppressions which had been inflicted upon that people between the months of November last and January. So far as it went, it was an official document; it was drawn up by the Armenian Patriarch—and he begged their Lordships to remember that the Armenian Patriarch had an official position and was recognized by the Porte. He would not weary their Lordships by going much into detail; but there were a few cases described in the document in question to which he would refer. As to the people in the district of Moush, their condition was stated to be worse since the war—villages destroyed, convents sacked—one convent sacked four times with all the usual horrors—every sort of oppression by Kurds, by police, and by all officials, sale of justice, and crushing taxation. As to Bitlis, in numberless villages the Kurds had carried off the grain and cattle, wounding and outraging and sometimes killing the Armenian peasants. In Divrig, the Armenians were ill-treated, insulted, and wounded. In Zeitoum, the people were crushed with taxes, the chief inhabitants were summoned to discuss grievances and then thrown into prison. In Van, the Armenian quarter was set on fire, and 50,000 Armenians were preparing to emigrate to Russia and Persia. It had been asserted, on evidence which he believed to be correct, that the taxes levied in one district nearest to our new acquisition southwards had increased since the period before the war from 25,000 piastres to 580,000. That was in the district of Saitchar. Some 200 Armenians seemed to have threatened opposition, and they were taken with arms in their possession, and committed to prison, where about 16 died. The remainder were released through the protest and representations of Mr. Mallet, who was acting for our Ambassador to the Turkish Government. A Commission was sent, and the first thing it did was to deprive these people of their arms, and leave them in the hands of their oppressors. Another cause of oppression was this. As their Lordships knew, the Turkish Exchequer, in its almost bankrupt state, had issued a great deal of paper money. A large portion of this money found its way into the hands of the Armenians, who were small traders and the bankers of the East; and it did seem to him a most flagrant act on the part of the Turkish Government to issue this paper money, and then refuse the payment of taxes in this money. A short time since the Armenian Patriarch resigned his office in despair. He was told that the resignation was not accepted by the Turkish Government. He then appointed a Vicar to act for him; but the Vicar, he believed, had never been recognized. The Armenian Patriarch, therefore, was in a state of suspended animation. The Turkish Government, as usual, issued a Commission; but the Patriarch objected to it, because there was not a single Armenian or Christian upon it. It appeared that during the last month or so there were Commissions being issued everywhere; but on those Commissions Turks alone were appointed, or Christians of so inferior a grade that they exercised no influence. These Commissions, so far as good purposes were concerned, were useless. They were ridiculed in the country, and they acted as blinds for positive oppression. He understood that the Patriarch had protested, not merely to the Porte, but to all the Powers which were parties to the Treaty of Berlin. If that protest was in the hands of his noble Friend, he hoped it would be included in the Papers to be produced. What were the wishes of the Armenian people? Were they unreasonable? They had over and over again disclaimed, through their organs and representatives, any desire for political independence. Their claims were claims in regard to which the humblest man in England would think he was deeply wronged if the slightest doubt was thrown upon them. A denial of those claims in this country would turn men's blood into fire. The claims of the Armenians were for equality in the eyes of the law—equality in conscience, in religion, and in taxation; and they demanded protection from systematic plunder and oppression. They asked for security for their property, for the lives of men, and the honour of women. Lastly, they urged—and here they had the concurrence of his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary—very strongly the appointment of Christian Governors. There could be no real redress until Christian Governors were appointed, and until they obtained the presence of Europeans in the different civil and military organizations, such as the police, judicial and other systems, whether they acted as Inspectors, Judges, Officers, or Consuls. Only then could they obtain that tranquillity which was desired. Lord Clarendon and Lord Russell had written in the same strain on the subject. At the end of the Crimean War, Lord Clarendon, writing to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, said—

The Earl of Carnarvon

“Her Majesty's Government know by experience the utter inutility of appealing on such matters to the Porte; but the Turkish Government should be made aware that if this systematic misgovernment and persecution of Christians, and violations of engagements continue, it will be impossible to arrest the progress of the opinion which is now manifesting itself that Mahomedan rule is incompatible with civilization and humanity, and can no longer be endured.”

That was the language of one of the coolest and wisest Foreign Secretaries they had had for many years. Four years afterwards, Lord John Russell wrote in a similar strain to Sir Henry Bulwer, and on the 8th of August, 1878, Lord Salisbury wrote to Sir Henry Layard—

“The immediate necessity of Asiatic Turkey is for the simplest form of order and good government; for such security from rapine, whether lawless or legal, that industry may flourish, and population may cease to decline. With this object in view, it appears to Her Majesty's Government that the subjects which most urgently require attention are the maintenance of order, the administration of justice, and the collection of the revenue.”

That which existed in 1856, in 1860, in 1872, 1874, and 1878, exists now—with only this addition—that our Government had given warnings in more solemn language—that the national policy had been pledged to see that the warnings given were obeyed. In conclusion, he came to this disagreeable question—What was the net result, after one year's experience of the 1st Article of the Treaty of Berlin? He would not say that it was simply a case of large promise and scant performance. In the present state of the population, there was a painful contrast between the Armenians on the Turkish side of the border and the Armenians on the Russian side. On the one side there was a debasing and grinding system, and on the Russian side, at all events, there was a sense of contentment. He thought this a dangerous state of things. He was afraid there was little feeling of gratitude to this country, either on the part of the Christian or the Mahomedan population of whom he had been speaking—on the part of the Christians, because they saw no performance of our promises, and on the part of the Mahomedans, because of our constant but ineffectual interference. The late Lord Aberdeen had said that it was only by actual and irresistible pressure that the Turkish Government would ever attempt to make reforms, and this still held good. He moved for the production of the Correspondence to which his Notice referred.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Correspondence respecting the 61st Article of the Treaty of Berlin, in respect of the Armenian people.—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

LORD HAMMOND said, that the 61st Article of the Treaty of Berlin was a reproduction of the concluding stipulation of the 16th Article of the Treaty of San Stefano; but the latter contained important words which were omitted in the former Treaty, and which limited the obligations of the 16th Article to the Province of Erzeroum or Armenia; while the Article of the Treaty of Berlin extended the Guarantee of the Powers, and the protection to be given, to all Provinces where there was an Armenian population. Now, in point of fact, there was no nation that could be called the Armenian nation. Armenia ceased to be a nation in 1393. But, though the nation no longer existed, there still existed an Armenian race, and Armenians dwelt in every part and city of the Turkish dominions in Asia Minor; and, therefore, the Treaty of Berlin gave to Russia and all the Powers a right to interfere in all parts of Asiatic Turkey. In dealing with the question of the Armenians, they must consider the 1st Article of the Treaty of the 4th June, 1878. The Government, in a despatch of August 8, pointed out certain specific reforms, and in a despatch of December it accepted as generally satisfactory the assurance received from the Porte in reply; and he would ask the noble Marquess whether those assurances had been carried into effect by the Porte? Much might be done by establishing an effective gendarmerie, and by modifications in the system of tithe-farming, by which present evils should be corrected, without driving those who had to pay the tithes into the hands of the usurers. It seemed to him that the establishment of a roving judicial inspectorate, as recommended by the Porte, was preferable to the appointment of foreign Judges, and that the system which had been adopted in India, in regard to the expenses for the entertainment of public officers, would be beneficial in Asia Minor. But, after all, it seemed to him that however anxious they might be for the introduction of reforms by the Porte, they must not be unreasonable, and expect that they could be generally and immediately put into execution. It was not easy, after the existence of evils of long standing in any country, to remove them altogether and at once. It was suggested by the Porte that, at first, any reforms should be applied to a limited area; and that was well worthy of consideration, as any new system must be tentative in the first instance, and might require alteration. Such alteration could be made more easily within a limited area; and when the new system was found to work well it could be applied to the whole country. He wished to ask the noble Marquess whether he could lay before the House the Treaty concluded between Turkey and Russia within the last few months? It might be inexpedient to lay before them the comments by the Government or by the Ambassador; but it would be a great convenience to the public to know what the clauses of the Treaty were, especially as regarded those which bore on the pecuniary interests of individuals in this country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, in all that was said by my noble Friend, when expressing his sympathy with the sufferings of the Armenian people, or, indeed, the sufferings of any of those who inhabit the Turkish Provinces of Asia Minor—in all that he said in indignation against the Government which undoubtedly prevails there, I certainly should not have found anything to differ from. But, while expressing my concurrence with his compassionate views, and with the interest which he very naturally takes in a people whose present qualities and whose past history entitles them to sympathy, I must demur to the political complexion which he seemed to me to give to the subject. To judge from his tone—to judge from the way in which he flung these various abuses at the head of Her Majesty's Government, one would have fancied that he was talking of some place which was under the dominion of the Crown; that he was speaking of Ireland, or of India, or of some other place for whose good government the Ministers of Great Britain are responsible. It is undoubtedly true that on two occasions we have made efforts, by means of formal stipulations, to obtain for the inhabitants of Asia Minor a greater share of the blessings of tranquillity, of good government, and of prosperity; and we have given to those stipulations on the part of the Porte all the formality that we were able to give. But I entirely deny the doctrine that because we made those efforts, and because we were successful—whatever that success may have been worth—we are to be treated as responsible for every case of abuse and misgovernment which the correspondents of my noble Friend may have been able to produce to him. My noble Friend complained, as if it were our fault, that the Turkish Government had issued paper money; he complained that tithe-farming still existed; he complained that sufficient salaries were not given to the Judges and other judicial functionaries; and he complained—I think, somewhat inconsistently—of the severity of the taxation out of which all increased payments must come. He complained that Commissions were not sent, and he complained that they were sent; and that on those Commissions we had not taken care that the persons appointed were of the rank that the Armenian Patriarch would desire. I entirely repudiate all these responsibilities. We have done our best by the stipulations that we were able to obtain. We have done precisely what was done by the Ministry which was in Office at the time of the Crimean War. We have inserted in our Treaty terms and engagements which, in the short interval that has elapsed, we have endeavoured by diplomatic pressure to make a reality. How far the Ministry that succeeded to Office after the Crimean War are justified in taking the same credit to themselves is a matter into which it might not be pleasant to inquire. What I wish to insist upon, my Lords, is this—that even if the reform of all these abuses were possible—even if it were possible to make any substantial and palpable impression upon them within the brief time that has elapsed—there is no special responsibility upon Her Majesty's Government to see to them, certainly, as far as the Armenian people are concerned. All the Powers of Europe equally signed the 61st Article of the Berlin Treaty, and reserved to themselves an equal right to receive from the Porte an account of what was being done. The truth is that there was evidently lying at the bottom of my noble Friend's complaints the idea that we have incurred a responsibility on a very different ground. The idea that we could incur responsibility, because we had obtained certain stipulations, is in itself absurd. But what my noble Friend meant, when he said that we had attempted the impossible—what he meant, when he referred to the condition of the Russian Armenians over the border, was this—that we have taken an active part in a policy of which the object is to rescue those countries from the domination of Russia; and what he would imply is, that the domination of Russia is infinitely preferable to that under which they are now.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had never used words to that effect.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I certainly understood my noble Friend to say that there was contentment over the border, although I am not aware of any proof of that statement having been brought forward. Whether there is contentment in different parts of the Russian Empire is, perhaps, a matter which it might not be convenient for me to discuss. But while I repudiate the obligations to which I have referred, and maintain that the utmost that we can do is to urge upon every suitable opportunity, with all the energy we can, that the promises which the Porte has given should be fulfilled, I still think that hard measure is dealt out to the Porte, when the expectation is entertained that a sudden reform of all these evils can be effected. Why, what was the nature of the evils which my noble Friend dwelt upon? One matter upon which he was most eloquent was the perjured character of the witnesses who appear in the Law Courts. By what possible contrivance—I will not say by what diplomacy—could the most despotic, the most earnest Government which could possibly be imagined at Constantinople, bring any effective cure to such an evil as that? And when this is brought forward as though it were a special inheritance of the Turkish Government, and as though there existed no other part of the world where witnesses may be hired at pleasure in order to testify to anything which the parties may desire to have proved, I hardly think my noble Friend has followed with sufficient care the contemporary history of some of the Eastern Dependencies of the British Crown. I have heard similar complaints in regard to various parts of India. How far they are true I will not venture to say; but that such a reproach has been constantly levelled at witnesses in parts of India, as well as in Turkey, your Lordships are perfectly aware. It is one of those things which it is entirely out of the power of any Government or diplomacy to cure, and I think the reference to it in the speech of my noble Friend was out of place. Well, then, my noble Friend dwelt a good deal upon the oppression which the Turks—not the Turkish Government, but the Turkish Mahomedan population—were prone to exercise upon their Christian fellow-subjects. It is a melancholy truth that this should be so; but is it a thing which any Government can cure, much more that any diplomacy can cure? These things are certainly the evil inheritance of centuries—they are the traditions of the people, and are rooted in their hearts; and if they are to be cured, assuredly it is not by a cure that can come from politicians or diplomatists. In all the consideration that one can give to the difficult question of reforms in Turkey, one hack quotation comes up constantly to the mind—“Quid leges sine moribus?” It is perfectly useless to multiply Codes or diplomatic promises, if you expect that by them you can alter the nature or the temper of a people. But, my Lords, my noble Friend also alluded—I thought with great bitterness—to the maintenance of the tithe-farming system in Turkey. Well, we all know that the system is a great abuse; but we also know that it has been repeatedly denounced. Are the Turks the only people who maintain the system to which so much objection has been taken? Modern Greece, which has been free for 50 years, has not yet been able to abolish the system of tithe-farming. When it fell to my lot to consider the changes which should be introduced in the government of Cyprus, I was, like other persons, trained in Indian traditions, in favour of trying the Indian system, and Sir Garnet Wolseley made great efforts of persuasion in that direction; but I found our course met by the protests of persons who knew the country well. We found that there was great danger in an inelastic system of settlement, owing to the changeableness of the Eastern climate—where there is drought one year and plenty the next. We were in this difficulty; we must either put the settlement far too low to meet the just claims upon the revenue in years of plenty, or so high as to be oppressive in years of drought. I do not say, however, that my noble Friend has not brought forward very forcible reasons for the abolition of the system in question. I believe it ought to be abolished; but this I say, its abolition must be attended with very great difficulty. It cannot be effected by the stroke of the pen, or in a single year. There is one reform which, as I have stated over and over again in your Lordships' House, ought to be introduced, and that is the creation of a strong force of gendarmes for the maintenance of order, for the protection, not for the oppression, of the people. That, I believe, lies at the root of every reform in the Turkish Empire. With reference to the imputations of bribery which have been so freely made, I believe they refer much more to the past than to the present. I do not deny that these things exist; but I believe that of late public opinion, contact with Europe, and the dread of exposure, have had a salutary effect upon Turkey, as they have in every other part of the world. What really is the great evil at the present time is the utter disorganization of society in many parts of Asia Minor, owing to the want of sufficient force to restrain the predatory habits of the nomadic tribes—and that fact ought to be borne in mind. It has been pointed out that the Porte has not kept all its promises; and that is true; and it is a fact which will justify us in employing every diplomatic opportunity in our power with a view to having those promises carried into effect. But the Porte has one simple answer, which in every part of the world has been always held to be conclusive—it cannot spend money which it has not got to spend. Where there is no money, not only Kings, but diplomatists, lose their rights. When that happy time comes that political pressure can have its due effect—when the wounds of a cruel war are healed—when Armies can be disbanded and expenditure reduced—when men can be enabled to go back to their fields, and produce again those crops from which only, after all, the Treasury can be supplied—when the blessings of peace shall have taken the place of the horrors of war—then the period will have arrived when the reforms which we all desire to see carried out can be introduced. You tell us that it ought to be done sooner. I tell you that a war, so terribly disastrous as the late war has been to Turkey, must be succeeded by a time of disorganization, of weakness, of inability to carry out reforms—of evils, which are not peculiar to Asia Minor. I remember reading lately, in reference to Asia Minor, an article in which it was said that there was a famine in many parts of the Empire, but that the real famine was a famine of men. Men were drawn from all parts of the Empire to defend its frontiers; and, surely, no one can blame the Turkish Government for having had recourse to such a measure—no one can be surprised that a considerable time must elapse before those terrible wounds are closed. I have, my Lords, insisted on those circumstances, in order to bring before you the injustice of expecting from a prostrate, half-ruined, distracted Empire such as Turkey is at the close of a war in which she has been so terribly defeated—the injustice of expecting from her, in her circumstances, the activity which it would be a good deal to require of a Christian and civilized country in the height of its prosperity. I do not at all allude to them for the purpose of insinuating that we should not be eager to do our utmost to get rid of misgovernment, or that our earnestness in pressing upon the Porte the necessity of reforms should be at all abated. My noble Friend has mentioned one case which shows that our diplomacy has not been altogether idle. He mentioned the case of Zeitoun, in which great efforts have been made to remedy the evils that are going on. With respect to Armenia itself there has been a Commission issued, and it is sitting to inquire into the reforms to be introduced. It is composed of statesmen not inferior to the average of the statesmen of the Turkish Empire—but it does not go fast; nothing Turkish I ever knew did go fast; and that is one of the qualities of the people which I am afraid no politics and no diplomacy will change. But the Commission has been issued, and is proceeding to do its work. My noble Friend has said that there is no Christian upon it; but he is wrong in that, as there is one Christian on it—an Armenian—and I do not believe that these Commissioners are in any way inferior to the average run of the statesmen from whom they have been chosen.

We have taken some precautions—of course, they have not begun to bear fruit yet—to enable our pressure to act upon the Turkish Government with more effect. We have improved machinery; our Consular staff in Asia Minor has been considerably increased, and we shall be able to bring to the knowledge of the Turkish Government abuses that exist and of which it is not fully aware, and so help to bring about a more rapid and effectual remedy. I only wish to add this—that, while in all our endeavours to obtain those reforms we uphold, and shall continue to uphold, the Sovereignty of the Sultan as the centre and symbol of the only authority that exists or can exist in the Turkish Empire, I must, on the other hand, say that we have always found in the present Sultan a most earnest desire to wipe out those abuses which are a reproach to his Government—a desire which, as far as I can judge from the study of written documents, I believe to be absolutely and genuinely sincere; and that such a belief is also entertained by Sir Henry Layard is well known to your Lordships. I can only, my Lords, conclude as I began. I repudiate any responsibility for the acts of the Turkish Government. It is the Turkish Government, not the English, which is bound to introduce reforms. But, while I repudiate that responsibility on the ground of any written stipulations, I do not repudiate the higher responsibility which comes from the consideration of policy and duty. We feel the duty earnestly; I believe we have acted up to it steadily; I believe we shall do our utmost to act up to it in the future, and do all that diplomacy can to abate the existing evils and to produce those salutary changes by which alone the Turkish Empire can be maintained.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, the noble Marquess repudiated all responsibility for the acts of Turkey in Asia Minor. This seemed a most remarkable doctrine, when they considered the Treaty of Berlin and the Convention with Turkey. As he understood, the object of the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) in bringing forward this Motion was to show that, to a considerable extent, England had become responsible for the good government of Asia Minor; while the noble Marquess limited their responsibility to diplomatic action, and said they had done their best to obtain the performance of the promises made by the Porte.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said it would be no use to apply diplomatic action in the hope of curing what was inherent in the nature of the people.

THE EARL OF MORLEY had been much surprised at the contrast between the speech they had just heard from the noble Marquess and his vigorous despatch of the 8th of August last year, which embodied a most comprehensive scheme of reform for the Christian subjects of the Porte. Now, what were our responsibilities towards Armenia? The Armenians had a distinct claim upon this country in two distinct documents—the Treaty of Berlin and the Convention with Turkey—we had made ourselves responsible for the good government of Armenia. The expressions used in the Treaty of Berlin were that—and it gave a guarantee for their security against the incursions of the Kurds and the Circassians; and it further promised “periodically to make known the steps taken to secure those results” to the Powers signing the Treaty. He would like to ask the noble Marquess the definition of two terms; what did the words “without delay” mean? A year had passed since the signature of the Treaty; but were we to wait for another year or so, or to look forward to a still more distant future, when the finances of the Porte were in a satisfactory condition, before any attempt was made on the part of the Porte to redeem its promises? Then, again, he desired to know the meaning of the word “periodically;” and, whether, in accordance with its undertaking, the Porte had given the noble Marquess any account of its efforts in the direction of reform, and, if not, whether any of the Powers had taken action in consequence of the abandonment of those efforts. In common with other Powers, we had taken responsibility on ourselves, and, so far, there was a fairly exact parallel between the existing Government and that which succeeded the signature of the Treaty of Paris; but the celebrated Anglo-Turkish Convention, on which the noble Marquess's speech had thrown so much cold water, made it impossible to trace a further resemblance. We were solely responsible, according to that document, of which the words were as explicit as possible. The fact was, the Government had taken a responsibility upon themselves which they now found it impossible to carry out. What view did the noble Marquess take of the Treaty and Convention? Were they merely formalities? Now, there were four points to which the noble Marquess had called the attention of the Porte—and the first of these was the importance of a well-officered gendarmerie. The Porte, however, had replied that there was no money available for the purpose—an answer not likely to raise unduly the hopes of the population of Asia Minor. Next, the noble Marquess had urged the desirability of creating Central Tribunals, under the direction of European lawyers; and had been answered that such a change would interfere with the Sovereign rights of the Porte, and that, moreover, no Europeans understood the Turkish vernacular. The third recommendation of the noble Marquess was that the collection of the revenue should be reformed, and that the system of tithe should be abolished. To this demand a simple Non possumus had been returned. The despatch concluded with the admirable advice that the tenure of office by the Governors should be for a fixed period, and during good behaviour; and the Porte thereupon enlarged on the difficulty, not to say the impossibility, of finding competent and upright functionaries. It came to this, then—that when the noble Marquess insisted on four cardinal points of reform, the Porte merely replied that it had neither money nor upright functionaries; and that at present was the sole result, as far as Armenia was concerned, of the Treaty of Berlin and the Anglo-Turkish Convention. It seemed to him that the responsibilities we had undertaken were very grave, and that we had accepted them under a miscalculation of the means at our disposal; but, at least, they were solid and still existing engagements. It was surely not too much for the noble Earl, all the circumstances considered, to ask for evidence of the desire of the Porte to fulfil its promises. The fact was that, after all the promises that had been made, after all they had heard about "peace with honour," the whole arrangement had turned out no better than a sheet of waste paper.

“The Porte agreed to carry out without delay the improvements and reforms demanded by local requirements in the Provinces inhabited by the Armenians;”

The Earl of Morley

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl the Prime Minister told us last week, with some pathos, as an excuse for your Lordships' House not meeting before 4 o'clock, that some difficulty had more than once been experienced in getting his younger followers to take a sufficient interest in such a question even as the Zulu War. My Lords, it is not the custom to follow a speaker on your own side of the House; but I must rise to express my surprise that a speech so deserving of an answer as that of my noble Friend who has just sat down should be allowed to pass unnoticed by noble Lords opposite. At the same time, I can quite understand the unwillingness of the Members and supporters of Her Majesty's Government to discuss the question which has been raised to-day. However great may have been the success claimed for the Turkish Convention when it was made public, I am afraid that after a year's reflection noble Lords on the other side do not care to discuss or defend the policy of that Convention. I cannot help feeling that the case of the noble Marquess with respect to this question is one of very great difficulty. The other day he candidly admitted that reforms in Asiatic Turkey could not be carried out without money, and that there was no money to be had. To-day he has told us in Latin, what we have all been constantly insisting on in English, that reforms are not compatible with the character and habits of the Turk. But, may I ask, were these facts perfectly unknown when the Convention was made—when we took upon ourselves these formidable engagements? Ought we not to have known when we undertook them that it would not be in our power to see them carried out? Were not Her Majesty's Government perfectly aware that Turkey had just passed through an exhausting war, and that she was in a state of utter bankruptcy? Under these circumstances, it is scarcely conceivable that they should within the past 12 months have come to view the governing capacity of the Turk in an altogether new light from that in which they viewed it when they undertook these engagements. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he last spoke on this subject, took a hopeful view of the condition of Asia Minor, owing to what he considered the extraordinary success which Her Majesty's Government had achieved in the matter of reforms in Egypt. Well, when we are in possession of the Egyptian Papers which have been promised us we shall be able to judge whether the success of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt has been as great as the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to imagine. But I entirely agree with him in thinking that there is a great deal of connection between this Turkish Convention and the progress of affairs in Egypt. I will not here stop to discuss the acquisition of Cyprus, which I, for one, have always held, and still hold, to be neither a politic nor a creditable act. Nor will I comment upon the joint action of this country with France in regard to the affairs of Egypt further than to say that, in my opinion, it would be very unwise in our statesmen to sacrifice in the slightest degree the perfect independence of this country. What I wish to observe is that if Her Majesty's Government have been able—whether following France and Germany, or being followed by them—to bring such pressure to bear upon the Sultan as to make him dismiss the Khedive for not having carried out reforms which the Sultan himself has entirely neglected in his own dominions, surely some similar concert of European Powers might force the Turks, say, to appoint Christian Governors in Armenia, to abstain from carrying off every shilling of tribute from the country, and if they would not defend the inhabitants of Armenia from the attacks of the Kurds, at all events, to allow these inhabitants to take some measures for defending themselves. I am perfectly certain that if Her Majesty's Government were to take energetic measures in that direction, in concert with other European Powers, they would to a great extent mitigate, if not altogether abolish, the horrors which have been described by the noble Earl who introduced the subject, and which have been so freely acknowledged by the noble Marquess.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

limited their responsibility to diplomatic action, and said they had done their best to obtain the performance of the promises made by the Porte.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said it would be no use to apply diplomatic action in the hope of curing what was inherent in the nature of the people.

THE EARL OF MORLEY had been much surprised at the contrast between the speech they had just heard from the noble Marquess and his vigorous despatch of the 8th of August last year, which embodied a most comprehensive scheme of reform for the Christian subjects of the Porte. Now, what were our responsibilities towards Armenia? The Armenians had a distinct claim upon this country in two distinct documents—the Treaty of Berlin and the Convention with Turkey—we had made ourselves responsible for the good government of Armenia. The expressions used in the Treaty of Berlin were that—and it gave a guarantee for their security against the incursions of the Kurds and the Circassians; and it further promised “periodically to make known the steps taken to secure those results” to the Powers signing the Treaty. He would like to ask the noble Marquess the definition of two terms; what did the words “without delay” mean? A year had passed since the signature of the Treaty; but were we to wait for another year or so, or to look forward to a still more distant future, when the finances of the Porte were in a satisfactory condition, before any attempt was made on the part of the Porte to redeem its promises? Then, again, he desired to know the meaning of the word “periodically;” and, whether, in accordance with its undertaking, the Porte had given the noble Marquess any account of its efforts in the direction of reform, and, if not, whether any of the Powers had taken action in consequence of the abandonment of those efforts. In common with other Powers, we had taken responsibility on ourselves, and, so far, there was a fairly exact parallel between the existing Government and that which succeeded the signature of the Treaty of Paris; but the celebrated Anglo-Turkish Convention, on which the noble Marquess's speech had thrown so much cold water, made it impossible to trace a further resemblance. We were solely responsible, according to that document, of which the words were as explicit as possible. The fact was, the Government had taken a responsibility upon themselves which they now found it impossible to carry out. What view did the noble Marquess take of the Treaty and Convention? Were they merely formalities? Now, there were four points to which the noble Marquess had called the attention of the Porte—and the first of these was the importance of a well-officered gendarmerie. The Porte, however, had replied that there was no money available for the purpose—an answer not likely to raise unduly the hopes of the population of Asia Minor. Next, the noble Marquess had urged the desirability of creating Central Tribunals, under the direction of European lawyers; and had been answered that such a change would interfere with the Sovereign rights of the Porte, and that, moreover, no Europeans understood the Turkish vernacular. The third recommendation of the noble Marquess was that the collection of the revenue should be reformed, and that the system of tithe should be abolished. To this demand a simple Non possumus had been returned. The despatch concluded with the admirable advice that the tenure of office by the Governors should be for a fixed period, and during good behaviour; and the Porte thereupon enlarged on the difficulty, not to say the impossibility, of finding competent and upright functionaries. It came to this, then—that when the noble Marquess insisted on four cardinal points of reform, the Porte merely replied that it had neither money nor upright functionaries; and that at present was the sole result, as far as Armenia was concerned, of the Treaty of Berlin and the Anglo-Turkish Convention. It seemed to him that the responsibilities we had undertaken were very grave, and that we had accepted them under a miscalculation of the means at our disposal; but, at least, they were solid and still existing engagements. It was surely not too much for the noble Earl, all the circumstances considered, to ask for evidence of the desire of the Porte to fulfil its promises. The fact was that, after all the promises that had been made, after all they had heard about "peace with honour," the whole arrangement had turned out no better than a sheet of waste paper.

“The Porte agreed to carry out without delay the improvements and reforms demanded by local requirements in the Provinces inhabited by the Armenians;”

The Earl of Morley

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl the Prime Minister told us last week, with some pathos, as an excuse for your Lordships' House not meeting before 4 o'clock, that some difficulty had more than once been experienced in getting his younger followers to take a sufficient interest in such a question even as the Zulu War. My Lords, it is not the custom to follow a speaker on your own side of the House; but I must rise to express my surprise that a speech so deserving of an answer as that of my noble Friend who has just sat down should be allowed to pass unnoticed by noble Lords opposite. At the same time, I can quite understand the unwillingness of the Members and supporters of Her Majesty's Government to discuss the question which has been raised to-day. However great may have been the success claimed for the Turkish Convention when it was made public, I am afraid that after a year's reflection noble Lords on the other side do not care to discuss or defend the policy of that Convention. I cannot help feeling that the case of the noble Marquess with respect to this question is one of very great difficulty. The other day he candidly admitted that reforms in Asiatic Turkey could not be carried out without money, and that there was no money to be had. To-day he has told us in Latin, what we have all been constantly insisting on in English, that reforms are not compatible with the character and habits of the Turk. But, may I ask, were these facts perfectly unknown when the Convention was made—when we took upon ourselves these formidable engagements? Ought we not to have known when we undertook them that it would not be in our power to see them carried out? Were not Her Majesty's Government perfectly aware that Turkey had just passed through an exhausting war, and that she was in a state of utter bankruptcy? Under these circumstances, it is scarcely conceivable that they should within the past 12 months have come to view the governing capacity of the Turk in an altogether new light from that in which they viewed it when they undertook these engagements. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he last spoke on this subject, took a hopeful view of the condition of Asia Minor, owing to what he considered the extraordinary success which Her Majesty's Government had achieved in the matter of reforms in Egypt. Well, when we are in possession of the Egyptian Papers which have been promised us we shall be able to judge whether the success of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt has been as great as the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to imagine. But I entirely agree with him in thinking that there is a great deal of connection between this Turkish Convention and the progress of affairs in Egypt. I will not here stop to discuss the acquisition of Cyprus, which I, for one, have always held, and still hold, to be neither a politic nor a creditable act. Nor will I comment upon the joint action of this country with France in regard to the affairs of Egypt further than to say that, in my opinion, it would be very unwise in our statesmen to sacrifice in the slightest degree the perfect independence of this country. What I wish to observe is that if Her Majesty's Government have been able—whether following France and Germany, or being followed by them—to bring such pressure to bear upon the Sultan as to make him dismiss the Khedive for not having carried out reforms which the Sultan himself has entirely neglected in his own dominions, surely some similar concert of European Powers might force the Turks, say, to appoint Christian Governors in Armenia, to abstain from carrying off every shilling of tribute from the country, and if they would not defend the inhabitants of Armenia from the attacks of the Kurds, at all events, to allow these inhabitants to take some measures for defending themselves. I am perfectly certain that if Her Majesty's Government were to take energetic measures in that direction, in concert with other European Powers, they would to a great extent mitigate, if not altogether abolish, the horrors which have been described by the noble Earl who introduced the subject, and which have been so freely acknowledged by the noble Marquess.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

INLAND NAVIGATION (IRELAND)— (LIMERICK TO BELFAST).

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM rose to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the Inland Navigation of Ireland (Limerick to Belfast), and to the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into the Board of Works, Ireland, so far as it affected that system. The inland navigation of Ireland was one of the utmost importance to the development and to the prosperity of the trade of that country. Last year, a Committee of the House of Commons inquired into the constitution of the Irish Board of Works; and one of the subjects to which the attention of that Committee was directed was that of the inland navigation of Ireland and its financial condition, and how far it was available to traffic. The system might be said to be divided into five sections, of which he proposed to refer to two—namely, the Ulster and the Ballinamore Canals. The Ulster Canal came into the possession of the Board of Works in 1865. After much discussion the Board determined to improve the navigation, and for this purpose they obtained a grant from the Government of £17,000; but, although this sum and more was spent upon it, matters were as bad as they were before. The principal defects were, an insufficient supply of water, and a great amount of leakage, by which the water in the canal was constantly drained away. One of the questions which came before the Committee was that of the insufficiency of water. This point was brought more particularly under their notice, by reason of a meeting of canal owners, carriers, &c., who passed a resolution declaring that the want of a sufficient supply of water in the Ulster Canal prevented the regular course of traffic along its line. That being brought before the Government, they could either take it in hand themselves or appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject. The question of the insufficiency of water was gone into before the Committee; and the Commissioner of Public Works, in examination, maintained that the water was sufficient for the amount of existing traffic; while, in answer to the questions, he stated that traffic was almost nil. At the time the resolution was passed at the meeting he had referred to it was summer, and the water was very low, and the reply did not come from the Board of Works until the winter. Six months afterwards when, owing to the rains, there was more water in the canal, the reply was to the effect that there was sufficient water in the canal. It was stated in evidence before the Committee that there was no complaint of the depth of the water, and that in face of the meetings held to protest against it. He contended that the development of the traffic along the canals would tend greatly to reduce the price charged for carriage along the railway lines of Ireland. There were many instances where canals were running in direct competition with the Railway Companies. If the canals were put into a proper condition, he had no doubt it would prove remunerative, and would contribute very much to the advantage and prosperity of the whole of Ireland. The Ballinamore Canal was in a peculiar position, because it was a junction canal, and joined the northern navigation with the Shannon. The repair of those canals was the cheapest way of opening up the country and developing trade, for the canal could be put in working order for about £8,000 at the outside. The Ballinamore Canal was formerly in the hands of the trustees of the four counties through which it passed; but it was subsequently handed over to the Board of Works, and at that time one of the Commissioners stated that his future policy in regard to the canal would be to "wait and see." He could not conceive a more disastrous or unbusiness-like policy, and trusted the Government would take up and decide this very important question.

LORD HARLECH said, the history of that question was one of those matters which had gained for the Irish Board of Works the character of being the most inefficient and unpopular public body in Ireland. There had been great waste in the construction of the canals, for the estimate was £132,000, while the cost incurred was £228,652. This excess arose from the fact that, instead of putting the work to contract, day-labourers were employed without proper supervision, with the result of completely demoralizing labour. One bridge which had cost £1,100, he had been credibly informed could be built as well for £300. So much for the past. As regarded the future, he was not sanguine enough to believe that any return for many years could be expected on the past outlay; but he saw no reason why such a moderate outlay as that suggested by his noble Friend for the purpose of opening the entire length of the canal from Belfast to the Shannon should not do more than cover the costs of maintenance. However, the indirect return in the shape of developing the resources of the country was the legitimate view to take of the question. The turnpike trusts failed to give a good return to those who advanced their money; but the country through which they passed were benefited to an inestimable extent, and this case of the canals might be considered parallel. Under such circumstances, he hoped the Government would take up and deal with the matter.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could not be expected to follow the noble Lord into all the details of the matter which he had referred to, nor should he enter into a discussion on the merits or the demerits of the conduct of the Irish Board of Works. He quite admitted that the question raised by his noble Friend was one of the greatest importance in connection with the opening up of that portion of the country with which he was connected. His noble Friend seemed to take a much more sanguine view of the relations of railways and canals in Ireland than was taken by the Committee who sat on the subject, because they said that the competition by canals was so small that it was scarcely appreciable. On the other hand, there was a direct argument against the canal navigation. They said that there was the indisputable fact that whatever might be the cost the enormous outlay already made on them had hitherto produced little or no result—they had proved nothing but a complete failure; while the navigation had a deleterious effect on the drainage of the country by forcing it beyond its proper level. It seemed to him that if this matter was to be dealt with in a manner to be to the advantage of the public it should be dealt with as one complete and regular system of through traffic. To put a portion of the navigation in a perfect state while another part was in the condition described would be of no use. His noble Friend suggested that the Government should take up the matter and put the whole of the navigation into a complete state—that they should lay out whatever sum of money was necessary for that purpose, and so carry on the work which had hitherto been done partly by trustees and partly by the Board of Works, and which at present had led to unsatisfactory results; or else that the Government should inquire into the matter and see whether anything could be done to improve the present system of navigation. Without going into minute details, he would say that it was quite obvious that it must be shown to the Committee that the system could be put into a proper state for a sum which might be considered reasonable; and they would also have to ascertain whether, if put into that condition, there would be any reasonable prospect of its being not only a paying concern, but also that it would be a benefit to the district. What he had to say was, that the Government had in contemplation the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the subject. He hoped the Committee might be able to report that the restoration of the canal referred to would be likely to produce the effect which his noble Friend had suggested, and whether it would be possible to put it in that condition with any reasonable hope of success. He trusted the answer would be satisfactory to his noble Friend.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—REGIMENTAL COMMANDS — OVER - REGULATION MONEY.—QUESTION.

LORD TRURO asked the noble Viscount the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether lieutenant-colonels upon half-pay who have been restored to full-pay to command regiments under the new system of five years' tenure of command are entitled, upon their retirement, to their over-regulation money, if they have not already received it from their regiments? On the answer he received would depend whether he should call further attention to the question hereafter.

VISCOUNT BURY: This is a matter of importance, and I may satisfy the noble Lord's mind by saying that the officers will not suffer pecuniarily under the new system. In reply to the noble Lord's Question, I would reply that the decisions on which cases coming under the Question would be decided are detailed in the Army Estimate Vote 19, G. 6. Generally speaking, it might be said that if an officer retiring from a five years' regimental command has not received any over-regulation, presumably he was not entitled to it; for up to November, 1871, Purchase having been in force, he would have received over-regulation from his successors. There are two exceptions to this, which are defined in the Royal Warrant of 1871. If an officer was placed upon half-pay owing to the reduction of his regiment, or through promotion for distinguished service, he would receive the customary over-regulation money of his rank when he retired to half-pay after the completion of his five years' command; provided always that only one lieutenant-colonel shall be allowed to return to full-pay and retire on these terms each year. But if the officer appointed to a five years' regimental command from half-pay has been placed on half-pay subsequent to the Warrant of 1871, he would receive no over-regulation money. The fact of being appointed to a five years' regimental command would not of itself give him any claim to over-regulation money.

CIVIL PROCEDURE ACTS REPEAL

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for repealing certain enactments relating to Civil Procedure which have ceased to be in force or have become unnecessary, and for abolishing outlawry in civil proceedings—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR: read 1st. (No. 132.)

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 27th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—NAVY ESTIMATES, Votes 1, 2, 3.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Ordered —First Reading—Partnership * [225].

Ordered—First Reading—Cork Borough Quarter Sessions * [226]; Highways Accounts (Returns) * [227].

First Reading—Supply of Drink on Credit *
[224].

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation
[88]—R.P.

Viscount Bury

Committee—Report—Tramways Orders Confirmation (re-comm.) [215].
Withdrawn—Charity Expenses and Accounts
[221].

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — LIMERICK
